CHRONICLE

Tariff Bill Passed.—The Underwood Tariff Bill is now on the statute books, the President having affixed his signature to the measure on October 3. By a vote of 254 to 103 the House had adopted the conferees' report on the Tariff Bill refusing, by a vote of 203 to 137, to accept the Clarke amendment, proposed by the Senate, and on which the conferees had disagreed, which would wipe out speculation in cotton futures by the imposition of a prohibitory tax. Mr. Underwood's motion for the adoption of the Smith-Lever plan in place of the Clarke amendment was carried by 171 to 161. The Smith-Lever amendment was intended to diminish speculation in cotton futures. It was aimed particularly at gambling on the New York Cotton Exchange and other cotton markets. It took from the manager of the Cotton Exchange the arbitrary power of deciding upon the class of cotton to be delivered in future transactions, and it stipulated that the grades recognized by the United States Government should be the guides for future deliveries. The small margin by which the Smith-Lever amendment had been adopted and the fact that there was much feeling against the measure in the House and little enthusiasm for it in the Senate foreshadowed a permanent disagreement covering the entire matter and the postponement of cotton legislation till next session. With many Republicans absent and unpaired, the Senate, on October 2, adopted the conference report by a vote of 36 to 17—more than two to one. Then, in accordance with an understanding to save Senators from embarrassment, the Senate voted without a roll call to disagree to the House compromise on the tax on cotton futures, then receded from its original amendment levying the tax, and the whole subject was stricken from the bill. This action by the Senate left no loophole for further attempts in the House to insist on the tax in any form. However, to leave no shadow of doubt hanging over the validity of the bill, the House voted unanimously to concur in the action of the Senate, which wholly eliminated the cotton tax matter from the measure.

Warns Railway Employees.—On the ground that the maintenance of seniority rule places the lives of the people of Massachusetts in jeopardy, Governor Foss has notified officers of the brotherhoods of locomotive engineers and firemen that if a strike is called on the New Haven Railroad to enforce the rule against the wishes of the railroad, he will call a special session of the Legislature to enact laws which will absolutely prohibit strikes of railroad operatives employed in the State. The railroad men have been contemplating a strike in consequence of the recent ruling of the New Haven Railroad Company that in the promotion of employees and the assignment of duties fitness as well as length of service shall be taken into consideration. In defence of his threatened action, Governor Foss declares that the laws of other countries supply useful precedents, and he feels confident that public sentiment in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts will demand the enactment of similar legislation.

Liberals Nominate Calero.—The ticket of the Liberal party in Mexico for the coming election will be Manuel Calero for President and Jesus Flores Magon for Vice-President. The nomination was entirely informal as there was no time to hold a convention. Prominent Liberals urged these candidates to accept the nominations, which they did. Señor Calero was Ambassador to the United States under Madero and is a Senator for the State of Mexico. Señor Magon was for a time Minister of the Interior in Madero's Cabinet. He is a Senator for Oaxaca and is considered the floor leader of the Liberals.—Frederico Gamboa, the Catholic Presidential candidate, has given out his plan of social reform. He advocates various schemes for the uplift of the working class, principally the establishment of savings banks and the encouragement of thrift and temperance. For the agrarian problem he favors the development of rural credits adapted to Mexican conditions.

Canada.—The Western wheat crop is turning out better than the first threshings indicated. Nearly two-thirds of the arrivals at Winnipeg are grading No. 1 northern and No. 1 hard. Last year most of the crop graded no higher than No. 2, and the year before little went higher than No. 3. Owing to the perfect harvest weather the threshing is already about finished. The railways have so arranged their freight service that they are carrying the grain to the head of the lakes as fast as it is delivered. On account of the limited capacity of the port of Montreal and its short supply of shipping, most of the grain will go out through Buffalo.—The Duke of Connaught will return immediately after Prince Arthur's marriage to finish his term of office. The Duchess has recovered from her long illness and there is reason to believe that she will accompany him.—A movement is on foot to bring pauper children to British Columbia to work on the land in place of Asiatics. The Canadian Unions are protesting against the bringing of British labor into Canada in excess of the demand, and are warning workmen to stay at home, where they will be better off.—The Machinists Union of Vancouver introduced a resolution at the Trades and Labor Congress in Montreal calling attention to the employment of the militia to suppress the late riots in Nanaimo, and approving the forbidding of membership in the militia to all union men.—The Government has contracted with the Royal Mail Steamship Company for the new West Indian service. Four steamers of 5,000 tons and 11 to 12 knots are to be employed. The contract is for five years and the subsidy is $300,000 a year.

Great Britain.—Ben Tillet, the strike organizer, announces that he is looking forward to follow Sir Edward Carson's example in a general conflict with the existing order of things.—The Admiralty has recognized officially the Trades Unions. It will meet deputations of the workmen either in London or at the docks, and will admit to discussions of disputed questions Trades Union leaders unconnected with the dock yards.—Employers are organizing a defence association and fund to protect themselves in their dealings with their workmen. The leaders of the men propose to meet them by abolishing the benevolent features of the Unions, so as to make all their funds available for carrying on their war against the employers.—The Chief Constable of Calcutta has just been murdered by three young Bengalis. The crime is believed to be the result of the political conspiracies that are going on in secret as much as ever.—The "Queen Mary," battle cruiser, which joined the Home Fleet lately, is reported to have made over thirty-five knots an hour.—The report from the United States that the oil concessions by the Colombian Government to the Pearsons call for the construction of a harbor in the Gulf of Darien and contemplate the construction of an interocean canal has been denied explicitly.

Ireland.—The Times and some other London Unionist papers have begun to take interest in the Conference suggested by Lord Loreburn, and mildly disapprove the Carson utterances and antics in Ulster as standing in the way of peaceful settlement. Mr. Redmond holds that the implacable hostility of the Orange leaders, rooted in the old spirit of ascendancy, and their treasonable burlesque, have improved the position of the Bill. He would confer on details, but not on principles: "Any Home Rule conference must of necessity be based on an Irish Parliament with an Executive responsible to it. That 's the startingpoint. There is no use in wasting more words on the matter. Our ship is at the harbor's mouth, the glass is 'set fair,' and the orders are for 'full steam ahead.'" Lord Northcliffe, owner of several leading Unionist journals, admits that the Northeast Ulster drillings, threats and manifestoes have left England indifferent. "The English are tired of the Irish question, and it is not possible to arouse very much feeling either way about it in England." The Government is being charged by the leaders of the suffragists and of the Dublin labor riots with cowardice and injustice in putting them in prison while they leave Sir Edward Carson free to organize and utter treason. A member of the Cabinet has explained that the suffragists and strikers have committed overt acts, the Carsonites have only threatened them. Not believing in the sincerity of the threats they do not wish to increase Carson's importance by making him a martyr.—The Irish Pilgrims, returning from the first National Pilgrimage to Lourdes, were received with great enthusiasm in Dublin, and in their respective dioceses. They numbered over four thousand, and the diocesan banners were borne by the leading public men of the dioceses. Among the cures that are certified by reputable physicians are those of Patrick Casey, Longford, total cripple for many years; Ellen Reddin, King's County, blindness; Jane McDonagh, Sligo, caries and ulcers; Michael Downey, Belfast, cripple in both legs for twenty-three years; Thomas Downey, Belfast, tubercular disease of the hip with discharging sinus since his second year; James McAlister, Belfast, hip disease since infancy; Agnes McGuire, chronic tubercular knee; Father Lynch, Kilmessan, and Father Kiernan, Enfield, County Meath, of deafness; Grace Maloney, Clare, of a tubercular knee with discharging cavity of nine years' standing. Several other cures are reported of organic diseases, and many remarkable improvements. Cardinal Logue, while convinced of the reality of the cures, especially that of Grace Maloney, which he witnessed personally, advised to await the verdict of the Lourdes Bureau, satisfied that they had worthily manifested Ireland's faith at Lourdes, and witnessed and received its blessings.

Rome.—The Osservatore announces that the Catholics of Rome will not go to the polls at the coming election, but says nothing of the rest of the country. It is thought that about 40 Catholic candidates will be elected, besides 150 Moderates, who are pledged to oppose anti-Catholic legislation. In most of the dioceses Catholics have been instructed to vote. Sonino, the leader of the Parliamentary opposition, is looked upon as a possible successor to Giolitti, as Prime Minister, if the latter retires, in which case friendly instead of strained relations with the Vatican may be the feature of the future, as will an absence of anti-Catholic legislation. It is even thought that arrangements for the complete independence of the Pope may be made, as well as freedom of conscience and religious education.—Cardinal Agliardi was conducted to the Seventh Annual Convention of Catholics at Mariño, by a military escort, on September 28. It was not to do him honor, but to protect him. Although he is eighty years of age, violence was feared. A street fight occurred a little later, in which forty persons were injured and a hundred arrests made. Cardinal Maffi, Bishop of Pisa, had a private audience with King Victor Emmanuel a few days before. He also was received surrounded by soldiers.—The Second Secretary of the United States Embassy has gone to Washington to answer inquiries about the charges brought against Mr. Post Wheeler, the First Secretary, for abusing the diplomatic privilege in regard to the free importation of dutiable articles. The Americans in Rome are very much disturbed over the affair, but hope for a vindication.—Many members of the French Catholic Association, which numbers 14,000, were received by the Pope in the closing days of September. They were not interfered with by the anti-Catholics, as in the case of the International Athletic Association.—The reports of the Holy Father's ill-health are unfounded.—An embassy is said to be on its way from Servia to arrange a concordat with the Holy See.—A letter from the Cardinal-Secretary of State to Mgr. Morganti, Archbishop of Ravenna, expresses the hope that the Catholics of all parts of Italy will take a notable part in the honors to be paid to Dante on the sixth centenary of his death, at Ravenna, September 14, 1321.

Italy.—Premier Giolitti has submitted to King Victor Emmanuel for signature a decree dissolving the Chamber of Deputies and fixing a general election for the end of October. The decree is accompanied by a statement from the Cabinet announcing the platform of the Government party. The chief planks of the platform treat of the war with Turkey and the occupation of Lybia by Italy. It also arranges for the broad democratic reforms the Government has adopted, especially the giving of practically universal suffrage, which will be experimented with for the first time in the approaching election. The electors this year will number 8,635,148, as against 3,247,722 in the last election. Among those who will be permitted to vote for the first time are illiterates who have served in the army or those who have passed the age of thirty.

France.—On September 30 a thunderstorm which lasted for twelve hours spread death and ruin in the hamlet of Cerbère, which is situated in the south of France, near the Mediterranean. Fourteen persons were killed and thirty injured. Quantities of gasoline, petroleum and calcium carbide took fire and exploded.—M. Bonzon, a Protestant, has recently published a striking study on the Law of Separation. After consulting men of all shades of opinion, he finds, with the exception of a few fanatics, that all are in favor of the French Government reestablishing relations with the Vatican.—In reply to a request preferred some time ago, the Holy Father has granted to the University of Angers the annexation henceforth of the three dioceses of Vannes, Quimper, and St. Brieuc, so that these may for the future support the University of Angers instead of, as heretofore, the Catholic Institute of Paris, which last the Pontiff warmly recommends to the liberality of French Catholics, for he recognizes that this change must cause some temporary loss to the financial position of the Institute.—If the report of the invention of Sava Rogozea be true, war is going to take on new aspects, cheapening armaments and adding to destructiveness. Guns that did service years ago may be fitted for a double inflammable bullet which is intended to be used against air ships. There is no flash and no sound as the bullet speeds straight from the muzzle instead of following the accepted ballistic laws of irregular bounds. Rogozea claims also to have invented a cannon which costs only $60 and can throw a shell a distance of 7,000 metres, and also a shrapnel shell which scatters its contents along the ground instead of dropping from above.—Premier Barthou, who presided at a meeting of the anti-Catholic League of School Teachers at Aix-les-Bains, denied that any attempt had ever been made by his own, or Poincaré's, or Briand's Cabinet to negotiate with the Vatican for a renewal of diplomatic relations. His speech and his patronage of the anti-Catholic League have disturbed France and Rome.

Spain.—The torrential rains which caused such havoc in France were similarly disastrous in Spain, not only injuring crops, railroads and telegraph wires, but in one place near Barcelona utterly destroying a village, fire adding its horror to the terrors of the flood.—There has been severe fighting between the Spaniards and Moors near Larache. Both sides claim a victory. According to native reports the Spaniards were ambushed and got the worst of the fighting. They suffered severely from shells fired by one of their own cruisers, which mistook them for Moors. In consequence of the war Spain's debt has increased $30,000,000. This condition of the finances may result in the overthrow of Romanones.

Germany.—A serious controversy has arisen between the North German Lloyd Company and the Hamburg-American Line. It is probably the beginning of a great struggle for the supremacy upon the Atlantic and may entail serious consequences for the entire ocean traffic between Europe and America. The North Atlantic Pool, which regulates the apportionment of passenger and freight traffic among the steamship lines on the Atlantic Ocean, will be ineffective after December 31, when all agreements are to be void unless a reconciliation is brought about. The Hamburg-American Line demands that its quota of passengers from Europe to America be raised by five per cent. and from America to Europe by seven per cent., and that a new and favorable basis of participation by the Canadian Pacific Company be arranged. If these concessions are made it is willing to reenter the pool. The North German Lloyd, on the other hand, denounces the existing freight pool in retaliation for the attitude of her rival in regard to the passenger traffic, and holds that sufficient compensation is given to the Hamburg-American Line for her smaller quota of passengers by leaving to her the entire Hamburg freight traffic.—Another German aviator, Lieutenant Steffan, has had the misfortune to land on French soil, although the greatest courtesy was shown him by the French authorities. They accepted the explanation that he had been blown out of his course while attempting a record flight to London. He was obliged to take his machine to pieces and transport it by rail to Germany. The incident is not taken very seriously by German officers, but Lieutenant Steffan will not escape paying the penalty, since most rigid regulations have been drawn up to prevent similar occurrences.—A monument to the memory of the Bavarian Prince Regent Luitpold, whose death took place last December, was unveiled at Munich, September 29, on the terrace before the National Museum. The veneration and love of the entire country for the "Nestor among German Princes" was again demonstrated, and he was affectionately called, by the orator of the occasion, "a true father of the Fatherland." The present Catholic Prince Regent, Ludwig, who is no less worthy of the nation's loyalty and love, expressed his appreciation of the event in words of the deepest gratitude. His appearance formed the climax of the festivities.

Balkans.—Government returns show that 44,892 Bulgarians were killed in the two recent wars in the Balkans. Of this number 30,024 were killed in the war of the allies with Turkey and 14,868 in the war between Bulgaria and the Servians and Greeks. There were 104,586 Bulgarians wounded in the two wars and 7,824 are reported missing. —It is thought that all of Servia's strength will be needed to overcome the Albanians, who have so far won a series of victories. The Albanian women are taking an active part in the fight, but on the other hand so are the Grecian women of Southern Albania, who do not want that district to be incorporated with Albania proper. The Albanians are also helped by 40,000 Macedonian Bulgars, who are fighting against the Servians in Macedonia.—It is reported that France refuses to discuss the projected loan to Turkey of $140,000,000 until peace reigns in the Balkans. Such a measure may be more efficacious than a series of victories.—If a Protestant King is given to Albania, as seems possible, it will only add to the confusion which is now the normal condition of that part of the world. There are no Protestants in Albania except the Protestant missionaries, and possibly they may have something to do with the choice. Albania will thus be like Greece, whose King is a Protestant, and also like Rumania and Bulgaria, whose Kings are Roman Catholics while their subjects are mostly Greek schismatics. These two alleged Catholic Kings made their heirs to the throne Greek schismatics, as did the Protestant King of Greece. The King of Bulgaria's first wife was a Catholic, his second a Protestant. Carmen Sylva, the Queen of Rumania, is a Protestant and so is her daughter. As Albania is Catholic, Orthodox and Moslem, it will be a curious arrangement to have them governed by a Protestant, if that be the ultimate decision of the Powers. Will his son be a Protestant or a Catholic or a Mohammedan?

China.—The new five-Power loan that was arranged with such trouble has collapsed. The withdrawal of the United States from the compact some time ago foreboded the end of the agreement. The British Government has now left the group, alleging as a reason the failure of France, Germany, Russia and Japan to observe the spirit of the loan, for those Powers were said to be working against the interests of English financiers. The five Powers mentioned still act together in making loans to the Chinese Government for general administrative purposes, but each of the Powers has been left free to support any of its citizens in floating loans for railroads and other industrial projects, and for provincial purposes. —Professor Frank J. Goodnow, of Columbia University, who accepted the post of adviser to a Constitutional Bureau, has now been six months at Peking, but finds no great eagerness for his counsel on the part of the Chinese. Though, according to the tentative Constitution, the election of a President for a fixed term was to be held only after the Parliament had adopted a permanent Constitution, it was reported on September 30, that Yuan Shih-kai, the Provisional President, would, nevertheless, be elected, on October 10, Constitutional President, notwithstanding the fact that no permanent Constitution has yet been framed.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Good Manners

In an address delivered some weeks ago to the boys of the Royal Grammar School, Guildford, Lord Rosebery expressed a fear that not only in England, but throughout the world, good manners were becoming obsolete. He reminded his hearers that in the school's statutes, framed 300 years ago, it is enjoined that "Honesty and cleanness of life, gentle, decent speech, humility, courtesy, and good manners were to be established by all good means," and referred to a similar rule laid down by "one of the great saints of the educational calendar, William of Wickham." As the speaker had observed in his countrymen a decay of the reverential spirit, and a tendency to despise courtesy, he called the boy's attention to the "commercial value" of good manners and showed what an important factor they are in the achievement of success in life.

The London Times, commenting on Lord Rosebery's speech well observes that while the commercial value of good manners "may be a reason for teaching them, it is not a reason for learning them. Indeed, the manners that are acquired for their commercial value are likely to be 'shoppy' rather than good. Good manners are an art, and like other arts, though they may have a commercial value and may be taught for that reason, they must be learnt for the love of them. And yet there is a science of good manners, as there is a science of other arts. They come, no doubt, from the heart; but the instinct out of which they grow must be trained and encouraged, and it must profit by experience."

The science of good manners can be learned to a considerable extent, it is true, from books of deportment, etiquette and the like, but the perfection of good breeding cannot be taught by books alone. It is a matter of character and training. Though perfect manners are often the concomitants of a high degree of civilization and are largely dependent, of course, for their excellence on an environment of culture and refinement, their cradle and home is the heart. The reader can easily recall, no doubt, men and women among his acquaintances who have had little education and possess few social advantages, but who are ladies and gentlemen withal, for their hearts are good and kind.

Good manners are now "going out," say the lovers and praisers of days gone by, because there is so much in modern life that is fatal to the exercise of the old-fashioned spirit of reverence and courtesy. Socialistic tendencies in politics, rationalizing influences in education, the passion for independence in the young, and the absorbing commercialism of the age are combining to make good manners obsolete. To illustrate the prevalent lack of consideration toward the aged, for instance, a writer in the September Atlantic relates how he saw an old lady of eighty totter from the sidewalk to the gutter, as she saw bearing down upon her three stalwart young women walking abreast, who were more "gently dressed" than "gently bred." When they had swung by, "the old lady, wearing a look of joy, as if all that she claimed as her due lay in escaping destruction, climbed triumphantly back to the sidewalk." Most of our readers have often witnessed, no doubt, similar scenes, and have sadly concluded that "futurist manners" have scant regard for the helplessness of age and little reverence for gray hairs. Is this due merely to want of thought? Perhaps. But "nothing shows a better heart, or a nicer sense of true politeness, than kindly attention to those advanced in years."

When Lord Rosebery complained in his speech that all over the world manners seem to be growing steadily worse, he made no exception for Americans. Indeed, we have always been a people that sets little value on form and punctilio. We are busy men, we say, and politeness takes time. To the amazement of European visitors we submit meekly to being pushed about, scolded and domineered over by any petty official who has a peaked hat and brass buttons, and with all our boasted independence, the respect we show to a uniform, however boorish and unmannerly the wearer of it may be, is almost pathetic. Much of what we patiently endure, moreover, from these rude functionaries we thoughtlessly inflict in public on our fellow-men. To be first at any cost is the one thing necessary. For men to travel comfortably seated, while women stand, is a commonplace to-day. Exact politeness is a virtue that well enough became, no doubt, the leisurely life of our grandfathers, but it is "out of date" now. By some, indeed, good manners are disdainfully regarded as a mere veneer, an empty formality, and the mark, most likely, of an unmanly, subservient spirit. "Manner," they observe, "is the comparative of man, not the superlative." "His politeness all lies on the surface," is another disparaging comment that is sometimes heard: as if that were not an excellent place for good manners to be. The man who prides himself on his "good heart" and yet takes no trouble to make himself agreeable by being polite will cause shrewd observers to question whether his heart is so singularly "good" after all.

No one who has given attention to mastering the gentle art of living pleasantly with others can fail to have experienced what serious results follow at times the most trifling mistakes and oversights in social intercourse. Tact and politeness are very serviceable lubricants for lessening this friction. "But I have no tact," it may be objected. Thinking first of others and then of oneself will contribute wonderfully toward the acquisition of that grace, and observing the laws of etiquette will be a further help. Too many people in their relations with others forget what a universal passion vanity is, how sensitive, too, and easily wounded. It is hurt as often by neglect as by downright rudeness. The success of many a "social favorite" is due to his close study of this weakness in others, and to his adroitness and delicacy in ministering to it. He thoroughly realizes that his own concerns are not as interesting to others as to himself, so in conversation he is not wearisome, but shows instead such a keen interest in those with whom he is talking that they are highly flattered at finding so attentive a listener. Thus are social triumphs won.

It is possible, of course, to be a gentleman without being a saint, and to be habitually in a state of grace without being what is termed well-bred. The marks of a perfect gentleman, as he is described by Newman, may subserve, we are reminded, "the education of a St. Francis de Sales, or a Cardinal Pole; they may be the limits of the contemplation of a Shaftesbury or a Gibbon." But no Shaftesbury or Gibbon, it should be said, could be the gentleman the Cardinal portrays. For only the heart that is filled with Christian charity, the qualities of which are enumerated by St. Paul in his First Epistle to the Corinthians, will be the source, as a rule, of the most perfect manners, and the highest type of gentleman or lady will generally be found among consistent Christians. Even the peasants of Catholic countries, travelers tell us, have about them a certain courtesy and good breeding that are often lacking in the humbler classes of Protestant lands. The cottager of Connaught graciously shares his last loaf with a stranger guest, and the manners of the Castilian ploughman are those of a grandee. However lacking these Catholic poor may be in the polish and culture that are imparted by familiarity with good literature and fashionable society, the fact that for generations they have kept vividly before them as models of true politeness and perfect manners, Our Divine Lord Himself, "the first true gentleman that ever breathed," and His Blessed Mother, peerless among women, goes far to explain this singular courtesy and good breeding.

For the Son of God never broke the bruised reed or quenched the smoking flax, His conversation had no bitterness, or His company no tediousness. His life was passed in the constant practice of gentleness, patience and considerateness, as the Gospels abundantly show. As for Our Lady, whenever she is mentioned in Holy Writ, we find her thinking of others, saying a kind word or doing a gracious service. She was mindful of us, for instance, when she consented to become the Mother of the Saviour, it was to serve and comfort St. Elizabeth that she hurried into the hill country, and she secured a miracle at Cana just to spare the bridegroom a little embarrassment.

In the practice, therefore, of these virtues, as of all others, the Church's saints and holy ones have always striven to resemble as perfectly as possible their high Exemplars, so courtesy and good breeding have become characteristics of lofty holiness. They are no less conspicuous, for example, in the life of St. Francis of Sales than in the writings of St. Teresa, and the founder of a great religious order, in drawing up rules for the guidance and formation of his children, has left in the following words, his biographers tell us, an excellent description of his own perfect manners:

"All must be exactly careful to guard the gates of their senses, especially their eyes, their ears and their tongue, from all disorder, and to preserve themselves in peace and true internal humility, showing it in silence, when it is to be kept, and when they have to speak, in the circumspection and edification of their words, in the modesty of their countenance, gravity of their gait and whole carriage, without any sign of impatience or pride; procuring and wishing in all things to yield to others the better part, esteeming all in their hearts as their superiors, and giving them outwardly the honor and reverence which everyone's state requires, with simplicity and religious moderation; and hence it will follow, that considering one another, they will increase in devotion, and praise our Lord God, whom everyone must strive to acknowledge in another as in His image." That would seem to be an admirable description, too, of a Christian gentleman.

WALTER DWIGHT, S.J.

Lourdes and Its Lesson

Lourdes is primarily a manifestation of Faith, in which the frequent recurrence of miraculous cures, marvelous though they be, is but an incident. Catholics in all ages have been wont to make pilgrimages to the holy places that had been hallowed by the presence or special beneficence of Christ, His Mother or His Saints; and while they sometimes sought relief of physical ailments, their main purpose was, through prayer and penance in the shadow of the supernatural, to obtain the cure and ransom of their souls, and the souls of their friends and people and all the living and the dead; and always to do honor to God. The Lourdes' pilgrims inherit the same spirit. Cardinal Logue announced that the Irish National Pilgrimage was intended as "a testimony to the faith, piety and devotion of Irish Catholics and a demonstration of the tender love for the Holy Mother of God which has been ever a cherished tradition of Catholic Ireland"; and addressing from the Grotto of Lourdes the invalids ranged in front of him and the thousands of pilgrims from all nations, he said not a word of physical benefits, but declared that they had come for the glory of God and the spiritual good of themselves and their land and people, to thank Holy Mary Immaculate for her aid in keeping their Faith unbroken in the battles of the past, and to ask her in the battles of the future to keep them and their nation unstained of heresy and sin.

This is quite at variance with the non-Catholic concept of the activities of Lourdes, about which secular journalists have spread many misconceptions. These imply that practically all the pilgrims are crippled or diseased and go for physical benefits only; that those of them who are, or think they are, cured, owe their temporary betterment to the exaltation produced by the religious enthusiasm of the environment; and that the greater number return disillusioned and discontented to their homes; and much eloquent pathos is lavished on their misery. Not one of these statements is founded on fact. Of the million people that visit Lourdes annually but a very small fraction are invalids. Among the 4,000 Irish pilgrims there were but two hundred sick, and still less in the larger French pilgrimage that preceded it. People go to Lourdes to pray, to atone, to witness to God's wonders, and achieve spiritual health; comparatively few for physical relief.

As to suggestion, we have already shown that the cases to which it is applicable are never recorded as cures at the Medical Bureau; but the fact is, and it is a marvelous one, that the suggestion which psychotherapists recognize does not operate at Lourdes. The medical application of suggestion is extremely limited under any circumstances. It can cure no nervous diseases that have produced, or are produced by, existing organic lesions, only those that are purely nervous in nature and origin; and though it would seem that the enthusiasm of the multitude, the exaltation of faith and hope at Lourdes, would greatly influence such maladies, there is no record of their cure. Bérillon and Bernheim, the masters of hypnotism and suggestion, have admitted that the cures effected, involving the reconstruction of dead tissue, were impossible to those agencies, and that whereas the supreme emotion aroused renders the conditions ideal, the special subjects of suggestion remain unaffected. The obvious conclusion was well expressed by an American physician, who was comparing the results at Lourdes with those of clinical institutions: "You have no suggestion at Lourdes, though you ought to have a great deal. The Blessed Virgin wants no mixture in her work; she removes the effects of all merely human intervention."

To the eye of faith the serene content of the invalids who return with wounds and sores uncured, is not less remarkable. They have found better than they sought: God has filled their hearts with assurance of eternal health. The reporter of the Dublin Independent found the uncured patients of the Irish pilgrimage "buoyed up with the spirit of having accomplished something very dear to their hearts." To a poor old woman "who had not stirred hand or foot for years," he said:

"I suppose now you're a bit disappointed, going so far and coming back no better?"

"Indeed you're wrong, sir," she answered. "We're all better in mind. There's a great load off me heart, and I'm ready to go back again this minute, and if the Blessed Mother asks God to spare me I'll go every time I'm let."

She was typical of all: "From the blind, the lame, and the stricken I heard the same opinions in different words. Not one of discouragement or grumbling could I hear, and I have been amongst more than a hundred invalids this day." It has been the universal experience of visitors to Lourdes. This healing of all hearts seems not less supernatural than the sudden rebuilding of organisms. Where are the human physicians who can invariably send away content and happy the patients they fail to cure?

The reports of the latest pilgrimage, or indeed of any, will account for this strange content. The representatives of the London dailies are bewildered not less by the religious manifestations than the marvelous cures they have witnessed. The Dublin writer enters better into the spirit of the scene. He pictures the Irish procession, under the Flag of St. Patrick and the banners of twenty-seven sees, wending its way to the continuous chant of hymn and Rosary, the eminences and open spaces alive with people of many nations united in one song of faith. Thousands with heads bared to the broiling sun lift up their voices in pæans of praise—"then a hush as Jesus of Nazareth passed by," borne to each invalid one by one, and "as you respond to the invocations you cannot hear your own voice in the tumultuous chorus of supplication." At night the 20,000 flambeaux of the pilgrims of Belgium, Brittany, Germany, Spain, Italy, Ireland, seem to paint in flame the billows of the "Ave! Ave!" that roll and crash over the hills and "stab your heart at every passionate shout." Then the five hundred Masses at which all the pilgrims stream to the altar rails to receive their God, and the continuous murmur of prayer in many tongues, and again the solemn procession of the Blessed Sacrament at which in sonorous Credo the thousands of divers lands unite in thunderous protest of loyalty to Christ to His Church, to His Mother, raise all things of earth to the atmosphere of Heaven; and as the crowds disperse after each soul-stirring act of homage they gather in knots here and there around a pilgrim yesterday hopelessly diseased, to-day buoyant with exultant life. "Thinking it all over one knows now why all nations gather to this little wayside village," and, as Father Bertrin puts it in his admirable book on Lourdes, why "from these burning hours of faith and great enthusiasm remains an afterglow which lights up the whole life that follows."

This "happy infection of a great piety" spreads far and fast, but, perhaps, more fruitfully contagious is the charity of Lourdes that infects high and low alike and makes them one. There refined ladies of society spend days and nights tending the wounds and caring for and comforting the sick and poor, and hundreds of young men of rank and distinction carry the sick on their shoulders or on stretchers, undress them, regardless of their sores, lift them gently to and from the baths, reconvey them safely to their rooms, and day after day repeat the process. These are the brancardiers of Lourdes, who, like their sister workers, come at their own expense to place riches and elegance and grace at the service of disease and poverty for the love of God and Mary. Lovingly and humbly they do their work, the equals or servants of the lowliest. They are all volunteers, and their numbers never fail the needs. It is a thrilling exhibition of Christian virtue that makes Lourdes, a grand High School in the charity of Christ.

The faith and piety and charity of Lourdes have won more souls than its miracles, or rather, have won their wills into submission to the evidence of their senses and the law of their minds. But the miracles have started the process. They have awakened France from infidelity, are shaking it and the surrounding nations to the centre, and are calling to the skeptics and heretics of world: The Christ of Galilee is here. Those who have answered are innumerable, and their numbers grow as the news of its miracles, new and old, strikes hard on the ears of the world. And the world is forced to listen. The miracles are countless, covering the whole range of pathology, and attested by irrefragable testimony, but some are environed by circumstances that compel the attention and assent of the most obdurate.

De Rudder, of Belgium, who was instantaneously cured of a broken suppurating leg, had been a protégé of an unbelieving Viscount, and had been treated without avail by many famous physicians. Two compound fractures and many suppurating sores of eleven years standing were healed, and 1¼ inch of bone supplied, in an instant. The man had asked Mary for only sufficient strength to support his family. He did so in perfect health till stricken by pneumonia twenty-three years later. The evidence was complete at every stage. It converted the Viscount and the Protestant and free-thinking doctors, and many others; and the sight of that perfect limb, with the marks of the fractures and the new supply of bone, now on exhibition in Brussels, has been melting the skepticism of hundreds of lay and medical inquirers. The mendacities of Zola have drawn world-wide attention to two marvelous cures that would have escaped notice otherwise, and the presence at Lourdes, as a brancardier, of Gabriel Gargam, whose body, broken in a railway wreck, gangrened, paralyzed and dying, was suddenly restored to perfect health—and with it his soul, for he was till then an unbeliever—has been an object lesson that brought many to the feet of God. The reading of these and other equally striking cures in the books of Bertrin and Boissarie have drawn thousands of visitors to Lourdes and spread its faith-giving influence through distant lands.

Lourdes belongs no longer to one nation. The continental countries have each set there a monument, and now Ireland has erected hers. A noble Celtic Cross, seventeen feet in height, cut from a block of Irish granite by an humble Irish workman, fittingly expresses her faith and devotion. Around the sculptured figure of the Crucified Redeemer are carved on twenty-one panels the fifteen Mysteries of the Rosary and the symbolism of Mary crushing the serpent, interlaced with Irish coils and spirals, and the inscriptions in Gaelic and French with Irish lettering: "An Humble Offering from the People of Erin to Mary Mother of Lourdes"; and circling the apex, "Let us stand by the cross with Thee." It was wrought as a free gift to Mary by William Gaffney, who during five years of labor surmounted each problem of workmanship by telling his Rosary or following the Stations of the Cross. It was unveiled on Irish Day, Feast of the Exaltation of the Holy Cross, and among the first to run to it and kneel before it was a fresh young Irish girl, who the day before and for many years had been haggard, crippled, and hopelessly diseased.

The pathos and publicity of Grace Maloney's condition and the shock of the startling contrast stirred the imagination of the journalists, but the Irish Cross looked down on numerous other cures that equally demanded the intervention of Omnipotence. Abstracting from these, Cardinal Logue declared that the lesson of the Pilgrimage of his people was the manifestation of Faith, received and given. It is the lesson of Lourdes. The standing miracle of the origin and the marvels and the spirit of Lourdes that draws the myriads to its shrine and fills them with the fire that burned in the disciples of Emmaus, is a sign set up before an incredulous and materialistic world that the Christ of Calvary and the Virgin of Nazareth are here, and that Faith is the one enduring fact that overmasters all. Ozanam on Labor and Wages

In the second volume of Ozanam's miscellaneous writings, the eighth of his complete works, can be found the notes of a course of commercial law delivered by him while a young professor at Lyons, eight years before the outbreak of the Revolution of 1848. A brief sketch of the topics treated by him in each discourse is given, while now and then a striking thought is presented in ampler outline. The twenty-fourth lecture deals with the labor question, Des Ouvriers. Its importance in the mind of Ozanam is evident from the fact that it is followed by a "Recapitulation" hardly less comprehensive, and in many details more searching than the original discourse. Although it was the custom of Ozanam always to give a carefully prepared review of his previous lecture, the present repetition has been particularly chosen by his editors for reproduction as the most favorable example of his methods. We have, therefore, sufficient material to form an accurate estimate of Ozanam's economic theory of Labor and Wages.

It would be impossible, as well as impracticable, to offer here in full the minute and undeveloped plans of lectures and repetition. Our object is to select from his notes and jottings the leading economic ideas which are more strictly the coinage of his own mind, and to present them with their proper interpretation.

It is not necessary to delay long upon the first section which treats of the general character of labor and its part in production. Labor is for him "the sustained act of man's will applying his faculties to the satisfaction of his wants." The law of work is written for all ages and for all mankind on the first page of the world's history; but pagan pride has always rebelled against it. In the ancient world it became the lot of the lower castes, of the helot and the slave. Only with Christianity and by the example of the divine Artisan in the workshop of the carpenter was labor rehabilitated and lifted up to its true dignity. Labor, we must, however, bear in mind, is of many kinds. It is not necessary, as Ozanam well says, that our hands be black with soot; they may be stained with ink.

Great stress is, therefore, laid by him upon the fact that there are three classes of labor: physical, intellectual and moral, and that all three are truly productive, in as far as they satisfy the threefold need of man, which is moral and intellectual as well as physical. A solidarity must be established between these classes, and the error of modern economists is that they fail to recognize the permanent benefit of moral work, since they consider only the atheist laborer. Intellectual and moral needs are as real as any others, and they who devote their lives to satisfying them are neither idlers nor unproductive members of society. Their work endures beyond the passing action in the influences they exercise and the institutions which they found.

In pointing to labor, capital and nature as the three elements which must enter into every process of production he agrees with the most modern economists. The capital of the moral worker would evidently, according to the mind of Ozanam, consist of his education and his moral qualifications which have been accumulated with no less care than the wealth of the capitalist, and are now productive of moral good. Ozanam's wide divergence from the Liberal and Socialistic schools is at once apparent.

In the second part of his discussion, however, which deals with the question of wages, this divergence becomes still wider and more pronounced. Yet nowhere shall we find a deeper appreciation of the miseries of the toiling classes, of the injustice to which they are so frequently subjected, and of the indignity with which they have been treated by Liberalism, than in the pages of Ozanam. Nowhere, likewise, is there shown a more sincere determination and a more fearless courage in championing their rights. "It is time," he wrote in Les Origines Du Socialisme, "to prove that we can plead the cause of the proletariat, to pledge ourselves to the solace of the suffering classes, to seek the abolition of poverty without becoming a participant of the doctrines which unchained the tempest of June and which still are spreading their dark clouds about us." (Mélanges I, 212.) That poverty can never be entirely abolished he well knew and clearly stated, but he no less strongly taught the duty of abolishing to the utmost of our power all the causes that culpably lead to it.

Leaving aside Ozanam's technicalities, which at times are perplexing, if not confusing, we shall come immediately to the vital question of wages. The terms "living," "personal" or "family" wage belong to the present stage of the controversy. Instead we find in Ozanam the distinction made between what he equivalently calls the "natural" wage, taux naturel du salaire, and the "actual" wage, taux réel du salaire.

The wages, according to Ozanam, should pay the laborer for all that he places at the disposition of industry. They are three things. First, the "meritorious will," or as he likewise calls it, volonté courageuse. While this title now sounds fanciful, it evidently implies nothing more than the ready and faithful actual service which the wage-earner renders to his employer. For this the least that can be given him is a payment which will afford him the possibilities of existence. In the second place, he offers his education. This is equivalently his capital, and therefore gives him a title to interest, an interest which will enable him to pay for the education of his own children in their turn. Thirdly, he sacrifices his vital strength, which cannot endure when old age approaches. He has, therefore, a natural right to a wage which besides providing for his living expenses and the education of his children will likewise enable him to retire in old age. This is, as it were, the rent paid upon his life which was placed at the disposition of his employer. Were he not to receive this rental he would practically have sold his life, which, Ozanam argues, is a sacred possession of the laborer.

However, this method of argumentation, with its touch of poetry, may appeal to the reader, the conclusion is clear. The laborer is entitled, according to Ozanam, to a wage which will provide for his own proper living and for the education of his children, and which will permit him to retire from work in his declining years to live upon his savings. Thus he will not stand in need of an old age pension by which to support himself when his "vital force" has been exhausted in the service of industry. That the wages may suffice for all these purposes, Ozanam, however, supposes thrift and virtuous living on the part of labor. The first of these conditions, to go no farther, socialists spurn in order to keep the wage-earner in his indigence, even when wages are just and satisfactory. Only in this way can they hope to bring about the revolution under all circumstances.

Thus far, however, we have only considered what Ozanam calls the "absolute conditions" determining wages, but there are likewise "relative conditions" to be taken into account. Special wages are demanded according to the difficulties or hardships of the work, when it is painful, disagreeable or dangerous; when it is subject to interruptions, like the trade of the mason; when it requires extraordinary strength, dexterity, study, or long years of apprenticeship.

The fact, however, is that the actual wage is often beneath the natural wage. This leads Ozanam to a searching consideration of the relations between employer and employed and a discussion of the necessity and limitation of State interference. To these subjects we shall devote a separate article.

The views of Ozanam upon the leading economic issues of our day have far more than a mere historic interest. They bring us face to face with the great Catholic social principles and demonstrate the continuity of Catholic teaching. Even where changes have openly been made, as in the question of interest, there has not been the least sacrifice of principle on the part of the Church, and even in the application itself of fundamental Catholic truths to new economic conditions, as in the instance given, the change is often more apparent than real. Much of the terminology in the lectures of Ozanam, delivered three-quarters of a century ago, will appear strange to the modern reader, and calls for interpretation. But the principles hitherto enunciated are not new to us, they perfectly agree in substance with the teaching of many of our foremost Catholic economists.

If we sum up, therefore, what has thus far been said by him upon the wage problem, and express it in the language of our own day, we arrive at the conclusion that he demands more than a mere personal or living wage, that, as closely as we can approximate to his idea of justice in this important question, he is a defender of the family wage. It is true that he speaks only of a wage which must suffice for the education of the laborer's children, while no express mention is made of the support of the mother of the family. But the latter demand is naturally included in the former, especially since much of the education of the laborer's offspring, in the broad sense in which Ozanam employs the term "education," must depend upon her. His severe strictures, moreover, upon woman as well as child labor can leave no reasonably doubt upon this point. One observation must, however, candidly be made: that common education was not then prolonged to the fourteenth or even the sixteenth year, and that we cannot, therefore, state with certainty what Ozanam's attitude would have been upon this phase of the subject under existing conditions. There is danger of exaggeration in the present unlimited demands for popular education.

The Negro's Industrial Progress

The industrial progress of the colored race in the United States has been strikingly emphasized in an address recently issued by the National Negro Business League. In sixty years the four and half million negroes of the Civil War period have increased to ten millions, who own $700,000,000 worth of property and 20,000,000 acres of land. The insurance companies represented at their annual convention carry risks exceeding $10,000,000, and their banks and industrial institutions are numerous and well established. Their school attendance is constantly growing, and negro illiteracy is now reduced to 30 per cent. Other figures could be added to show that their material and educational progress has been rather understated than exaggerated. They have doctors, lawyers and teachers, many of them of good capacity, and their farmers not infrequently win prizes in the State Fairs of the South. For several years the first and finest cotton bales in Georgia were produced by negro farmers.

This development in half a century is highly creditable to the negro race, and also creditable to the white communities in which they live. Outrages on the negro and flamboyant utterances of notoriety-seeking politicians are featured in our newspapers, but we hear nothing of the general encouragement shown to the thrifty negro, and the tone of the principal Southern newspapers, which discountenance injustice, advocate fair play to the colored people, and encourage their industrial advancement. In fact, the respectable Southern white is always ready to help out any well-considered scheme of negro betterment, and when it is of a practical nature to give it generous support. It is not the advancement of the negro but that kind of uplift that promotes, or is believed to promote, racial animosity, that excites Southern hostility. It is a good sign that the most influential leaders of the negro race are aware of this condition and keep it in mind in their propaganda.

But there is a side to the picture of the present status of the colored people that the Negro Business League does not disclose. Despite the success of those negroes who cling to the farm, the one place where they can compete with their white neighbor without serious danger of discrimination, the vast majority are fleeing from it to the cities, where they are prone to learn the vices of the whites rather than their virtues. And in town and country the lesson of vice is nearest to them. In slavery days they learned courtesy and respect for authority and usefulness of service, and much of the higher qualities of Christian civilization from mistresses whose teaching and watchful kindness begat a type of faithful and courteous negro that is now, as a rule, either old or dead. That the young negro is lacking in these qualities is not altogether his fault. Emancipation set up a wall between him and those who were capable of guiding and controlling him, and left him free to associate only with those whites who are the most vicious of their race. He went to school and learned to read and write and aspire to the pleasures of an easy life, but not to work; and hence his increase in literacy too often spells a decrease in character. His religious guidance is now monopolized by the colored preacher, who has usually very little of religion or morality to impart, either by word or example. The negro birth-rate is decreasing, while infant mortality is not, and vices are rampant that were unknown under slavery. By natural increase there ought to be much more than ten million negroes, and the fact that a large proportion of these is not negro, but merely more or less colored, is eloquent of many evils which their present education is not calculated to eradicate or lessen.

We know that true religion is the one effective remedy, and many of the negro leaders are also aware of it. The Catholic Church alone welcomes the negro to her bosom as warmly as those of other races and colors. The day of this writing, September 9, is dedicated to a saint whose heroic zeal and sacrifice in their evangelization caused him to be raised to the Church's altars, and won him the title of Apostle of the Negroes. Catholic apostleship makes the negro in fact as in name a Christian. When he hearkens to the Church's call he seems to leave behind him the vices which are commonly considered characteristic of his race. The Catholic negroes of Louisiana are chaste, honest, industrious and reliable. There are West Indian Catholic negroes in New York who are employed by preference, for their trustworthiness, steadiness, and respectful and moral behavior. The Sacraments of the Catholic Church subdue the passions and develop the virtues of all races and peoples, and there is no substitute outside of it. The Catholic Church alone can settle the negro problem, and we trust that the Missionary Congress of Boston will strengthen the hands of the religious and diocesan workers who are engaged in its solution, and help to multiply the reapers in this precious but too long neglected harvest.

Recent Consular Reports give an interesting summary of that portion of the Census of Germany, taken in 1907, which relates to the religious complexion of the population of that empire. The results, just published, show that of the 61,720,529 people counted, 38,374,648 professed adherence to the Evangelical Church, 22,540,485 to the Catholic Church, and 566,999 to the Jewish Church. In the eastern section of the empire 12,681,192 of the 18,747,937 making up the entire population of that region were Evangelical, 5,758,072 were Catholic and 232,377 were Jewish; in Western Germany 20,213,335 of the total population of 28,854,132 were Evangelical, 8,330,729 Catholic and 188,918 Jewish; and in Southern Germany, of the total population of 14,118,460 the Evangelical Church claimed 5,480,121 adherents, the Catholic 8,451,684 and the Jewish 145,704. In the two most populous kingdoms of the empire, Prussia and Bavaria, the figures are as follows: Prussia, with an enumeration in the census year of 37,989,893, had within its limits 23,847,337 professing the Evangelical faith, 13,608,183 the Catholic, and 374,353 the Jewish. Bavaria, in a population of 6,598,168, claimed 1,861,079 Evangelicals, 4,668,108 Catholics and 53,723 Jews. The small part of the population not accounted for in each case in this summary was credited to non-evangelical sects of the Christian faith or to non-Christian bodies.

The Manchester (England) Guardian is authority for a statement affirming that the American, British and German Governments have under consideration a proposal to make the Azores archipelago an international neutral zone. The project is mentioned in an article relating to the opening of the Panama Canal. German, American and British companies, says the writer, have a joint cable station on these islands and this makes free access to them of the greatest importance. It is, therefore, proposed that a joint treaty be arranged between Portugal and the other civilized nations by which a neutral international zone shall be established and strictly maintained in the archipelago. The suggestion is made that all vessels within this zone be protected from attack or seizure and allowed to receive provisions and fuel.

The Rebellion in China

SHANGHAI, Sept. 10, 1913.

This uprising proved on the whole a most daring and terrible adventure, and had for its purpose the overthrow of the President. As can be seen by the present article, he has shown much forethought and displayed greater energy than was expected.

We had a week's fighting at Shanghai and on two occasions the rebels fought desperately. I was an eyewitness of all, being favorably situated four miles away. Looting and pillage took place during three days to an extent that would be a disgrace to any civilized government. A Northern general of the old type is principally responsible. He and his men still sport the pigtail. Yuan's cause will be injured by the conduct of those men. The rebellion may be now said to be crushed, though all danger of guerilla warfare and pillage is not removed. The work of restoring peace will be difficult and long.

Having dealt in a previous article with the principal causes of the rebellion in China, its leaders and their motives, it now remains to examine the attitude of Peking and whether the President has the power to crush it out within a short time.

The Manchus once removed, factions broke out on all sides and paralyzed the political life of the nation. Principal among these was the Kuomintang party, which at first accepted Yuan and pledged itself to loyally support him. Little by little, however, the policy of its members become one of obstruction and opposition to the head of the State. They wanted the President to be elected only after a Constitution had been drawn up and approved by the Parliament. Having elected him, they wished the Parliament to rule supreme and the President to be but a mere figure-head. Finally, they agitated for a party cabinet, in which none but their own members would occupy the principal functions. All these schemes were defeated and outmaneuvered by Yuan. Thereupon, at the close of the month of April, a meeting took place in Shanghai, at which it was decided that Yuan should withdraw from office; if he refused, it was resolved to set up a capital in Nanking and fight against him. As a matter of fact Yuan discovered the whole plot and refused, into the bargain, to retire from the provisional Presidency. The issue was therefore a struggle between the Kuomintang party and the pro-Yuan elements; between Young China, idealist, extremist and ambitious, and old China, moderate and conservative, suspicious of the ability of the young bloods and hence excluding them from controlling the State.

At the outset, Yuan prepared to take a strong attitude and prepared to meet the crisis when matters would reach high-fever pitch. For this purpose the quintuple loan—America having withdrawn from the consortium—was hurriedly signed on April 26. The Kuomintang interpreted the step as being a move against it. A storm of opposition was immediately raised and lasted throughout the whole month of May. The Senate, Canton, Shanghai—these two latter places being the great centres of the Kuomintang party—Anhui, Kiangsi, Hunan, all joined in the general agitation. Sun Yat-sen wired to the London and New York papers and appealed to foreign Governments urging them not to float or advance the loan, and adding the threat that, if they did, it would precipitate a terrible civil war. The Powers, who now knew the party and well foresaw the failure of its ambitious aims, despised the threat and remained unmoved. The loan was a triumph for Yuan. He had thus in hand the funds necessary for the impending crisis and could hold his ground against agitation and the criticism of a hostile press; he could also check the growing independence of the provinces and control the situation independently of the Parliament and the revolutionary leaders. The country was, moreover, rescued from the two great dangers which threatened its existence: national bankruptcy and disruption. In advancing the loan, the Powers approved obviously of Yuan's policy and expressed clearly their desire to help him in the work of reorganization and consolidation of the country.

In May a direct challenge was issued to the conspirators. The four Tutuhs (military governors) of Kuang-tung, Hunan, Kiangsi and Anhui were cashiered. All these belonged to the Kuomintang party and did everything in their power to back up the agitators and thwart the policy of the provisional President. This vigorous act was soon followed by a charge against Huang Hsing—the chief military leader of the present rebellion—who was seized at Shanghai and accused of plotting against the President and other high officials in Peking. It was also rumored that he had employed several girl graduates and despatched them North, armed with bombs to assassinate the President. When the charge was examined before the Mixed Court—this deals with crimes and misdemeanors committed within the Settlements—no witness appeared and so the case was dismissed. As a counter move to the activity of the President, the Kuomintang assassinated General Hsu Pao-san (May 24), then commanding the Government troops at Yangchow, in North Kiangsu. Hsu was the sworn enemy of plotters and intriguers, and had recently refused to help the work of the Kuomintang. At the end of May an attempt was made to seize the Shanghai arsenal. One of the leaders was arrested and sent to Peking for trial; another, a colonel of the army, escaped and subsequently took an active part in the rebellion. The plot thus failed, but revealed the schemes of the Kuomintang, who now overtly aimed at taking up arms and starting a rebellion to overthrow Yuan Shi-kai.

The President had followed with watchful gaze the events set forth above and firmly resolved to meet the uprising with armed force. In June, troops were despatched to Wuchang, in Hupeh province, to Kiukiang in Kiangsi and to Shanghai in Kiangsu. Certain strong positions were thus occupied, and this enabled the Government to check the movement from different quarters and keep the enemy divided. When the revolution broke out in Kiangsi the rebels had 30,000 men in the field. Some of these were seasoned troops who had fought a short time before against the Manchus, but the greater part were at most an undisciplined rabble recruited from peasants, coolies, gamblers, brigands and that idle and starving scum that ever floats on the surface of Chinese society. Boys, still in their teens and who had never before handled a musket, were pressed into the ranks. Few knew exactly against whom and for what they were fighting. They had a leader and were promised a good salary—five to six dollars a month—with various chances of plunder and the spoils of war if the issue proved successful. To the commanding officers, Yuan Shi-kai was held up as “a tyrant, a murderer, a traitor to the republican cause.” Some even asserted that they would rather see their country governed by foreigners than by him. This fired up the enthusiasm of all ranks and thus the rebellion was launched on the country.

The question was immediately raised, would Yuan be able to quell the revolt and how long would it take him to do so? Pessimists saw his downfall coming; others floated between fear and hope; there would be slowness in sending reinforcements South and China was never ready. This was indeed true in the past and constituted her great weakness. In the present instance, Yuan had made every preparation and was ready. Behind him he had the powerful army of the North, disciplined, seasoned, loyal and better equipped than the rebel troops. A week after the rebellion broke out, 50,000 men proceeded South to reinforce those already sent forward in June. The Northern soldier is a splendid fighter and during the last two years has ever proved superior to those from the centre and the South. Yuan has, moreover, on his side General Li Yuan-hung, the man who, two years ago, started the revolution against the Manchus. Li has an army of 30,000 men under his control. Thanks to him the rebels cannot concentrate. Around Li are a certain number of tried men, upon whose allegiance Yuan may reckon.

With the North we find also the greater number of the provinces, the entire conservative party of China, the landed gentry and merchant class, and in fact the great mass of the people. Indeed it may be asserted that public opinion is altogether on his side, and this is an invaluable asset which will help him wonderfully in the present crisis.

The recent foreign loan of $125,000,000 will furnish ample funds to carry on the campaign. In China it is an admitted principle that the party with the biggest purses will finally succeed. Add to this the sympathy of the leading Powers, who wish to back him up as the best and ablest man in China.

Considering all these circumstances, we may infer therefrom that Yuan will be able to quell the rebellion. As to the time required to perform this difficult work, it would seem to be possible to do so in about two or three months.

At present the outlook appears already hopeful. Kiangsi—the province where the revolution started—is in the hands of the Government commanders. Li Lih-Kiun, the rebel Tutuh and leader, has fled, his pockets well lined by the generosity of those who were ready to pay any price in order to get rid of him. In Hunan, the forces that had started North, in all the pride of insurrection, have been recalled, and the Chamber of Commerce has taken up the function of general peacemaker. Canton has cancelled its independence and is now under the control of a loyal general. The attacks on the Shanghai arsenal and on the Woosung forts have proved a signal failure for the rebels. A storm-cloud still hangs over Szechuan—the Far West province of China—but it will vanish as soon as the Government troops enter Nanking, which so far is held by the rebels. When this important centre will fall, the revolt may be said to be practically ended, though perhaps not altogether crushed out.

In many ways the present rebellion has been a most sordid affair. Engineered through reckless ambition, greed of gain and vengeance, the influence of the dollar has been paramount throughout. As for its originators, it is impossible to think of them without contempt. Before the cause was launched they ran away and took shelter in Japan, whence they may soon again attempt to retrieve their losses. Yuan Shi-kai has firmly stood his ground and directed the Government campaign with great skill, forethought and preparation. Much credit is also due to the tactics of his generals and to the discipline and bravery of the Northern troops. The rebels miscalculated these circumstances and their error cost them defeat.

English Education Among the Malabar Catholics

A quarter of a century ago the Catholics of Malabar were at a great disadvantage in the matter of English education. Their missionaries were non-English-speaking, and hence the maintenance of English schools became a practical impossibility. Besides, at that time English education had been so identified with Protestantism that Catholic parents viewed it with suspicion, and missionaries prohibited it as opening the way to heresy. In 1887, however, the Syrian Catholics were placed under two separate Vicars Apostolic, Dr. Lavigne, S.J., and Dr. Medlycott, who became the joint pioneers of English education. They lost no time in starting two High Schools at Trichur and Chenganachery, which in course of time were to be made centres of Catholic higher education. An able staff of Jesuit and Italian professors was soon secured, and the two institutions became popular in a few years. The old prejudices against English (because Protestant) education gradually died away, and the other bishops of Malabar followed the example thus set them, and began to open similar schools.

The movement, unhappily, received a set-back in 1896, when the two European Vicars Apostolic were withdrawn. With them went the missionary professors, leaving the schools in the hands of the native Syrian bishops. The latter had no men qualified for educational work among their clergy and, moreover, their pecuniary resources were very limited. Besides there was no teaching body of religious left in the country. Thus the change of bishops, though satisfactory to the Syrians, was in fact a great loss, educationally, to the Catholics of Malabar. However, the new bishops, at considerable sacrifices, maintained the existing institutions and erected new ones to meet the increasing demand for secondary education. At present there are fifteen High Schools, with 5,500 pupils, among a Catholic population of 711,000.

A college under Catholic auspices is a great desideratum in Malabar, and Catholic parents are as a rule averse to sending their children to Government colleges, and rightly so. The education of many a youth is thus prematurely broken off and the intellectual loss resulting to the community is considerable. Moreover, the various offices of the State are only accessible to persons who have received a higher education in English. Catholic parents were thus confronted with the alternative of seeing their children excluded from public offices or of educating them abroad at some sacrifice. Many, of course, chose the latter, and naturally looked to the Jesuit colleges at Trichinopoly and Mangalore, which to the higher education they impart join an excellent Catholic formation. During the last thirty years the number of Catholic youths who leave Malabar in quest of knowledge and religious training has steadily increased and now amounts to nearly two hundred. Of these St. Joseph's College, Trichinopoly, alone claims one hundred and twenty-five, who are recognized as a potent factor in that great institution. Thus once more the Society of Jesus, from outside, trains the Catholic youth of Malabar; and the majority of educated Catholics there are proud to look up to St. Joseph's as their intellectual mother. It must be conceded that the progress in higher education lies chiefly with the Syrian section of the Catholics. Among these there are at present one hundred and fifty persons who have received higher university education in arts and sciences. This figure is surely a creditable one for a quarter of a century. Until now only one Malabar Catholic has taken his degree at an English University, and he is at present the State Geologist of Travancore. Four more are studying in England for various degrees, and the number will surely increase in the future.

A great drawback in the system of Catholic education in Malabar is the lack of priests qualified to teach in the High Schools. And what is worse, most of these schools are obliged to engage non-Christian teachers. This defect is being slowly remedied. For the last few years the Belgian Carmelites and the Jesuit Fathers expelled from Mexico have taken up educational work in Cochin and Travancore. Besides, among the Syrian native clergy especially, English education is making rapid progress. Four candidates for the priesthood have taken their degrees at the Madras University, and eight more are prosecuting higher studies in the various University classes. When the need and importance of such studies for the clergy shall have been realized, more candidates may be expected to follow them. All this announces the dawn of a new era of progress in Catholic education in Malabar. The need, moreover, of a central Catholic college is keenly felt by the bishops and Catholic educationalists, but various causes prevent the cooperation of all for a common establishment. Here and there some individual efforts are being made, and in particular the Vicar Apostolic of Chenganachery is raising funds for the erection of a diocesan college and seminary. A few years must elapse before the scheme materializes. Hence it may safely be said that the withdrawal of the Jesuit missionaries from Malabar seventeen years ago has thrown back the progress of Catholic education in the country by well-nigh quarter of a century.

Meanwhile the Travancore Government is putting all possible obstacles in the way of denominational and chiefly Catholic schools. The tendency of recent legislation is to centralize education in the State. Dr. Mitchel, a Scotch Freemason, is the author of the new code, which has been denounced by the entire people as a black injustice. Owing to the two difficult conditions imposed upon private schools, one hundred and fifty of them have had to be closed during the last five years. The Bishop of Ernakulam in particular had recently the mortification to see his High School, which was built at great cost, refused recognition by the Travancore Government.

Such is a short sketch of the struggle for denominational Catholic education in Malabar. Time alone can decide how far the Catholics will be successful in maintaining and perfecting the present system.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

A New Volume

AMERICA begins with its present number its tenth volume. Profiting by the experience gained during the past four years and a half, the editors now aim to make the paper a better "Catholic review of the week" than ever before. Regarding all current events, questions of the day, topics of the time, and newly published books, which should be of special interest to Catholics, or about which it is important that they should have orthodox views and correct opinions, we hope that our subscribers will find in AMERICA even fuller information and surer guidance than heretofore. Those to whom we are privileged to do this service can show their appreciation in no better way than by making AMERICA more widely known. We are in constant receipt of communications which indicate that there are numerous cities and towns in this country where the readers of AMERICA are much too few. Out of the millions of Catholics now in the United States, thousands who are not yet on our subscription list would read AMERICA with profit and pleasure, if the paper were but brought to their knowledge. But no one can do this for us nearly so well as can our present readers and subscribers. Each number of this week's issue should be accompanied by a complete index of Volume IX.

The Liberals of Mexico

For those who are heart-sick of the never-ending tyranny of what is so grotesquely called the Liberal Party of Continental Europe and of Mexico, the news that came from Washington, on October 2, is as exasperating as it is distressing.

Although it was generally conceded that Gamboa was the man of the hour, free from any suspicions that were fastened on Huerta and destined to bring peace to his distracted country, yet we are told that "the confidential advisers of the President"—we should like to know their names—"have informed him that the hope of Mexico lies in the group of which Mr. Calero and Mr. Magon are leaders, and that General Caranza" [who is now slaughtering his fellow-countrymen to further his personal ambition] "may yet be induced to co-operate with the Liberals against the Clericals at the polls. Indeed Calero and his associates have been in correspondence with the Carranza leaders to bring about a coalition—their opposition to Church domination being the common ground upon which Liberals and Carranzistas may unite."

We feel sure that the sturdy Americanism of the President will flout these "confidential advisers." For if the Monroe Doctrine forbids the interference of European Governments in American affairs on account of the apprehended dangers which their political systems might create, for the same reason the malign influence which constantly controls and characterizes and is the very essence of many of the governments of Continental Europe to-day is most alien to all our national instincts. Assuredly Americans do not want on their borders the Liberalism of France, which is doing its best to expel God from the country; they do not want the Liberalism of Portugal, whose Government is shocking the world by the horrors it is perpetrating; they do not want the Liberalism of Italy, which at the present moment is flinging upon our shores millions of poverty-stricken immigrants who have been deprived of all education and robbed of all religion and who, though naturally an intelligent and domestic people are, in the condition in which they are sent to us, easily made the tools of the worst enemies of society. In brief, Americans do not want the Liberalism that in Europe allies itself with Socialists and Anarchists to regain or retain political power, and do not want in Mexico the Liberalism that is willing to strike hands with a blood-thirsty revolutionist who is ravaging his country and overturning its government, regardless of every dictate of patriotism or even of pity for his followers.

Who are the people that are to be kept out of political life by this revolutionary junta? They are Mexicans, natives of the soil, with long generations behind them of ancestors who have given to Mexico her most splendid monuments and noblest institutions; they include the richest and most cultivated classes, as well as the most reliable elements of the ordinary working people; they are the professional and business men and the conservative family men, high and low, who have everything to gain by the stability of their political institutions, and everything to lose by these incessant revolutions which are making them the mockery of the world and hastening the ruin and perhaps the conquest of their nation.

It certainly is not true that the intention of the Catholic party is to dominate the Government. As the New York Tribune says in its issue of September 15, "there aim is not to bring about any modification in the separation of Church and State, or in the freedom of worship for all denominations, but they want the Church in Mexico placed on the same footing as in the United States, so that the religious Orders may be sanctioned by law, and the laws against outdoor religious services relaxed, which were so extreme under the Diaz régime that even the reading of the burial service at the graveside was prohibited." In a word, they want to put an end to the tyrannical Liberalism of Porfirio Diaz, which these plotters of the present day in Mexico, in Washington, and in Europe propose to perpetuate.

Will not every fairminded man say that they are right? Will not every self-respecting American support them in their claim, and denounce the traitors who are making a shambles of their country that they may rule? Are Catholics, because they are Catholics, though they represent not only the majority, but the very best elements of the nation, to be debarred from having any voice whatever in the government of their country? The Tribune does not hesitate to say that "the Catholics in a free and fair election could carry every State except perhaps Vera Cruz." All that President Wilson wants is a "free and fair election," and we are sure that, as far as in him lies, Mexico will have it.

K. G. V. versus Y. M. C. A.

In connection with the Kolping Centenary we have already described in a previous issue of AMERICA the Journeymen's Associations founded by him. These societies, whose centre is at Cologne, have likewise extended to the United States, and branches exist at New York, Dayton, Paterson, Chicago, St. Paul and Kansas City. They are doing for Catholics, in a more thorough and effective way, the work which the Y. M. C. A. is striving to do among the young workingmen of our country. Like their Protestant rival, they largely depend, at least in their initial stage, upon donations for support, since their work is one of Catholic charity. Unfortunately, while it is easy to collect in a short campaign hundreds of thousands of dollars in the interest of the Y. M. C. A., it is a far more difficult task to obtain the means for erecting the necessary quarters and hospices for a Catholic society, although its work is ever so much more perfect and important.

It is the occasion of the silver jubilee of the New York branch of the Society of Catholic Mechanics—Katholischer Gesellen-Verein—which prompts the present notice. Its object, in common with that of all the Kolping societies, is thus briefly stated by its founders: "Our organization exists not merely for the purpose of social amusement, but makes an honest effort to contribute its share towards improving the lot of the working class by offering young laborers a comfortable home, good board at a reasonable price, wholesome entertainment, and also instruction and inspiration for self-education." Considering the dangers which surround the young mechanic who is cast upon a large city to seek his livelihood, without a home to which he can return for comfort and encouragement when the day's work is done, we cannot overestimate the value of such foundations for the Church and for the laborer in the present conditions of society.

"I am more than pleased," writes Cardinal Farley, "to learn of the progress being made by the Society of Catholic Mechanics, an international institution of several hundred thousand workingmen, who, under the guidance of the Church, are united together for the protection of its members against the evil influence of irreligion, socialism and kindred dangerous teachings, which rampant to-day, under the pretext of bettering the laboring man, seek only to undermine Catholic faith, the Christian family and the State.

"Such an organization is, indeed, more than ever necessary, and has my hearty approval. I wish it every success, and commend it to all those who may be able to aid it in enlarging its sphere of usefulness, and especially in enabling the New York branch of this excellent society to erect the new and large building now being planned."

This building, whose cornerstone was recently laid, is to contain more than one hundred beds, and to be thoroughly equipped for all the purposes of the society. It is to be six stories in height, and is being erected at a cost of eighty thousand dollars, independently of the price of the ground on which it is to stand. The fact that only a small portion of this great outlay is covered by the donations made, has not daunted the generous souls who have pledged themselves to this work. They trust, under God's Providence, upon the timely assistance of their fellow-Catholics to help them complete what they have so nobly begun. God's blessing rests upon this work and upon all who give it their support. To rescue and protect our young Catholic workingmen is to rescue and protect the Catholic families of which they are to be the future heads; it is to save, through their instrumentality, countless others and to infuse once more the spirit of Catholicity into the industrial life of our day. May Catholics learn the lesson which our Protestant brethren have taught us in ever rallying to the support of their Y. M. C. A., whose best features had long been anticipated by the Kolping societies. But all comparison would here be out of place, since the truly supernatural charity and the intelligent love for the laboring classes, which are the soul and life of these associations, can nowhere be equalled outside of the Catholic Church.

Our National Bureau of Education Again

Some weeks ago, commenting on an article which had appeared in the Cincinnati Catholic Telegraph, in which our National Bureau of Education was sharply criticised, AMERICA admitted that there was excellent reason for much of the feeling manifested by the writer. There was instanced, in particular, his complaint that in the various reports sent out by the Bureau scant attention is paid to the Catholic school system of the country, admittedly "the strongest religious fact in the United States to-day," and that equally scant regard is exhibited for Catholic educational activities outside the country. Plenty of space, nevertheless, is found for a recital of the Carnegie Fund achievements and similar private enterprises here at home, and eulogistic references are scattered broadcast in favor of such irreligious institutions as the Ferrer schools and like enterprises abroad. "Some one thought well to call us to task for this statement, and to insist that the Bureau is an entirely fair-minded body that would be glad to publish sympathetic reports of Catholic sentiment and progress in school work were such reports available. Is our correspondent's claim quite correct?"

Washington Press writers, on September 26, telegraphed to their home papers throughout the country the synopsis of a discussion stimulated by the publication of reports sent out by the United States Bureau of Education. The topic was that very delicate one of the teaching of sex hygiene in schools. The Washington correspondence admitted that "wide difference of opinion exists among school men, ranging from a detailed plan of sex instruction, beginning in the elementary schools, to a determined opposition to any form of sex education whatever." Yet, it continues, "in the opinion of Dr. Claxton, of the Bureau of Education, the question of sex hygiene is about to assume great importance in many school systems." Thereupon we were told of the appropriation of money in certain cities to provide lectures to parents and to groups of high school pupils, with the idea ultimately to extend instruction to the elementary schools, if the experiment with the older pupils proves satisfactory. Teachers in New York and other cities, it was said, are enabled to spread the story of their success in incorporating sex instruction into elementary work in biology; the United States Government, through the medium of the Bureau, we presume, has helped to distribute a leaflet on the subject; and the outline plan prepared by the American Federation of Sex Hygiene, regarded as the most careful study yet devised for sex education at every stage of life, both in school and at home, is warmly commended.

Meantime, beyond vague generalities, little is found in the reports of the "stimulated discussion" to remind us of the tremendous and widespread sentiment against the filthy thing. Dr. Claxton, were he minded to use the information, could surely not have been unaware of the protests which have been published in newspapers and magazines throughout the country against such instruction in the schools. The reports issued to the press correspondents in Washington practically ignore all these. They tell us, it is true, of a fear filling "the mind of many thinkers" that danger lurks in such instruction, and they instance one of these thinkers, quoting what he himself would probably term the least substantial argument advanced in a brilliant paper. Why could not place be found, in the information handed out by Dr. Claxton, for the outspoken stand taken by the strong Catholic Federation in its meeting at Milwaukee last September?

"We regard with abhorrence the introducing into the schools the study of sex hygiene. We look upon it as a mischievous and immoral proposal designed to defeat the very purpose which its well-meaning but ill-advised advocates have in view.

"In so pronouncing the Federation voices, we believe, the sentiment of 99 out of every 100 Catholics in the country, if not the whole."

Was there no place suitable for the splendid sentiment underlying the utterance recently made in a letter to the Public Ledger of Philadelphia? "Not only Catholics, but millions of others, firmly attached to the moral principles which inculcate modesty and decorum, refuse to be swept into the current of 'new thought' which is bearing many from their old moorings into unknown seas."

Socialism in Germany

The eyes of the world are fixed upon the Social Democratic Party of Germany. Men hope to obtain from it some intimation of the course which Socialism will in all probability take in the future. The death of Bebel and the Jena Congress have excited anew the curiosity of students of social and political conditions. Revisionism, it is clear, has scored a triumph over radicalism. But this is not a matter of rejoicing. Of the two forms of Socialism, the former, representing the more conservative tendencies of the party, is by far the more dangerous. It is a wide departure from the strict Marxism of old, and with its medley of compromises is likely to attract a vast number of men whom a more radical form of Socialism would repel. Both movements are equally opposed to religion and equally determined to sweep away the present social order. But revisionism, while gradually absorb the irreligious elements within the nation who are not prepared as yet for more radical measures. While the death of Bebel has deprived the party of its most efficient leader, it has at the same time strengthened the revisionist forces, who are using the tactics of social reformers to prepare the minds of men for a more complete radicalism. Upon the same principles revisionism is gaining ground in America. In every case it is only revolutionary Socialism in a more insidious and dangerous form.

We may well say that the Social Democracy of Germany has not yet reached its climax with its four and a quarter million of voters. It is true that a temporary stagnation has set in. This may be largely due to the exaggerated hopes which German Socialists had built upon the 110 Socialist members elected to the Reichstag. After all the high promises held out to the voters, nothing whatever has been accomplished. This fact, however, is not sufficient to undeceive the great number of those who seek their heaven upon earth and hold that Socialism alone can bestow it upon them. Should Germany ever be attacked by a foreign Power and suffer a reverse, the red flag, it is thought, would be hoisted at once. Socialists themselves have made this confession. Revisionism is only the fire smouldering beneath the ashes, while radicalism is the full glow of the flame. For both alike the great multitudes of irreligious workers are fuel and tinder.

More Dynamiting

New revelations of dynamiting outrages on the part of structural iron workers have been made. Again we must emphasize the fact that it is only a single union which is involved, and that the members themselves of this union are not to be held responsible for the secret misdeeds of officials. But we must likewise insist that more harm has been done to the union cause by the attitude of certain labor leaders in connection with preceding disclosures than by the dynamiting itself. The excuses offered by them, and the protection extended to men whose guilt had been sufficiently evidenced to arouse at least the gravest suspicions, afforded one of the saddest incidents in the history of American labor unionism. The attitude assumed that the unions must hamper the process of investigation and proclaim the innocence of the men until they had been legally convicted was entirely unjustifiable. It is the duty of the Federation to look to the common welfare, and this requires that every effort should be made to discover the authors of the heinous and abnormal crimes which have been committed. It is not only the welfare of society, but the welfare of the unions themselves which demands that such action be taken. In the interest of the American Federation of Labor we hope that American workmen will insist upon the most thorough investigation on the part of the unions themselves to cleanse the labor movement of the criminals who are squandering the hard-earned wages of the toilers only to bring discredit upon their cause.

In a just stricture on "many of the stern young moralists who are winning fame by their pictures in our magazines," Collier's observes that "their people are gawky, greasy, febrile and mean; they are doing contemptible things in a graceless animal sort of fashion; their backgrounds are dingy, tawdry, and slovenly or unsanitary. Life is shown in the guise of the thriftless seeker after low pleasures. . . . The life of a great and eager city is all about them—you can see courtesy in the subway and devotion to duty in many a dingy shop, but they prefer the manners and labors of the roof garden."

"But is not that just the sort of thing the people want?" would doubtless be the surprised query of the publishers. In other words as few as possible must escape the debasing, vulgarizing influence of the cheap magazine. For those who are too young, too illiterate or too busy to read such periodicals can at least "enjoy the pictures."

THE WORLD'S PEACE PALACE

With the blare of trumpets and with stately ceremonial, last August 28th, the great Temple of Peace was opened at The Hague. The Queen of Holland, the Queen Dowager, Prince Henry, and a large host of invited notabilities of all nations, including Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Carnegie, were there to add weight and splendor to the occasion. The Palace is located on a slight eminence at one of the city's most beautiful points, the road to Scheveningen, Holland's most fashionable coast resort. The plot, covering about twenty acres and valued at three-quarters of a million gulden, was donated by the Government of The Netherlands. The palace itself is pronounced a monument to modern architectural art, imposing in size, gorgeous in construction, and rich and tasteful in its various embellishments. A million dollars was provided by Mr. Carnegie for the sole work of construction. The structure is flanked on two sides by enormous towers of uneven height, while a graceful turret surmounts the center of the roof. The material is red stone, with grey facings, in Renaissance style. The façade shows an imposing portico, with a number of handsome statues placed in niches and culminating in the figure of Justice on the top of the main entrance.

Broad and sweeping steps lead up to the portals, an iron scrollwork, the gift of Germany, and massive bronze doors, the gift of Belgium, give admittance to the interior. Inside, with its extended archways and colonnaded corridors, the Palace presents a cloister-like appearance, the more so on account of the subdued light that filters in through the enormous stained-glass windows. The vestibule, resplendent with multi-colored marble, holds the monumental grand stairway, presented by the municipality of The Hague, whose coat of arms surmounts a pair of huge bronze candelabra at its base. The heavy-mullioned stained-glass windows of this portion of the building are of Dutch manufacture and were donated by the Dutch Government. The ground floor is mainly occupied by a vast assembly room and another one of smaller size, both with heavily paneled walls, richly decorated ceilings and a judges' platform, is for the members of the International Court of Arbitration. The second floor, equally elaborate in construction and tasteful in ornamentation, is given up to administrative halls and offices. It also contains the library, reading-room and numerous private apartments for the members of the Court and the attending officials. At the top landing of the great stairway on a raised platform stands a large marble group finished in bronze and representing "Peace due to Right," the gift of the Government of the United States. At this same point, also on a balustrade, is seen a bronze replica of the statue of Christ, as it appears on the summit of the Andes, between Chili and Peru, commemorating the peace between those two countries. The Queen of Holland has personally acknowledged this gift by sending Madame Angela de Costa, of Chili, her portrait, with her Majesty's signature and the further inscription: Le Christ avant tout (Christ before all).

The English Government presented the stained-glass windows picturing the "Golden Age" of mankind that adorn the larger court room on the ground floor, the rich carpet for which was donated by the Government of Turkey. The Gobelin tapestry covering the entire walls of the smaller court room is the gift of the French Republic, while the Japanese Government has donated the mural paintings of Oriental splendors that cover the walls of the council room on the second floor. Many other nations, as, for instance, Austria, Russia, Italy, China, etc., have contributed towards the furnishings of the Palace, the tout ensemble of which forms a collection as valuable and beautiful as it is rare in all history. A mere tour of inspection throughout the vast edifice is said to take fully one hour's time. The extensive grounds in which the Palace is located have been laid out in the best style of English landscape gardening and are embellished with costly fountains and statuary galore.

The several speeches at the opening ceremony were not the least remarkable for their lack of optimism such as the place and the occasion would naturally suggest. The claims put forward and the hopes indulged in by the various officials were modest in the extreme. Thus Jonkheer Van Karnbeek, President of the Carnegie Institute, explained the structure was called Peace Palace because everything transacted within its walls would have a tendency towards maintaining universal peace. As to the nature of the Court of Arbitration, he stated, the whole procedure hinged on the free consent of the various Governments, on their honor and good faith. Should an appeal to force be required to support the Court's decrees, such an appeal necessarily would jeopardize the entire proceedings. At any rate, in minor disputes between nations the Court would afford substantial benefits, whereas the present international movement is the best effort in the direction of universal peace that so far has ever been attempted. Jonkheer Van Swinderen, Secretary of Foreign Affairs, to whose office the custody of the Palace has been entrusted, put the question: Is the Peace Palace really going to fulfil its high mission? Not at all, he replied, if it is assumed as the beginning of "eternal" peace, which would only fit as an inscription on a cemetery gate; but decidedly Yes, in the sense of what humanly speaking is capable of realization! An elaborate dinner, at which Mr. Carnegie was the guest of honor and where he once more ventilated his ideas on peace, concluded the opening proceedings. On the whole, Holland, and its residential city in particular, have been enriched with a most gorgeous and unique show-place that is sure to draw for all the years to come the sightseeing-traveler from far and near. LITERATURE

Autobiography of George Dewey, Admiral of the Navy. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

The hero of Manila had intended this work to be posthumous. Fortunately some friends persuaded him to change his mind, and so the pleasure of reading this most interesting memoir need not be marred by regrets that he is no longer among us. The warrior whose persistent youth interfered so frequently with his promotion deserves a protracted and peaceful old age, with all his laurels upon him, and his countrymen will thank him for the book.

At twenty-four he was fighting his way with Farragut up the Mississippi as executive officer of one of the old wooden steamers, and though he succeeded in passing the forts that defended New Orleans, his ship was riddled with balls and set on fire when he tried to follow the Admiral up to Port Hudson. The story of those two terrible battles, which were fought in the dead of night in the narrow confines of a swift and dangerous river, is more interesting than any novel, and the straightforward, simple style in which the features of the fight are described gives one a very vivid idea of the horrors of a war for which neither side was prepared. The capture of Fort Fisher, in which the redoubtable General Butler figured so ingloriously, is also told. Unpreparedness there also wrought havoc. Those were not the days of armored cruisers, but of "old tubs," as Dewey describes some of the ships, and the discipline of the sailors still felt the influence of the superannuated sea captains who had fought in the war of 1812. Some were still in service, and their only idea of a naval contest was to run alongside the enemy, board her, and then win by a hand-to-hand contest with the cutlass on the deck. Dewey had the advantage when the war was over of being appointed Chief of the Bureau of Equipment of the Navy Department and consequently of making a most exhaustive study of every part of the new instruments of destruction. He is thus a link between the old and the new in naval warfare.

His story of the capture of Manila is very complete and very satisfying for the general reader, and doubtless also for those who were and are technically interested in the handling of modern battleships. He entered the harbor at night and was forcibly reminded of the old days on the Mississippi, though the Spaniards, unlike the Southerners, made no use of their shore batteries, which, if properly equipped, might have made the victory not so easy of accomplishment. The ruin of the Spanish fleet was brought about with tragic suddenness almost before the victors were aware of it themselves. His skill in avoiding complications with Germany is worthy of all praise. The capture of the city followed a short time afterwards, and then Dewey came home to enjoy the triumph which his countrymen gladly accorded him.

The New Testament. Vol. III. St. Paul's Epistles to the Churches. Part I. The Epistle to the Thessalonians. By the Reverend CUTHBERT LATTEY, S.J. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. 40 cents.

This is the first instalment of a translation of the Bible from the original tongues, which will be issued under the general editorship of Rev. Cuthbert Lattey, S.J., Professor of Scripture at St. Benno's, North Wales, and Rev. Joseph Keating, S.J., editor of the Month. Father Lattey translates Thessalonians in a very scholarly way. The text of Westcott-Hort is generally followed. The Greek of St. Paul is very closely adhered to and intelligently rendered. Perhaps it is this faithful adherence to the sentence-structure of St. Paul, which is itself very unwieldy, that has occasioned an unwieldiness and a lack of smoothness in Father Lattey's translation. The notes are generally illuminating and the appendix on the eschatology of St. Paul is excellent.

It is unfortunate that this fascicle and the prospective work have been offered to the public as a standard translation for English-speaking Catholics. Had the new version of Thessalonians appeared modestly as one of many such, the criticisms it has met with would not have been so severe.

Modesty should have prevented, for instance, the remark that Father Prat and Father Cornely "agree with our view both as to the reading and as to St. Paul's doctrine," I Cor. xv, 51. For we find that it is Father Lattey, rather, who agrees very considerably with Father Prat's excellent "Theologie de St. Paul."

In the note on I Thes. iv, 17, the exposition of this passage given by the present writer in "The Catholic Encyclopedia" (s.v. "Thessalonians") is called "an ingenious attempt lately made to avoid the necessity of considering the Apostle unenlightened" about the time of the Parousia. No such attempt is made. The article expressly says: "We readily admit that St. Paul did not know the time of the Parousia." The writer merely essayed to explain I Thes. iv, 17, in a sense that is not false. The Greek reads: "We the living, the left over, shall be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord" on the last day. We hold that the Greek may be construed as conditional,—"We, if we be alive,—if we be left on earth,—shall be taken up," etc. This explanation Father Lattey flings aside most unceremoniously: "If the subject of the participle were indefinite and in the third person, it might indeed be taken conditionally. . . . But this rendering is impossible where the subject is definite. Dr. Moulton's remarks do not cover and doubtless are not meant to cover this case" (p. 18). Modesty would have been less sweeping. We refer Father Lattey to Elephantine Papyrus 13 (B. C. 222), in which the first person is definite and yet is construed with a participle conditionally. In the case in point, the first person is indefinite; for such construction we refer to Gal. ii, 18, and I Cor. x, 30. In this matter of St. Paul's eschatology, we regret to see that Father Lattey seems to hold that St. Paul erred in what he wrote (cf. Note 17, p. 8; and p. 18). Catholics insist that St. Paul cannot have said the Parousia would be during his lifetime. Had he said so, he would have erred; the inspired word of God would have erred; the error would be that of the Holy Spirit more than of St. Paul. Some of Father Lattey's notes are rather cloudy. For example, the text reads, II Thes. iii, 15, "And do not regard him as an enemy, but admonish him as a brother." This simple and clear thought is explained by the not very luminous note: "The social and religious ostracism of the contumacious Christian should yet be tempered by zeal for his salvation," and on page 6, note 6, where we read "as is plain from the context both before and after," and on page 14, note 3, "the personal use appears to be intended in the Our Father (Matt. vi, 13), of which we probably have a reminiscence here, and where, as here, the Greek admits of either sense."

Father Lattey's experiment, we hope, will succeed and thus give Catholics a complete English commentary on the Bible. Once such a start is made there will be other works in interpretation published; and we shall not be obliged to go to Latin, French or German for the exposition of a text of sacred Scripture.

WALTER DRUM, S.J.

Wonderful Escapes by Americans. Arranged and Edited by WILLIAM STONE BOOTH. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Co. $2.00.

There is such an abundance of very unreal fiction being written and read nowadays that it is refreshing to meet occasionally a book of facts, like this one, which are just as interesting as those countless "stories of adventure." Mr. Booth has selected from authentic accounts of hair-breadth escapes Americans have had during the course of our country's history twenty-two varied and "thrilling" narratives. These are escapes from shipwreck, Indians, pirates, British, slave-holders, Confederates, a forest fire, a tornado, a crevasse, an entangled diving bell, etc. Sometimes the story is told with no great literary skill, but in a plain, straightforward fashion that carries conviction. The chapter entitled "Foiling the Bush-Whackers" would make an excellent Pacificist tract. The editor says that he has "confined his work to the simplifying, condensing and classification of each narrative," and has thoroughly succeeded, as he purposed, in presenting the reader with "an unhackneyed series of engrossing and true stories." We should have more books of this kind.

Napoleon. By HERBERT FISHER. New York: Henry Holt & Co. 50 cents.

This small book of about 250 pages is a clear, succinct, well written and unbiassed account of Napoleon Bonaparte's meteoric career. The writer properly concludes that the great warrior was a man without either religious instincts or religious information. Where religion of any kind helped his ambitious projects he favored it; where it did not, he crushed it, or tried to do so. For him it was merely one of the departments, or instrumentalities of his Empire, but that lack of intellectual development was the cause of his downfall. His failure to understand that Pius VII was not merely the ruler of an impoverished principality, but a spiritual power that could arouse the conscience of the world, prompted him to inaugurate a series of measures which, "had the Empire endured for ten more years," says the writer, "it is possible that the Catholic communities of the American continent would have been obliged to sever their connection with a Church so degraded and transformed." Of course, "the Catholic communities of the American continent" could never have had the slightest fear that ten or a hundred years of Napoleonic tyranny would have ever "transformed the Church." They knew that, like many another enemy, Napoleon was sure to go to pieces on the Rock. With regard to the divorce of Josephine, the author does not ascribe it to the Pope, but to the Bishop's Court at Paris, which "with a grander audacity than the Senate which decreed that the marriage was dissolved, decided that it had never taken place at all." About Jerome's marriage with Miss Patterson, only the fact is recorded, as well as Napoleon's insolence in refusing to recognize it. On the whole, the book is extremely interesting, and has a good gripping style which never allows the reader to grow weary.

Little Pilate and Other Spanish Stories. By REV. LUIS COLOMA, S.J. Translated by E. M. BROOKES. New York: P. J. Kenedy & Sons. 80 cents.

Gabriel, a handsome young student of Seville University, had been often warned by Father Velasco, his Jesuit confessor, to keep in mind the career of Pontius Pilate. "Avoid evil companions and dangerous friends, my son, for human respect will be your ruin!" So it proved, for the first and best of the six tales in this book is the story of how the once innocent Gabriel sank, during the space of twenty-four hours, deeper and deeper into the mire of sin, just because he could not endure being laughed at by the roystering young Spaniards whose company he was afraid to leave. After a night of adventure, Gabriel comes to himself in a hospital, a disgraceful place apparently for a well-born Castilian to be. Then having been shriven by Father Velasco, he determines to be a "Little Pilate" no more.

Another story tells of a beautiful custom a noble Spanish family had of providing for a poor infant every Christmas in honor of the Christ-Child. All the stories are edifying and one is quite sensational. Father Coloma's deft touch is often discernible, but the tales probably delighted their first readers more than they will American Catholics.

In the Catholic World for October there is a strong protest against the "prurient discussions that occupy the pages of many of our so-called popular magazines." The writer pleads earnestly with his readers to fight the evil by personal example, by public protest and by every means in their power. "An unhappy sign," he says, "for those who would promote innocence and virtue is the alarming indifference of many to the widespread propaganda of indecent and evil things. Can they be so dense as not to recognize it, or so short-sighted in the matter of Christian responsibility as not to see that they are obliged to prevent an evil in so far as they can? To advertise in a magazine that deliberately cultivates immorality; to purchase it; to read it, is sinful co-operation in sinful work." He then speaks of the indecent pictures and the "plain talk of filthy things" which he found in a recent number of a "popular" magazine with a large circulation, and comes to the conclusion that "in such a Niagara of filth there can be no other purpose than to allure the reader by the appeal to things forbidden, things that arouse the animal passions, and thus make the magazine sell. No sensible person would even pretend that this was literature; that there was art here; that any of these writers aimed honestly to express an honest soul. Black will always be black, and white, white. And the necessity of championing what is white is becoming more and more urgent, because unprincipled men, with money at their command, are sowing through the alluring pages of the cheap magazines the seeds of hell upon earth."

"Calm Yourself," a fifty-cent brochure by G. L. Walton, M.D. (Houghton, Mifflin Co.), presents in very readable and humorous form a number of sensible reasons why we should never worry, or at least why we should "try and approximate the ideal of fretless, fussless and unworrying poise." The ideal's attainment requires the use of medicines he does not mention, but those he gives are sound, practical, and pleasingly coated.

Another Houghton-Mifflin book is "A Confederate Girl's Diary," by Sarah Morgan Dawson. The price is $2.00, and it is worth it to those who like to know the feelings and experiences of the Southern home folks during the Civil War. It is a real diary, written by a clever and observant Louisiana girl, from March, 1862, to May, 1865, without any thought of publication, and this adds greatly to its intrinsic value apart from its historical interest. The personal revelations are usually worth while, and show that even in the throes of war many "Seceshes" had a saner viewpoint than "Yankees" gave them credit for.

The Apostleship of Prayer, 801 West 181st Street, New York, has out the "Almanac of the Sacred Heart" for 1914. Tastefully printed in color are numerous scenes from Our Lord's life. There is a wealth of information about the character and practical working of the League and the usual abundance of fervorinos, anecdotes and stories. Twelve cents a copy.

THE DRAMA

The decay of morals and the decline of religion always go hand in hand. To the observer of the conditions of the modern stage it was evident that, following close on the systematic effort that is being made to deaden the sense of public decency, an attempt would also be made to throw ridicule on all religious belief. It was not surprising, therefore, that a play called "Russia" was presented at the Princess Theatre, which portrayed a schismatical Russian priest of revolutionary sympathies whose appearance suggested that of Christ. He is pursued by the police and takes refuge in a bagnio, where one of the dissolute women who is supposed to be crazy devotes herself to reading the Bible. He is discovered, dragged out by the officers and crucified. All the inmates of the bagnio are then butchered. Another play called "The Eternal Mystery" has as its theme that all the so-called ocular evidences of anthropomorphic religion are the outcome of superstition and coincidence. An atheist is dying of galloping consumption. His wife, a devoutly sentimental woman, implores him to "believe" before it is too late. He refuses to lie even to please her on his deathbed, and demands proof. The curtains are drawn back, admitting the sunlight. This projects upon the wall the shadow of a cross-shaped candelabrum. "Look!" exclaims the wife. The man is not deceived, but knocks the candelabrum over and the shadow vanishes. A moment later another shadow, this time apparently of a real cross and of supernatural origin, appears on the same spot on the wall. The man staggers to his feet, gasping out: "I believe! Forgive!" and sinks back dead. Just then a child runs in with a kite, crying: "Oh, mother, see what a funny shadow my kite makes on the wall."

These two plays were discarded by the managers after one exhibition as unfit for the public, yet the Globe, which caters especially to school teachers, denounces this withdrawal as the act of a set of lunatics, and wonders why a piece that was published in the Smart Set without arousing any protest could not be represented on the stage. That the Smart Set publishes things that disgust even hardened first nighters may, we hope, give a twinge to what is left of the consciences of certain well-to-do Catholics who are not ashamed to display that publication on their library tables.

It would appear that a letter to Mayor Kline from Mr. Edward Feeny, Chairman of the Committee on Public Morals of the American Federation of Catholic Societies, had something to do with the withdrawal of the offensive plays. He denounced them as a "riot of moral filth, gruesomeness and infidelity that would seem to call for an investigation by the Police Commissioner." But though the chief offenders were debarred as too utterly gross, three others were permitted. One was "The Black Mask," which our guide of the Globe, who discards scruples, describes as "a ghastly tale of cruel vengeance," and "The Bride," which he considers "a mildly wicked little comedy"; the third he does not mention, probably because it was "En Deshabille."

The French have a saying that "qui s'excuse s'accuse." So when the Sociological Fund Committee "disclaims any desire for salacious treatment of the subjects dealt with" it looks very like a subconscious admission of guilt, and we are puzzled to know why a Sociological Society needs a Fund Committee when its purpose is to arouse a public sentiment that must ultimately result in new and more humane legislation.

"For the first time in dramatic history," it says, "the perplexing problem of the limitation of offspring, now engaging the attention of all thoughtful eugenists and sociologists the world over, is dealt with on the stage in the play we are to produce."

"The right of the child to be well born, a right which even in this day does not seem to be taken into consideration by the parents, and the right of the mother to choose whether and when she shall give birth to her child, are problems the solution of which will be a great step toward the betterment of social and economic conditions throughout the world, a step which will mean the elimination of much poverty, crime and disease."

In other words, these self-constituted saviors of society indulge the hope of inducing our legislators to commit what humanity has always hitherto considered to be a crime, and to make sure of that result they propose to pervert the public conscience by dramatizing "subjects that have never before been dealt with on the stage"—a claim that may be admitted if we except the indecent dances of the American aborigines. Indeed, the modern theatre furnishes an excellent argument against evolution. It marks a return to savagery.

We are alarmed at times by the menace of the mobs who are hurling bombs, dynamiting buildings and denouncing in fiery speeches the present order of society, but no crazy I. W. W. or wild-eyed anarchist was ever half so dangerous as these mad theorists who are driving out decency from public and private life under the pretence of virtue and a desire to uplift humanity.

EDUCATION

"Is the College Making Good?"—Mr. Bok and His Critics

The Outlook of August 16 published an article by Mr. Edward Bok, under the title "Is the College Making Good?" which evidently attracted the attention it sought to arouse among teachers in colleges. These are not minded to accept without question the conclusions drawn by the writer of the Outlook article. Almost without exception the letters that have appeared in the newspapers in answer to his indictment of the ignorance of college students show a disposition on the part of college teachers to criticize some of the main assumptions put forward by Mr. Bok and to hold him radically mistaken and decidedly unfortunate in his attack upon the efficiency of the higher schools of the country. The Outlook itself, in the issue of August 30, prints a few of these letters, which may be said to be typical of the rejoinders that appeared in the press of the country.

Thomas C. Brown, of the Bryn Mawr College faculty, practically charges Mr. Bok with a failure to distinguish between "real education" and mere "materialistic training." And he appears to be right. Like the Chicago business man who, a few years ago, won a certain measure of notoriety through his addresses on the futility of higher schooling, Mr. Bok, says this critic, "seems to assume that the prime object of a college should be to prepare young men for successful business careers." But, he asks, "is that the object for which the college was created and for which they are now carried on?" It used to be universally admitted that "the end of education is the development of intelligence," and it was once considered a truism to affirm that every diligent human being of even moderate capacity becomes more intelligent by means of school or college training than he would have been or perhaps could have been without it. And as Professor Brown well observes, the standard dictionaries seem to agree with this view. One, the Century Dictionary, defines education to be: "the imparting or acquisition of knowledge; mental and moral training; cultivation of the mind, feelings and manners. Education in a broad sense, with reference to man, comprehends all that disciplines and enlightens the understanding, corrects the temper, cultivates the taste, and forms the manners and habits." Webster's definition accentuates similar elements in its description of what education implies: "The totality of the qualities acquired through individual instruction and social training, which further the happiness, efficiency and capacity for social service of the educated."

Mr. Bok, says his Bryn Mawr critic, ignores all this and appears "to consider that the dollars and cents standard is the only standard by which the practical results and efficiency of a college training are to be measured." And, urges another critic, Professor Robert H. Fletcher of Grinnell College, Iowa, "it is precisely this sympathy in the present widespread and persistent effort to substitute for real education a materialistic training in so-called 'practical things' against which most college teachers will chiefly protest." "As a mere matter of national economy," wrote Dr. Andrew F. West, of the Princeton University Graduate School, in his splendid paper on "Vocational Training, a Menace to Universities," published two years ago, "and quite apart from its overwhelming moral importance, it 'pays' a nation to have as many as possible of its citizens educated 'in something more' than breadwinning. It 'pays' to have well-educated men in great abundance . . . for the measureless material benefits which flow from the spread of intelligence and enlightenment. It is this 'something more' which in the last analysis makes the difference between the higher and lower forms of civilization."

No one doubts the necessity of fitting college men to be efficient home-makers and good citizens. But it is quite as obvious that, if we are not to change totally the traditional view of what is essential in college formation, vocational training must not be placed in a relation which destroys or even menaces the liberal arts and sciences—the very soul of the totality of qualities needed to further the happiness, efficiency and capacity for social service of the educated. Professor Fletcher's letter to the Outlook contends that the particular, the practical, the immediately useful are now receiving plenty of emphasis in college courses, and the writer even hesitates not to hint that these subjects are driving out of the college the greater studies indispensable to the higher civilization. "The most essential thing for the colleges to-day," he writes, "is the effective realization that higher education should consist mainly of just that thing of which Mr. Bok seems contemptuous, namely, the liberal culture which gives breadth of vision and ideals, and which, among other results, creates dissatisfaction with our actual 'practical' life of largely meaningless, wasteful, and selfish activity."

All this does not mean, the critics of Mr. Bok further agree, that an education of liberal culture unfits men and women for taking part in "practical" life as it does exist. It would, indeed, be difficult to prove that the "practical" inefficiency claimed to have place among young college graduates, however serious it may actually be, is the fault of college training. At any rate, Mr. Bok does not prove it. "To determine," writes Professor Brown of Bryn Mawr, "whether or not our colleges are making good in imparting to young men and women an education such as the college essentially aims to give, Mr. Bok obtains 549 letters from young men and women about to graduate from college, and subjects them to a process of grading by a high school teacher to find out how "they would stand in a simple test for composition, grammar, spelling, punctuation, and more particularly to examine the thought and the quality of the English." It may be conceded, he continues, to be an unquestioned fact that many of our college graduates are deficient in the elements of language and in the ability to spell correctly and to write legibly, but is the college to blame? The art of writing and spelling is supposed to be mastered before entering college. Every applicant is presumed to have passed a stiff test in English before he is admitted to college. "If," says still another critic, "he allows himself to become careless and if he forgets what he has learned in his preparatory course, the college cannot be held any more accountable than if he forgets his arithmetic or any other elementary branch." The answer is ordinarily a proper one, yet it loses some of its force when a condition, unhappily common enough to-day, finds verification among us. Because of the pressure by colleges for high examination standards in an unnecessary multiplicity of branches in secondary schools, these latter not unfrequently send boys up to college without that fundamental training in English which should be received in the lower schools. Yet it were unfair to put the total burden of blame upon either college or high school. There is an eminently sane letter in the Outlook budget of correspondence which deplores another element undoubtedly leading to the slovenly English so many young college and high school students use in our time—"the present-day mental poison brought into homes by undesirable literature,"—it is a mild term to express what is intended—"which undermines the best intentions and groundwork of our youth."

When it comes to the consideration of what really belongs to college training—formal composition and the thought and quality of English, the Outlook's critics appear to concede a point to Mr. Bok. Some of the examples cited by him, say they, are far from what one would expect from a college senior. Yet even in this, it is claimed, his deductions are too general. College training is supposed by no one to turn out a finished scholar. The aim it proposes is simply this: to discipline and enlighten all the powers of man to such degree that it is possible for those who have been privileged to enjoy it to pass out from the direction and supervision of their instructors and take up the task of completing their education by individual effort and independent work. "If," writes Professor Brown, "the college has so trained and equipped them that they can do this, and do it well, then the college has made good, whether or not their post-graduate letters and theses were perfect in composition, grammar, spelling, and punctuation."

The Outlook's budget of letters in answer to Mr. Bok's original article does not deal solely with the scholastic side of the dispute. The writer of one of them is serious enough to forbid our terming his communication a humorous one, yet there is a touch of quaint drollery in the plea he advances for a solution of a question of business ethics. Mr. Bok, it will be recalled, speaks somewhat sharply of the 1,426 young men who failed to reply to the questionnaire he sent to them when preparing his article. He characterizes them as having "no conception of the fundamental business rule of courtesy that a business letter calls for an answer and that a stamped addressed envelope entails, in a sense, a moral obligation upon the receiver." Is this true? The writer of the letter referred to says: "The question I want answered is whether any person can put a busy man or woman under the moral obligation of answering a letter, which would take a considerable amount of valuable time, by the simple process of enclosing an envelope with a two-cent stamp upon it." The whole tone of the writer's letter leaves no one in doubt regarding the answer he personally would give to his own question, and we believe most of us will say aye to that reply. M. J. O'C.

ECONOMICS

Prospects of Famine

An agreeable illusion of an immense number of men and women to-day is that each individual thinks for himself or for herself. We have escaped from the dark ages when thought was shackled. The enfranchisement that began with the Reformation and grew during the centuries that followed, is ours in its perfect fullness. The fact is quite the contrary. The ordinary man or woman does not do his or her own thinking to-day, any more than in the thirteenth century. The work is done by others with this disadvantage to the public, that, while in the thirteenth century the thinking was done by clear-headed, responsible men in the light of Christian faith, it is to-day the work of irresponsible persons bewildered by the contradictions that do duty for enlightenment.

We do not blame the average man and woman for this illusion. We rather pity them. Because man is sociable by nature—we use "sociable" in the philosophic sense, not in the popular—he is also teachable and leadable. If he is persuaded that he thinks for himself, this does not come from his inner consciousness; for very few indeed have any consciousness that they think. Their brain works, it is true; but there is as much difference between such working of the brain and real thought as there is between the machinery in an exhibition moving without any load and the same machinery employed in the factory, or the steamship, or on the railway. What thinking there is, is done in the editorial rooms, or in the private confabulations of political leaders, or by the organizers of reform movements, or by the writers of books containing new theories in science or religion, and the results of such thought are given out to be more or less assimilated by the rest of the world. It is human nature.

Things would be better if those who form public opinion immediately could be induced to weigh well the ideas offered them and the reasons on which those ideas rest. But they are human as well as their disciples. They look naturally to authority, although they reject the surest authority this world contains. Hence the exaggerated reverence for professors, and men of science, and such like. If one of these says anything, the newspapers publish his utterance as an oracle. This has certain advantages. We have been saying fruitlessly in this column for the last three years that the world is rushing on towards disaster in the matter of food: a member of the British Association announced that the supply of wheat is threatened, as a new discovery a week or two ago, and his words are published far and wide and the world takes alarm.

Yet the fact is perfectly obvious. We are coming to depend more and more on crops reaped on vast expanses of sparsely settled land, and less and less on those gathered from the farms of populated countries. This began with the opening up of the United States Northwest. Thirty or forty bushels an acre was the yield of the new fields in Dakota, and it was thought that there the world had an inexhaustible source. But extravagance brought the inevitable result. The land became impoverished. Now fifteen bushels an acre is a good return, and the United States barely supplies its own needs. The same process is working out in the Canadian Northwest, Argentina and Australia. When Siberia shall have been submitted to it, the new lands will have been exhausted. Yet all the time the number of consumers is increasing and consequently the demand for wheat; and, what makes the danger still greater, the consumption of wheat flour per head increases also.

The facts with regard to meat are of the same nature. While many were asserting that the increase in prices was due to a combination of packers, who used cold storage to create an artificial scarcity, we maintained that it was the result of the exhaustion of the supply. In this as in the matter of wheat it was thought that the American plains would never fail to supply cattle for food. Ships went from the United States and Canada to Europe laden with beef alive and dead. Where are they now? Then Argentina and Australia were trusted to for the feeding of Europe. But to-day the United States, so far from being able to feed the world, is taking its share from both those countries; and the President of the American Meat Packers' Association tells us that the supply of beef cattle in the United States has in the last six years decreased 40 per cent. relatively to the demand. Another authority, as we love to call them, points out that the increase of population contains three consumers for one producer. And this is taking place all over the world. The only remedy is the economical cultivation of the soil. We have said this before, and we shall return to it again.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

What's In a Name?

With this title the editor of Boston Truth heads the following article.

"It has always appeared to us that the controversy inside the American Protestant Episcopal Church over the name it bears and the name 'Catholic,' which some of its clergy and laity desire to give it, was about as useless and unnecessary as even a church row can possibly be. . . .

"Its title of Protestant recalls the fact that the Anglican Church went out from the ancient Church at the time of the Reformation and aligned itself with those who protested against Rome; it changed its creed; it Englished its ritual, and by its aid and sympathy for those who abandoned the Roman communion, assumed a leadership in Protestantism and rejected the universal or Catholic character which inures in a faith that is superior to political and geographical lines, and became robustly and vigorously national and provincial in its character. This is a bald statement of fact. The same thing happened in Germany, Holland, Scotland and Scandinavia, the change being more radical in some than in others; but the Anglican Church, largely by reason of its governmental and State connection, adhered to its episcopacy and conservatism, and was less subject to the changes and individualisms that are inseparable from Protestantism; but its Catholic character was abandoned, its Protestantism was emphasized and tintured by Puritanism; and the ritualism that has been disturbing the peace of Episcopalianism is a modern growth. As a matter of fact, the temporalities of the State Church have saved it from the schisms and division into new churches that are inevitable in other Protestant bodies. The application of the name Catholic to any Protestant body is a contradiction of terms; since the very genius of Protestantism is the rejection of any authority other than the Book and the right of every individual to interpret that authority for himself."

A Presbyterian Organ on Social Hygiene

In a recent issue the United Presbyterian said:

"Gospel sermons are coming from unexpected sources these days. We note, for example, that the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, can, on occasion, preach the gospel with power. Dr. Eliot, emeritus president of Harvard University, made an address on social hygiene in Buffalo on a recent date. In this address he depicted many of the sad results of ignorance and vice when left unchecked and unheeded. He spoke of increased physical decay as a result of our modern crowding of population in unsanitary surroundings. Looking at the problem in its immensity, he almost despaired of a solution. He asked: 'What force can now be put in play against the formidable evils which gravely threaten the very life of our race?' And he answers by saying that 'no one force or agency can be completely relied upon.' But there was present in the international conference another gentleman, Rev. Richard J. Tierney, who felt that he could give a better answer than Dr. Eliot himself. He said: 'Knowledge is not moral power. Christ, not hygiene, will cleanse the world.'

"Whereupon the Globe-Democrat rises to remark editorially: 'Only the religion founded upon recognition of one supreme and only God, manifested in the flesh by Jesus Christ, presents the foundation of right living, of morality and of a hygiene which embraces the welfare of others as well as of the individual. No other force conspicuously rescues men from moral degradation and mental depravity and sets them to thinking clean thoughts and living pure lives.'

"The editorial further declares that the man who believes in this cleansing power has not so hopeless an outlook as that taken by Dr. Eliot, whose long years at Harvard as an educator should have convinced him that mere knowledge is not moral power. It ventures to assert that more real moral power issues from some small college whose atmosphere is pervaded with the spirit of Christianity and where Christ is held up as the one to emulate, than from the great university, where mere knowledge is the object sought and where both the restraints and the molding influence of the Christ spirit are absent. To be sure, the Christ spirit has not yet conquered the world and overcome the sad results of centuries of its absence. It has not even supremely dominated the lands where it is best known. Further than that, it does not even to-day completely rule those who are nominally under its inspiration. Yet, in spite of all this, it is the sufficient single power which Dr. Eliot says does not exist.

"Here is another illustration of the fact that it is not by its wisdom that the world comes to know God; but it is by knowing God that it gets the very beginning of wisdom. It is soul development that the world needs to make it moral and clean and sanitary. The child whose body alone is developed becomes an idiot; the result of the development of the body and mind, without the development of the soul, is in absolutely every case—a criminal; where soul and mind and body are all developed, we have a man, grown to the fullness of the stature of a man in Christ Jesus. It is not scientific truth alone that makes men free, but more especially the truth of the gospel of Jesus Christ. The power that can cleanse submerged tenths, and ghettos and cities and governments, and politics, as well as human hearts, is the blood of Jesus Christ that cleanses from all sin. Everything flourishes where the river flows, and they who follow Jesus Christ do not walk in darkness. Righteousness flourishes in the light of the Sun of Righteousness, who imparts only life and health.

"Men can not be scolded or lectured or driven or legislated or even educated out of their wickedness and filth. They must be won by health and happiness and holiness. And the greatest winning power in the world to-day is Jesus Christ. S. D. Gordon speaks of the forces that are at hand for winning this old world back to its right relationship to the Father's heart and home. He names the church; but this is only Christ's world-winning organization. He speaks of the winning power of a man; but it is the Christ spirit in a man that gives him winning power. He mentions the Holy Spirit; but his work is to testify of Christ. He talks about prayer; but the prayer that avails is the prayer that is offered 'in My name.' He says that money is a mighty power; but it is Jesus who teaches us how to use money and where to lay it up. He declares that sacrifice is sin's healing shadow; but who has ever taught us this lesson as has the Christ of God? The great heart-magnet is God, and Jesus is the heart of God beating in sympathy with human hearts. His is the power to draw out of men the best that is in them. He is the one sufficient power for the cleansing of the world. He promised long ago that if he were lifted up He would draw all men unto Himself; and He has never failed and He never will fail to do this thing."

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

The Columbus Day committee of the New York Chapter, Knights of Columbus, has arranged to celebrate Columbus Day by a great public demonstration at Carnegie Hall, on Monday evening, October 13. Rt. Rev. Bishop McFaul of Trenton, N. J., and Hon. Thomas F. Carmody, Attorney General, of New York, will be among the speakers.

On the fourth Sunday of September every year the Catholic cemetery of Rochester, N. Y., is solemnly blessed. The ceremony attracts the attention not of Catholics only, but of non-Catholics as well. This year a greater number than usual took part in it. From St. Bernard's Seminary the procession marched along the boulevard to the mortuary chapel in the cemetery. There were fully three hundred and eighty in the procession: The throng in the cemetery was roughly estimated at twenty-five thousand, and the calm, respectful and reverential behavior of that multitude was most impressive. While the bishop and his assistants vested for the ceremony of blessing the graves, the choir of seminarians in the open chanted the Vespers for the Dead. The procession then started and the bishop blessed the tomb of his predecessor, Bishop McQuaid, then the graves of the priests and Sisters, and after marching through the avenues lined with reverent spectators, chanting meantime the Miserere and the De Profundis, blessing graves of rich and poor, the procession returned to the chapel, from the steps of which the Rt. Rev. Bishop addressed the multitude. It was a fervid and touching talk of a father to his children. The catholicity of faith was shown in the catholicity of death; so many different nationalities and people sleeping the same sleep of peace and signed with the same sign of faith. Rich and poor, the learned and ignorant had yielded dust to dust—but their souls, through God's mercy, were enjoying their eternal reward.

Naturally Catholics are interested in learning something about the fate of that part of the Balkan population which is in union with the Holy See. A correspondent of La Croix furnishes some very interesting details on that subject.

Going back in the history of these Catholic peoples, who have suffered so much for the Faith, he reminds us that in 1860 a group of distinguished Balkans assembled at Constantinople declared to Mgr. Brunoni, the Apostolic Delegate, that they were desirous of recognizing the Holy Father as the Head of the Church. This attempt at union was the first of its kind since the Turks entered into possession of the country. As far back as the ninth or tenth century a union had been concluded, but on account of pressure from Constantinople it soon came to an end.

The effort of 1860 was just about to have very far reaching results when Russia effectively checked its progress. The first Uniate Bishop Sokolski was captured on the Bosphorus and was never seen again. At that time Napoleon III might have secured the success of the movement, but he failed to avail himself of the opportunity.

Among the Catholics of Bulgaria there are three groups remarkable for their religious fervor and patriotism. They have three bishops: Mgr. Miroff, at Constantinople; Mgr. Petkoff, at Adrianople; and Mgr. Chanoff, at Salonica. They follow the Slav ritual and cannot be distinguished from the Schismatics except by their allegiance to the Sovereign Pontiff and by their remarkable piety. They are sincere Bulgarians and are very much attached to their country. Indeed, in certain places they have acted as sentinels at the frontiers and were the first to fight against the enemy. The districts where these Catholics lived have been completely destroyed. Their towns and villages have been plundered and set on fire, but not by the Bulgarians.

Around Salonica it is doubtful if there are any of the faithful left alive. Many of them, on the approach of the Greeks, took to flight and escaped, with their priests at their head, in a most deplorable state of destitution. A number fell along the route during that month of suffering, and had nothing to sustain them but what they could gather from the trees on the road. One division remained at Samokoff and another at Ichtiman. They sent their priests ahead of them to Sofia to find if shelter would be afforded them. When the caravan arrived the first question was for a church in order to thank God for their deliverance. One of the priests explained that when they were threatened with death if they did not renounce their religion and their nationality, they all, without attempting to flee or to fight, professed they were ready to die.

On the borders of the River Vardar they found many abandoned children. They tenderly cared for them and carried them along with them in their flight. These poor fugitives do not know what became of their families, or their houses, or their fields, or their cattle. They saw behind them the fire from their burning cottages and their fields. One of the fugitives said that from his concealment he saw a dozen children slaughtered by their persecutors in the very courtyard of the Sisters of Charity. Nevertheless, they do not complain. They have the courage to give up everything for their country and for their absent ones, dead and alive. On the Thracian side the conditions were still worse. In the regions of Malagra two villages were burned and many of the men were massacred. The rest of the people abandoned their homes and arrived at the southern Bulgarian cities, where they were hospitably received.

It is to the Christian Brothers that Belgium owes the admirable schools of St. Luke, says Father Plater, S.J., in the Catholic Times of London. Here are educated the young builders, painters and decorators, who by their admirable taste, their passion for their art, and their thoroughly Christian spirit remind one of the memorable days of the Guilds. A modest course of drawing lessons, which was started at Ghent in 1863 under the auspices of the St. Vincent de Paul Society, gave birth to the new institution. Now the "Ecoles Saint Luc" are established in five different localities and number more than two thousand students and fifty-nine professors. In almost every parish in Belgium the clergy have established patronages. Ten years ago there were in Brussels alone twenty-five patronages for boys, with four thousand members, and nine patronages for girls, with two thousand five hundred members. At Antwerp the membership was still larger. These patronages, ostensibly mere associations for recreation, have, thanks to the zeal of the priests and their lay associates, accomplished untold good. By keeping the children away from the dangers of the street and an idle life, they have helped them to preserve their faith, to understand better their duties as Catholics, and to realize the need they have of sound principles and good Christian habits.

The Reverend Henry C. Bronsgeest on September 28 celebrated his silver jubilee of service as Rector of the Church of St. Francis Xavier, popularly known as the College Church, in St. Louis, Missouri. The occasion was of more than local and passing interest, since the worthy jubilarian is one of the few surviving members of the Missionary Band which, under the leadership of Father Damen, did such splendid work East and West in the early 70's. The priest, so affectionately honored by those for whose welfare the last quarter of a century has been spent, was born in Holland, April 17, 1842, and after completing his studies and receiving Holy Orders, came to the United States under the inspiration of the venerable Father De Smet to do missionary work in the western country. He entered the Society of Jesus, November 11, 1868, and, apart from his years of association with Father Damen, the forty-five years of his religious life have been consecrated to the interests of the Church in the Middle West. Father Bronsgeest, before going to the College Church in St. Louis, was successively Rector of the two Jesuit churches in Chicago for some years, and his memory is quite as dear to his old parishioners in that city as the regard is heartfelt in which he is held in the later field of his labors.

As a souvenir of his jubilee there was presented to Father Bronsgeest by his flock a purse of $42,000 to enable him to carry into effect a long cherished desire of his heart,—the erection of the steeple which shall complete the beautiful Gothic church which has for twenty-five years been the scene of his priestly ministrations.

New York Macmillan Company Refuses to Handle "Father Ralph"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The item which appeared in your issue of September 21st, with reference to a book entitled "Father Ralph," published by Macmillan Company, Limited, of London (the name being, as you see, not the same), may, we fear, create an erroneous impression. Permit us to state the following facts:

1. The Macmillan Company of New York is an independent company, incorporated under the laws of the State of New York, and having no control whatever over the publications of Macmillan & Company, Limited, of London.

2. The Macmillan Company of New York, although agents for many of the publications of Macmillan & Company, Limited, of London, as well as for those of many other London houses, positively refused to act as agents for the book known as "Father Ralph" or to have anything to do with that publication in any way whatsoever.

If you will kindly explain this matter in your valuable paper, it will prevent your readers from forming any wrong conclusion on account of the similarity of names of these two wholly independent publishing houses. THE MACMILLAN COMPANY.

New York, Oct. 2.

George P. Brett, President.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

We note in AMERICA that the firm of Benziger Brothers is credited with the agency here of M. H. Gill & Son of Dublin, the publishers of Dr. McCaffrey's "History of the Catholic Church." This is a mistake, as we import the book from the publishers and carry it in stock. In a review of the book a few weeks ago the price was given as fifty cents. It is sold in Dublin at two shillings, but with duty, transportation and a fair profit to booksellers it cannot be sold here at less than ninety cents.

May Repeal Tariff Clause.—Steps were taken by the administration to bring about the prompt repeal of the 5 per cent. preferential clause in the new Tariff law, which threatens to involve the United States in serious complications with foreign Governments. This is the first acknowledged blunder in the Democratic revision of the tariff. Diplomatic protests piled up at the State Department. The objectionable feature of the tariff law is that which grants a discount of 5 per cent. of the customs duty on goods brought into this country in ships carrying the American flag. France served notice that retaliatory measures would be taken against American vessels if the 5 per cent. clause is administered in such a manner as to damage French shipping interests. Germany filed a request that it be accorded the five per cent. reduction given to American goods because of its favored nation treaty with the United States. Portugal and Belgium also filed inquiries on how the provision would affect their shipping interests. Other protests are expected. Officials of the State Department believe that the only solution of the difficulty will be the repeal of the provision. Meantime the operation of the clause has been suspended by Secretary McAdoo, who has directed all collectors of customs to refuse the 5 per cent. reduction to all American or foreign vessels which may ask for it.

Country Banks Oppose New Bill.—Seven hundred country bankers at a special meeting in conjunction with the annual convention of the American Bankers' Association at Boston expressed opposition to certain features of the Administration Currency bill. By "country banks," it was explained in the call for the conference, was meant banks operating under either State or national charters whose capital was not less than $25,000 nor more than $250,000. That a new banking system is needed was admitted and the administration was commended for trying to establish one. In the preamble to the resolutions which will be laid before the Senate committee it was asserted that country banks represent about 75 per cent. of all the banks in the United States; that they bear the burden of national prosperity in proportion to their numbers; therefore legislation hostile to the welfare of these institutions is also of necessity hostile to the welfare of American citizens, whether farmers, wage-earners or business men. The resolutions, which received almost unanimous support, alleged that the passage of the measure in its present form would drive country banks, both national and State, out of business. President Wilson meantime met with a severe reverse in his campaign for early financial reform by the Senate Currency Committee's decision to continue hearings until October 25.

New Philippine Policy.—The Honorable Francis Burton Harrison, the newly appointed Governor-General of the Philippines, has announced at Manila that the Wilson administration will take a long step forward in the government of the islands by giving the natives control of the appointive Commission, thus turning legislation over to the representatives of the people. At present Americans form a majority on the Commission, which has the power to veto undesirable laws, although it cannot impose its will on the Assembly. Under the new arrangement the only sure check upon the activities of a Filipino Legislature will be the power of Congress to legislate for the islands. The New York Sun believes that possession of the Legislature will often bring the Filipinos into conflict with the Governor-General and make them impatient of the withholding of full independence.

Mexico.—Without firing a shot federal soldiers took possession of Piedras Negras, the provincial capital of the Constitutionalists, on October 7, thus ending the victorious march of General Maas through the State of Coahuila, the home of Venustiano Carranza, revolutionary commander-in-chief. The handful of Constitutionalist troops fled from the city on the approach of the Government army. Reports as to the status of the revolutionary movement are conflicting. Some dispatches indicate that the rebel army is badly scattered and broken in spirit, while others are that the several bands are still intact and marching toward a common point to reform and renew the campaign. The whereabouts of the Constitutionalist leader Venustiano Carranza, is unknown. —President Huerta seems to have matters at the capital well in hand. A readjustment of his cabinet took place on October 6, the chief appointment being that of Querido Moheno who was promoted from First Assistant Secretary to Minister of Foreign Affairs. The question of postponing the national election is still in abeyance. —The capture of Torreon by the Constitutionalists is officially admitted by Señor Aldalpe, Minister of the Interior. —Subsequently President Huerta practically made himself Dictator by putting 110 Deputies in jail.

Cuba.—Cuban officials have been commenting on the fact that the coming of the Panama-Pacific Exposition Commission, which arrived in Havana harbor on the cruiser Birmingham on Oct. 7, was not previously announced. Regret is expressed that the oversight prevented those in authority from preparing a fitting reception for the Commissioners. These express themselves unofficially as displeased at "some one's blunder," since inquiries at both the American Legation and Consulate show that no information had been forwarded regarding the advent of the body. Minister Gonzales accompanied the members of the Commission on a visit to President Menocal, Oct. 8. —The Supreme Court of the Island has given a second decision upholding the action of the President in cancelling the concession claimed to be rightfully held by the Cuban Ports Company. On October 3 the Court had decreed that President Menocal's action in annulling the company's concession was not unconstitutional; the present judgment is in response to a second appeal made by the company and it agrees that the President was right in affirming that it could not be considered as holder of the original concession as it was not organized in accordance with the law. —The Liberals are resolute in their determination to defeat President Menocal's proposition to float a Cuban loan of $15,000,000, and they have some prospects of success. The Secretary of State has issued a statement expressing his belief that Speyer Brothers of New York are not entitled to any special privileges under the Gómez decree giving them the refusal of any loan to be negotiated by the Cuban Government. The Administration holds that the former President had no right to bind the Government to an agreement to accept the most favorable terms which might be offered.

Porto Rico.—President Wilson has selected Dr. Arthur Yager, President of Georgetown College, Georgetown, Ky., for Governor of Porto Rico. Dr. Yager was born in Kentucky in 1858, and is a graduate of the college of which he later became president. He received the degree of Doctor of Philosophy from Johns Hopkins in 1884, and that of Doctor of Laws from Harvard College, Alabama, in 1905. His specialties as a professor lay in the departments of history and economics. Governor George R. Colton, whose resignation will take effect in November, denies the reports of a decline in Porto Rico prosperity. The removal of the duty on sugar, notwithstanding the views of some Porto Ricans to the contrary, would, he thought, have no appreciable effect on the prosperity of the island. What is needed most in Porto Rico, he added, is truck gardening, which is almost entirely neglected. Antonio Alcaide, who owns a sugar plantation of 50,000 acres, is not in favor of the Governor's suggestion. "The best I could do in truck farming," he says, "would be to put about 25 acres of this under cultivation, as the expense of a big truck farm would knock out all the profits. What shall I do with the other immense acreage? Coffee? I should get no return from my coffee investment under eighteen years. Tobacco? Only the fancy brands bring good results." Mr. Alcaide said despairingly that the result of the new tariff, so far as Porto Rico is concerned, means that other governments get the meat and Porto Rico gets the bones.

Santo Domingo.—Through the action of James M. Sullivan, the American Minister to the Dominican Republic, a peace treaty has been signed by the chiefs of the warring factions in this country and the revolution headed by General Horatio Vasquez against the government of Provisional President José Bordas Valdez is happily brought to an end. Mr. Sullivan's mediation between the Government and the rebels is the first successful application of the new policy of the United States in dealing with Dominican affairs, which is to the effect that force of arms must never again be used to settle any question in this country. This policy as announced by the American Minister has been accepted with acclaim by all parties in Santo Domingo, regardless of political affiliations.

Canada.—The high quality of the wheat crop will not benefit the grain grower. The banks are forcing him to sell in order to pay his debts; so he is carrying his grain to the railway as fast as it is threshed, and grumbling if he finds the elevators full. When the farmer takes the grain grower's place things will change. —Canadians are well pleased with the new United States tariff. They say that it gives them more than the reciprocity agreement. If it does, it will effect without wounding them, all that the agreement would have done, namely, it will connect them more intimately with the United States.

—Another of the periodic movements to promote trade with England has begun, having in view reduction of ocean freights. The position seems to be this: Canadian importers say to the shipping owners: "Reduce your freights and we will give you trade." The latter reply: "Give us trade and we will reduce our freights."—The larger Canadian Pacific ships will make Halifax their exclusive winter port this season, abandoning St. John. This is taken by some as an indication that the rumors, persisting for some time past, of a union closer than mere agreement between the Allan and Canadian Pacific lines have some foundation. Others explain it by the fact that at Halifax superior accommodation for large ships is being provided, and the advantage of not exposing the larger ships to the risks of navigating the coast of Nova Scotia. —Two attempts to wreck the train between Nanaimo and Victoria are attributed to the striking miners.

Great Britain.—Shipping men are somewhat hurt over the five per cent. differential to be granted to goods imported into the United States in American ships.—The Times wants the Government to propose a grant to defray the cost of the Hundred Years of Peace celebration. —The same journal blames the movement inaugurated by some employers of labor to raise a fund of 50 millions sterling to defend the employers against the continual strikes. It says that this would be a formal admission that employers and the employed are in a state of chronic war.—The difficulties that arose between the officers of the Royal Navy sent to Canada in an advisory capacity and the Minister of Marine in the late Cabinet have repeated themselves in Australia, whence one of them is returning to England virtually dismissed.—The army manoeuvres appear to have been more satisfactory than those of last year. The King and the War Office have expressed their satisfaction.—At the Church Congress the Dean of Durham, better known by his former title of Canon Hensley Henson, created some sensation by coming out strongly in favor of divorce.—There has been some trouble among the native banks in India. One or two failed; but the difficulties of others seem to be over.

Ireland.—A speech delivered by Winston Churchill, October 8, seems to indicate that the Carson campaign has made some impression on the Government. Mr. Churchill said they were determined to establish Home Rule within the lifetime of the present Parliament, but before the Irish Parliament will be able to pass legislation there will be a general election, and if the Unionists win they can repeal it. This is their only constitutional remedy unless meantime there is settlement by consent. "The Orangemen have damaged their cause by violence," but if they seek special consideration for Ulster through constitutional means "there is no move they can make which will not be matched by their Irish fellow-countrymen and the Liberals of Great Britain." The Home Rule Bill "is not unalterable and if good will is brought to bear on the issue, far reaching alterations are possible." He was confident that "the Irish question will be settled soon and for all time." Meanwhile Sir E. Carson has been reviewing his recruits, who numbered less than 8,000 in the much heralded drill at Belfast, and Mr. Devlin has warned him that the Nationalists of Northeast Ulster will be able and ready to deal with them if they give trouble.—The latest report of the Department of Agriculture shows that the Irish trade for 1912 had an increase of $44,000,000 over the previous year, and of $172,000,000 over 1904. The imports amounted to $365,000,000, and the exports $338,000,000. However, about half of the increase is due to enhanced prices rather than to enlarged volume of trade; and among the imports there is a large proportion of articles, especially farm products, that could be profitably raised in Ireland.—The Gaelic League reports a great advance during the year and good prospects for the future. There were 14 Gaelic colleges in operation during the Summer, and there was a large attendance of students and teachers from all parts of Ireland, and many from the Continent. A new Gaelic College has been just opened in Dublin. Canon Peter O'Leary, the most popular of Gaelic writers, delivered a memorable address at its inauguration.—An anti-Catholic organization in London has sent its agents under false pretences to some of the Irish pilgrims who were reported cured at Lourdes and to the least experienced of the others, so as to obtain from them something that would discredit the reality of the cures. The scheme has failed, and the facts have been attested by many qualified physicians.

France.—The visit of President Poincaré to Spain, which began on October 6, is like a royal progress. A brilliant series of fêtes have been arranged to do him honor. The joint action of Spain and France, which requires a better understanding of conditions and the desire to establish closer political affiliation, is said to be the purpose of the visit. In Madrid he was accorded an enthusiastic reception, though he arrived in a heavy rain storm. He was met at the railway station by the King and other distinguished personages and conducted to the royal palace, where he was presented to the Queen Mother Christina and Queen Victoria. The city was decorated and illuminated in his honor, but he refused to be present at a bull fight.

Italy.—The new Italian Ambassador to the United States, Count Macchi-Celere, is said to be the nephew of Cardinal Macchi. His experience in immigration matters and knowledge of trade conditions, which are to be affected by the new tariff laws, are thought to be among his qualifications for the post.—The coming elections are agitating the country, and at Cassoria, a town six miles from Naples, a poor old priest, who was endeavoring to quell a riot, was shot and killed by a stray bullet. The average number of candidates for each constituency is four.

Balkans.—The situation in the Peninsula is still precarious, the Albanian and Servian quarrel being still acute. Turkey's policy of procrastination is irritating the Greeks and if the Powers persist in not interfering the Greeks may bring things to a head. King Constantine arrived at Athens from Paris on October 4 and, it is reported, will shortly join the army in Macedonia. His utterances in France, apparently laudatory of Germany, gave great offense.—The treaty between Turkey and Bulgaria is said to consist of thirteen articles, covering the arrangements of frontier, evacuation, demobilization, amnesty, nationalities, rights of individuals and of communities, residences of private persons, rights of private property, diplomatic relations, posts, telegraphs, railways, and existing rights. Other points remain to be settled.

Germany.—A semi-official statement has been made in answer to the sensational press reports that the chasm between the houses of Guelph and Hohenzollern had again been reopened. It was said that Prince Ernst of Cumberland, the newly wedded husband of the Kaiser's only daughter, Princess Victoria Luise, did not consider that in taking his oath as a Prussian officer he had renounced his right to the Hanoverian throne. It was furthermore hinted that a tacit agreement existed by which he would be permitted to ascend the throne of Brunswick without making any formal renunciation of his sovereignty over Hanover. The demand of a portion of the German press for a specific renunciation, and the answer of the Guelph papers that no such renunciation had ever been made or even contemplated, precipitated the controversy. A perfect silence upon the subject was observed by the authorities upon both sides. Prince Adolph of Schaumburg-Lippe, the Emperor's brother-in-law, was dispatched to Gmunden, the residence of the Cumberland family, ostensibly to participate in a hunt with Prince Ernst and the Duke of Cumberland. The final declaration given to the press bureau is that the "good faith" of the declarations made by Prince Ernst August before his marriage with the Kaiser's daughter must be considered as placed beyond all doubt. The Prince himself holds that no one has a right to question his word as contained in the promise that he would never do anything against the unity of the German Empire or the present state of the Prussian Government. This pledge, he holds, will be as binding when he becomes a sovereign as it is to-day. The reply attributed to him in answer to a question concerning his renunciation of the throne of Hanover—"For me my house and honor come first; love is only second"—must be relegated to the realm of fable. Especially significant is the declaration made by Berlin that no farther promises will be required than those which had originally been made with full deliberation and to the satisfaction both of Gmunden and Berlin. The explanation, Nationalist papers object, will not affect Guelph agitation.—Next in importance to the Guelph question is the discussion regarding the Wittelsbach throne. More seriously than ever it is proposed that the new Prince Regent of Bavaria should accept the crown. The Centre, which hitherto had not particularly favored this movement, is thought by some to be gradually veering about. There would be question, however, of a grave constitutional change.

Austria-Hungary.—A portion of the Government building in the Hungarian city Fiume was recently destroyed by dynamite. The investigations have apparently made clear that there is question of a wide-spread plot whose purpose was the destruction of the Government archives. Fourteen young people have been arrested at Pola for supposed complicity, and many more arrests will probably follow.—Frank Kossuth, the leader of the independent party which is named after him, is said to be in a dying condition from which there is no hope of recovery. He has almost completed his seventy-second year.—Three hundred and fifty million crowns have been granted by the Ministerial Council of Austria-Hungary to cover the expenses of war preparations made during the Balkan crisis. Of this sum two hundred millions had been devoted to the purchase of war materials, and the remaining portion was consumed in the transport service and the care of men and horses. The army officials demand an additional contingent of 35,000 recruits and an increase of fifty million crowns for the army budget.

China.—Yuan Shi-Kai, who has been for more than eighteen months Provisional President of the Chinese Republic, was formally elected on Oct. 6 Constitutional President for a term of five years. He was chosen on the third ballot by the required two-thirds majority of both houses of Parliament in joint assembly. 759 Senators and Representatives were present and gave Yuan 507 votes, Li Huen-heng, the Provisional Vice-President, coming next with 179. As soon as the election was announced, the Powers sent notes recognizing the Republic to the Chinese Foreign Office which had previously guaranteed that Yuan would maintain the established customs and observe all the treaties and contracts made by the Manchu government. On the following day the united houses of Parliament elected General Li Huen-heng Vice-President giving him 610 out of a possible 719 votes. The unfriendly attitude of Japan toward the Chinese is said to have been the active influence that made some of the great Powers recognize the Republic. The price of Russia's recognition, it is reported, is China's promise to negotiate a Mongolian treaty favorable to the Czar and Great Britain is believed to have secured similar assurances with regard to Thibet.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Ozanam on Employers and Employed

The reasons given by Ozanam why a just wage is often denied the laborer are reducible to two main classes: inability on the part of the employer and wilful exploitation of labor. As remedies for the former he suggests a more adequate knowledge of the laws of supply and demand, a more rigid economy in avoiding waste, and a more perfect distribution of money for rent interest, tax and profit; in brief a better understanding of industrial and commercial questions. The second difficulty is not solved so easily, since it is the result of a perverted human will. It is due to the greed of capitalist and dividend-hunters, and must therefore be met by definite action on the part of the State, of the community and of the labor unions.

In his definition of exploitation Ozanam is eminently clear and to the point. The employer becomes guilty of this crime "when he does not consider the worker as an associate and an auxiliary, but as a tool from which he is to derive as much service as possible at the least expense possible." This is Catholic doctrine in its integrity.

Such exploitation of man by man Ozanam calls by no other name than slavery. The human laborer, the masterpiece of the Creator, the image of God, the immortal heir of heavenly glory, has in such a system been reduced to a mere machine. His service has become servitude. He is "only a part of capitalism, like the slave of the ancient pagans." No more therefore is done for him than for the machine at which he stands. It is all a question of the greatest economy. Child labor follows, and the mother likewise is torn from her home. The moral and intellectual needs of the toiling masses are of no consequence and the family is disintegrated without a qualm of conscience. Sanitary conditions are neglected and the workshop becomes a veritable prison house where man, woman and child are condemned to a systematic and progressive degradation. Such must of necessity be the conditions wherever the liberalistic form of capitalism is allowed full freedom without the interference of State action and labor unionism. Such have been and still are the actual results in many instances. Need we wonder that the great Catholic social leaders all with one voice more bitterly condemn the vices of individualism or Liberalism than even the errors of Socialism. The first are the cause, the latter only the effect.

What then is to be done? Clearly the Government must interfere. The policy of absolute liberty, Laissez faire, laissez passer, can not be tolerated. The individual laborer, says Ozanam, is under a threefold disadvantage. He has less to spare than the capitalist, and therefore is urged by need to accept the terms which are offered him. He has a more limited horizon than his employer and is consequently more subject to alarm and intimidation. He is finally more restricted in his choice of occupation. The capitalist can find many ways of investing his wealth, the laborer is bound to his machine or at least to the trade which he has learned.

While such is the condition of the laborer, there is no less danger, on the other hand, to be apprehended from a paternalistic government. Experience has shown that it hampers industry and strangles commerce. No worse form of universal slavery could finally be imagined than the paternalism to which Socialist agitators would subject the entire human race.

The solution therefore of the problem must consist in a proper balancing of liberty and authority. Government intervention is necessary, but must be restricted to extraordinary circumstances. Much can be accomplished by the education of the worker and by proper labor organizations. The employer likewise needs to be taught that liberal wages encourage the workingman, make him take more pride and pleasure in his task and help him to identify his interests with his occupation. "The laborer will be attached to his work as to something that is his own, industry will advance in perfection, and that demoralization which we make at the same time a reproach and a necessity for the proletariat will cease with the prospect of his going forth one day from his state of helotism." (Mélanges II, p. 582.)

It must be borne in mind that the conditions of which Ozanam wrote are not to be indiscriminately compared with those of our time. It is only the Socialistic writer, and men who have similarly become infected with the radicalism of our time, who will condemn the entire employing class as guilty of heartless exploitation and identify labor with slavery under the entire existing system. Ozanam, as we may judge from his many writings, had no thought of attacking the principle of wages in itself, but only the abuses to which it had given occasion and which had become common in the factory system of his day. Nothing could be more terrible than the moral, intellectual and physical degradation implied in the picture given of it by Kolping in Germany; while Manchester and other great industrial centres of England were veritable studies for a new Inferno. We are not, therefore, surprised at the bold and unqualified assertion which we find twice repeated in the notes of Ozanam that the great industrial captains of his day could only be compared to "those barbarian royalties who were borne about upon a shield on the shoulders of the people." (p. 586.)

It is difficult for us to conceive the horror with which the Catholic mind at this period contemplated the transition from the domestic to the factory system. The danger and degradation it implied for the laborer were not essential parts of the new system itself; but under the pagan individualism of the times, which the Reformation had brought about, the laborer was practically handed over as a slave into the hands of the factory owner. The economic philosophy of the day forbade the State to interfere and suppressed the labor union, so that no redress could be had. The conscience of the employer, deadened by what he knew to be the custom of the time, was the only court of appeal which labor had. Such a condition could never have been brought about, except by the rejection of Catholic philosophy and Catholic faith. There is hope for labor only in as far as Catholic principles are adopted. That, however, in the stress of unlimited competition and amid the surroundings we have here described, the Catholic employer should often himself have yielded to the principles which were almost forced upon him, is sufficiently intelligible. Making all due allowance, the same rule holds in our own time.

To say that labor conditions have not vastly improved since the day when Kolping, Ozanam and Ketteler looked upon the misery of the masses and appealed to the conscience of the world, is a Socialistic exaggeration. We have much to remedy; but for this very reason we must be most careful not to confuse the popular mind upon this subject.

And yet, in spite of all the changes which have taken place in the material conditions of the people, the situation, as Ozanam describes it, is sufficiently suggestive of our own day. Employers and employed he beholds facing each other as two hostile armies. On the one side he sees the power of wealth; on the other, the force of numbers. The acts of physical violence and the strikes of the toiling multitudes recall to his mind the historical scenes of the seceding Roman plebeians.

We have already briefly indicated Ozanam's economic solution. It would be wrong, however, to convey the impression that he believed the question to be mainly an economic one. He well understood that the evils of the time were all reducible to a want of charity and justice. The restoration of economic justice, where it is violated, depends largely upon the power of law and of organization. But justice can never be restored without charity, the absence of which is the radical reason for the existence of the social question itself. To pastor and people alike therefore Ozanam reads the great lesson of charity. They must go out into the world and take an active part in relieving misery wherever they find it. They must move the hearts of the rich and cheer the hearts of the poor. In both they must enkindle that fire of charity which Christ came to bring into the world. Charity then will return to earth leading Justice by the hand. But it must be a charity founded upon faith and religion.

We have spoken only of the faults to be found in certain classes of employers. Ozanam well knew that labor likewise is not always blameless. Want of fidelity and of application to its employment, thriftlessness and dissipation, and even worse evils were often justly set to its account, but tenderly he dealt with them as a mother might, yet no less resolutely. Labor indeed had not then attained the position which it not unfrequently holds today, when the tables are turned at times and the small employer may even find himself helpless against a powerful trade union.

As a final rule Ozanam demands that a fair proportion be observed between the profits of the employer and the wages of the laborer. There is usury, he argues, as well in excessive profits, which do not correspond to any equivalent labor on the part of the employer, as in excessive interests which exceed the use-value of the money loaned. The danger of harming less fortunately circumstanced competitors must of course be borne in mind. Special allowance must likewise be made for the additional rent derived from the land and for the interest on the capital invested, which belong to the employer if he is both owner and manager. If, however, for these reasons and because of extraordinary intellectual labor and ability he accumulates a fortune exceeding the needs of his station in life he has no right to use it selfishly, but must consider the common good. As long as such fortunes are accumulated, and used as an absolute personal possession and not as a stewardship for God, the war between capital and labor will continue, no matter what economic transformations may take place.

Ozanam, we must say in conclusion, made no pretence to profound economic knowledge. When asked to assume political leadership he expressly pleaded that he was insufficiently versed in these questions. This, to a certain extent, was true, in as far as he was mainly a student of past events with the one great purpose of bringing into evidence the glorious rôle of the Catholic Church in the world's history. But we must not forget that he was always closely in touch with the actual life of labor and poverty, and a shrewd observer of all he saw. Even while delivering his economic lectures his habitual modesty asserted itself. "The humble words," he said, "which come from this chair are only an imperceptible scattering of seed. Yet who knows but it may ripen in the secret depths of your thoughts and unfold itself one day in effective plans." JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

Renée Erdoes

When a new star is discovered by some learned and patient gazer in his lofty watch-tower, the good news is heralded through the civilized world by the cable and the wireless. Some four years ago a new star, a star of more than common brightness, appeared in the firmament of Catholic poetry, but no one took the trouble to make known its rising. The fact of its having appeared in distant Hungary may perhaps explain the ignorance of the world in general in regard to it. Or did the international news agencies and foreign correspondents cease to take an interest in Renée Erdoes after her conversion to the Catholic Church?

There was a time when the name of the Hungarian Jewess was one to swear by in neo-pagan literary circles in the Magyar capital. That was at the beginning of the century. Eötvös, the literary dictator of Buda-Pesth, was her protector and advertiser, and every volume that issued from her prolific pen was hailed with enthusiasm by Young Hungary. Such wealth of fancy, such originality of thought, such perfection of rhythm, no other living author could lay claim to. Then there was the pagan freedom with which she discoursed of love and marriage and kindred subjects that pleased the depraved taste of her contemporaries. In this spirit were written her "Maiden Dreams" (1899), her first volume of "Poems" (1902), her "Sappho" (1902)—which the title-heroine herself might have produced, so thoroughly Grecian and pagan is it—the volume of short stories, "The Woman and Her Companion" (1904), and her only novel, "The Story of a Girl" (1904).

Though she had climbed with comparative ease and with more than ordinary rapidity to the summits of literary fame, Renée Erdoes was by no means happy. True peace and contentment were strangers to her soul. She was dissatisfied with herself, with her surroundings, with her very success. In 1906 she journeyed to Italy and Rome, the goal of her longings, the home where so many a troubled spirit has found rest. Here her whole being underwent a great change—she became a seeker after truth and peace. Her state of mind during this period of trial is revealed in her "New Songs" and in the beautiful collection of poems entitled, "I Came to You," "And as I stand here," she wrote, "with closed eyes and groping hands, and see circling before me flooding and ebbing starry oceans, I feel with my fingers' tips burning wings of invisible hosts. It is as though some one, white and pale as I, were stretching out hot, trembling hands through the fiery dance of the wandering worlds, seeking me from afar." The "hot, trembling hands" reached her at last, and led her to the Fountain of Life and Truth and Happiness. In the spring of 1909 she was received into the Church, making her profession of faith in the Benedictine Abbey of San Anselmo in the Eternal City.

Her former friends and admirers claimed that welt-schmerz, an overwrought imagination, sentimental motives, had led her to embrace the Catholic Faith. The works published since her conversion are the best refutation of this calumny. Their every page shows that deep, inner conviction had brought about her conversion. A German priest-author, John Mumbauer, who is perfectly conversant with the language and literature of Hungary, has had the happy thought of preparing a German translation of Renée Erdoes's poems written immediately before and after her conversion. The work is still in press, but specimens of it have appeared in various periodicals, (Koelnische Volkszeitung, Hochland, Heliand, Akademische Monatsblätter) which give us a fair idea of the Hungarian convert's poetic genius. Some of her poems, such as the beautiful, mystical "Psalm," remind one of Annette von Droste, the queen of German poetesses; others such as "They That Persecuted Me" and "Evening," of Francis Thompson. "In the Garden of Gethsemane" shows that the former Israelite has delved deep into the mysteries of our Redemption. "The Great Morning," a cycle of lyrics, is a touching description of her conversion and reception into the Church. Every item of the Ritual is pregnant with meaning to her and has made an indelible impression on her soul; and what she thought and felt on that memorable morning, the "great morning" of her life has found expression in verses of surpassing beauty.

In all her poems the soul of Renée Erdoes stands clearly outlined before us: we see her groping about in the dark night of doubt, in the uncertain twilight; we feel her poignant remorse for her ill-spent youth, for her squandered talents; we rejoice with her at her stepping forth into the morning-light of faith. She has cast the past, so full of God forgetfulness, behind her; her new-found Saviour is her only Love, her all:

"Ich schmachte nur, o Herr, nach deinem Weine
Und nach dem Brot, das deine Hand gebrochen;
Ich sehn' mich nach dem Lichte, drin die Stroeme
O, deiner Liebe pochen."

When Renée Erdoes's conversion became known in her native land, but especially when she published her first Christian lyrics ("The Golden Vase," 1910), she was assailed with the vilest abuse from all sides. Those who had but a few years before extolled her to the skies as the greatest poetess of modern Hungary, now set her down as one who had outlived her greatness. The beautiful form, the rich, almost Oriental imagery, the boldness of diction, the pregnant description which they had admired so much when placed at the service of modern paganism, lost all its charm when dedicated to the glorification of Christianity. The frantic efforts made by her enemies to discredit her in the eyes of her countrymen are the best proof of the inestimable gain her conversion has been to Catholic letters.

GEORGE METLAKE.

Sex Hygiene in Chicago's Public Schools

The teaching of sex hygiene is, it appears, to be the established policy of the public school authorities in Chicago. Mainly through the influence of Mrs. Ella Flagg Young, Superintendent of Schools in that city, the School Board has set aside $10,000 yearly to pay three physicians to give lectures on the subject. They who shall be selected for the delicate task will be persons of recognized character, understanding and pedagogical training, and they will be expected to impart the needed knowledge on the subject, first to pupils of high schools, and later, if the initial efforts promise good results, to introduce the teaching, modified as the ages might demand, to children of the lower school grades.

The project is not accepted with universal favor by the good people of the Lake City. There is by no means a unanimous consensus of opinion among them that sex hygiene should be taught in the public schools of their city, even in the modification proposed, that it enter the curriculum not as a separate and distinct subject, but correlated and interwoven with the education of the child from its kindergarten days to its last days in high school. Probably because of the divergent views of the citizens of Chicago an opportunity was given quite lately, to those of them who wished to avail themselves of it, to listen to able defenders of the new scheme and of the doctrine opposed to it as well. On October 1, in Assembly Hall of the Northwestern University Building, under the patronage of the Chicago Medical Society, a meeting was held to discuss the subject become, during the past few months, the liveliest kind of a topic in the Western city. The hall was crowded by teachers, doctors, medical students and clergymen. Four speakers, the Record-Herald of the day following tells us, devoted nearly two hours to emphasizing the great need of teaching sex hygiene in the common schools and the enormous benefits to the nation that must accrue from such a course. The applause, it adds, that followed the last of them had hardly ceased when another speaker disrupted the harmony of the meeting by declaring that the teaching of the subject in the schools would inevitably induce more evil than it would allay, and that no good can come of handling from a standpoint of hygiene a question that is purely moral.

The promoters of the meeting were unquestionably ardent advocates of the campaign for sex instruction, which unhappily is sweeping the country like a prairie fire. Yet even their enthusiasm need not bring them to false statements regarding the practice hitherto prevalent in the training of children. Surely they know that there is a wide difference between the decent reticence modest men and women have favored and do favor regarding the topic they are now exploiting, and the total ignorance they affirm to prevail. It is quite untrue to assert, as the promoters of the Chicago meeting do, that "from time immemorial it has been the policy of educators the world over totally to ignore the sexual organization of the individual in the education of children, and that an edict of silence has reigned supreme." Because, out of reverent regard for the moral virtues most intimately associated with so delicate and dangerous a knowledge, the teachers of the earlier days appreciated the need of prudent measuring of occasion and time when such instruction should be given; because they realized how readily vicious curiosity might be aroused by topics apt to disturb and fully awaken dawning passions hard to check in immature souls, and therefore judged that such things should be dealt with not in the clatter of a public class-room but in the quiet of the home and by loving parents fully conscious of the need of certain knowledge but eager to defend their children from the evil easily flowing from that knowledge; because in a truer concept of the domain of school and home those teachers of the olden time attended strictly to their own affairs and meddled not with those of father and mother in the upbringing of the child, it does not follow that this all-important topic was neglected in the education of our little ones.

Something of this thought must have restrained the first speaker in the Chicago meeting, Prof. C. B. Henderson, of the University of Chicago. To him had been delegated the explanation of the aims and purposes of the Society of Social Hygiene, and, as we are assured, he spoke very sensibly. He maintained that students ought to be aware of the ruinous consequences of immoral practices, but when he touched the question of what should be done in practice he shrank from the nasty thought that young people's minds should be flooded with the phantasms sex instruction must induce. He dreaded the giving of direct information and pleaded for the imparting of high ideals of honor and virtue. A very Christian thought, be it observed, and one which happily, if indirectly, implies the cogent necessity of religious instruction, the one sure source of such ideals.

Dr. William Belfield, to whose rantings AMERICA has paid its compliments on a former occasion, spoke on "the Boy." The choice is a fair indication of the attitude the Society of Social Hygiene would be likely to hold should that body be consulted in the matter of appointments to the proposed lectureships. Dr. Belfield, in his utterances as reported at least, is a rank materialist, and how Christian men and women could listen to his words passeth understanding. He bluntly stood for the principle of the improvement of the human kind by the regulation of the animal instinct alone. He claimed, with seeming approval, that all nations except those of Indo-European stock have ever been polygamous. Even Christ, he presumed blasphemously to assert, did not teach monogomy; and—strange how reckless these self-sufficient teachers dare to be—public opinion in Europe did not frown upon promiscuous intercourse among the unmarried until the Puritans arose to condemn it. He ignobly pleaded for sex instruction of pupils on the ground that many dollars are spent yearly to improve the breed of stock, but nothing is done to improve the quality of children.

No doubt it is to stamp oneself an obscurant to express regret that women should have participated in such a discussion. It was the old-fashioned notion that the crowning glory of woman, her modesty, forbade her to enter into the arena where there is struggle, contention, heartburning, excitement, agitation, everything which is adverse to the true character of woman. Woman, it used to be affirmed, ruled by the sweet and noble influences of her character, and the sweetest and noblest of these was the reverent respect which that exquisite thing, womanly purity, claimed even from the most depraved among men. The world is changing all this, but it attempts an inconceivable miracle when it fancies that the beautiful reverence characteristic of the past is to survive the shock of open discussion by women of topics once prudently and properly reserved for the physician's consultation room. Has respectability gone vice mad? The spectacle of the virtuous housewife out with her student lamp trying to study the Social Evil is a fearful commentary on the changed ways that mark our so-called progress.

Yet the Chicago audience heard two women, Doctor Rachelle Yarros and Mrs. Ella Flagg Young, pathetically pleading against the world-old rule forbidding prying reflection into certain of the deeper things of life, regarding which, especially in the case of the hot, passionate nature of young people, too much reflection is sure to prove an unwholesome and disturbing influence. Both of these admitted the danger of sex instruction in schools, both conceded its introduction into the Chicago public school curriculum to be something in the nature of a hazardous experiment, both protested their regard for the advocacy of high ideals of honor and virtue, yet both affirmed the experiment to be absolutely necessary. The necessity they drew from the devastating influence of immorality, which they argued, had reached such a pitch among us that no evil resulting from the plan they favored could be worse. There was a noteworthy inconsistency, by the way, between this claim and Mrs. Young's assertion that scarcely any vice existed in Chicago's schools. 'Why, then, proclaim the need, one might ask, of so desperate an expedient as sex instruction? They both ignored, apparently, the evident truth that the protection which our sexual natures most require is not protection from outside influences but from our own thoughts.

Fortunately there was present in the Assembly Hall one who would not permit this really dominant thought in the subject to be ignored. The Rev. J. W. Melody, Professor of Moral Theology in the Catholic University of Washington, had been selected to represent the views of those who oppose the "new thought" in our schools. And Dr. Melody fulfilled the trust admirably.

"The movement to introduce instruction in matters of sex into the curriculum of public schools," the Chicago Tribune reports him as saying, "is only another expression of a prevailing purpose to establish in the school a dumping ground for the discharge of duties and offices that tradition has heretofore restricted to the home. Leaving aside even the question regarding the place for the instruction, we do not hesitate to affirm that mental enlightenment, as such, is altogether inadequate to afford the moral check sought for by our hygienists. 'I see the better and follow the worse,' said Ovid. Yet we know what small measure of restraint is brought about by such instruction. It bestows light, but it does not impart power. And it is precisely an increase of moral potency that is essentially called for. We should teach the children that morality, not so much as hygiene, is the absolute essential for a chaste and happy marriage. We should teach them the commandments of God rather than the physiology of sex. But it is not morals but hygiene that is emphasized. It is argued that right information is required to counteract the misrepresentations which are so frequently imparted by vicious associates. But the subject of class-room discussion, though it be ever so delicately and skilfully presented, will be later called upon by the depraved as a theme on which to exercise their scurrility and mischievous wit. What instruction is to be given to boys and girls should be given in the home and by the Church."

And with Dr. Melody's genuinely Christian handling of the topic AMERICA expresses its full and cordial assent.

The Civic Theatre*

The Civic Theatre, as defined by the author of the book and of the idea, is "not merely the commercial theatre reformed; not an art theatre for art's sake alone; not the municipal theatre of Europe transferred to American soil; not an organization on the precedent of the New Theatre; not primarily a repertory theatre. A Civic Theatre is the efficient instrument of the recreative art of a community." As such it evidently becomes a place and a phase of organized leisure for recreative and cultural purposes. Such seems to have been, in great measure, the Greek ideal.

This, America, whose institutions would seem to be not out of harmony with the democratic ideal of the Greeks, might make its own. For the efficient instrument of the recreative art of a democracy must be democratic in its ideal and working system. Such an instrument must, moreover, be as permanent as the community whose recreative art it would express. Hence, it must be endowed. Endowment is the only guarantee of permanency, the only thing that makes an institution instead of an experiment. For a public institution, public endowment, aided, however much by private grants, is the only congruous form. With such a basis of operation, the imagination of a whole people, seeking its recreation in artistic expression, may be trusted to attain that goal which the commercial theatre so signally fails to reach (perhaps to aim at) but which would be the raison d'être of a Civic Theatre, namely, the elevation and education of the masses in their leisure hours and holidays.

Merry England has ceased to be, with its folk-wide system of healthful, tuneful recreation following after and preparing for a day of toil. The industrial revolution, not to mention the religious one, is an accomplished fact. The joy of toil is clouded over with the smoke of coal; the songs of labor are drowned by roar of wheels. To joyless toil spent on the endless reproduction of the parts of things, succeed hours of disorganized leisure eagerly exploited by the keeper of bar, or dive or garish "show." The millions of silver dollars so expended have been all tabulated by statisticians; the billions of golden hours so squandered, no man has numbered.

Let the people find themselves in permanent possession of an efficient instrument for their recreative art, a Civic Theatre, not subsidized but endowed, and that publicly, and it takes no prophetic eye to see the diffusion of culture through every rank and caste, the nationalization of an art now confined to self-complacent culture centres, the adequate expression of a patriotism now seeking a voice in flag-waving and fire-crackers. Plying the actor's calling under the noblest auspices actors ennoble it and make it truly a profession; as Sophocles made it and as Demosthenes was not ashamed to practice it. The vital interest of an audience in a play for which they are themselves responsible and in which their friends are taking part, increases the educational function of the production. The producers, no longer merchants or hirelings, feel the dignity and responsibility of public functionaries and rank with the curators of public libraries and museums. Even the humblest of their aids, the craftsmen engaged on costumes, jewelry, armor, scenery and lights, bring to their labor a zest that makes for artistry and finish. But on none in his community more than on the poet and dramatist will the Civic Theatre react benignly, offering him a medium of expression that is large because it is civic, passionate because it is intensely local.

* The Civic Theatre in Relation to the Redemption of Leisure; a Book of Suggestions. By Percy Mackaye. New York: Mitchell Kennerly.

Such a constructive enterprise would seem no less worthy of civic enthusiasm and activity than are our park concerts, public libraries and museums, universities and institutes of study and research; nor any less possible of realization. For the bug-bear of politics and political influence which is so often invoked as the insurmountable obstacle to a Civic Theatre has been generally conspicuous by its absence from those other institutions and can be, with the exercise of like vigilance, excluded from the Civic Theatre.

Enlisting in its support a cultured group of responsible public officials, a corps of local artists devoted to its success, a host of citizen-actors, professional and amateur, joined in a rivalry, friendly but keen, a guild of producers endowed with business ability and technical skill, a Civic Theatre would fairly select "what the public wants" from the best of tragedy, comedy, masque, pageant, music and dance to grace its annual repertoire, inviting its audience to its spacious portals by its own architectural charm and beauty of location, rather than by lurid display of lights and bill-boards. It would not rely exclusively on the motive forces of local skill and artistry, but would render these forces efficient by an organization as thorough as those which govern our local libraries and other such educational projects. The local theatres rendered mutually helpful by the State organizations and these again coordinated though not dominated by a central board connected with the American Federation of Arts, and provided with a well-paid director to cooperate in organizing local civic theatre committees, and to initiate the civic theatre idea in all leading American communities. This is the form of organization approved by the Convention of the American Federation of Arts. As frequent as are the recurring periods of nightly, weekly and holiday leisure, so frequent and incessant would be the appeal of the Civic Theatre "to fill time instead of to kill time."

Such an appeal was heard by the polished citizens of Periclean Athens, the ruder Medieval guildsmen and their townfolk were not deaf to it, English and American audiences that have gathered in thousands to witness the recent pageants and masques have shown a responsive chord, whether they gathered from the crowded streets of Boston to witness Father Kenzel's "Pilate's Daughter," or in the Redwood Groves of California to partake of the Bohemian "High Jinks," or assembled on Independence Day to enjoy some safer and saner expression of our joy in National Independence than can be afforded by a small boy and a big cracker.

We have endeavored to summarize this book in the fewest possible words, and those for the most part in the author's own. Its perusal and study we commend to all who are interested in the education of popular taste, or in the initiation of movements which are calculated to appeal to the great unguided mass of our fellow-citizens. Some of the author's suggestions may be impracticable—he is a poet. But before rejecting them we may remember that they merit a critical examination; for he is a young man that has succeeded not by lowering, but by maintaining his artistic ideal. Moreover, his ancestry and his training have kept him in practical contact with what is best in stage-craft. The powers he would arouse and organize are momentous. Well directed they might easily lead to an American renaissance. Neglected, their currents may easily turn aside into pagan sensualism, or be scattered and wasted on the shoals and flats of low commercialism.

MARK J. MCNEAL, S.J.

An American who has any concern for his country may well be alarmed at the announcement in the daily press of what faces our judges as they open the fall term in New York. We are told that the first undefended divorce calendar for the new court year was called by Supreme Court Justice Giegerich, who found that he had 184 cases listed for trial, in all of which the defendants had failed to answer the charges against them.

The court found that many of the plaintiffs were German, Russian, Italian, Yiddish and French, and he sent these cases to Justice Donnelly for trial in order that the court interpreters might all be together.

Many of the cases on the calendar were adjourned, but the four Justices heard the majority of the matrimonial actions in the course of the day at the rate of about five an hour for each Judge.

The anarchists and socialists may now take a breathing spell in their efforts to batter down the present structure of society. The courts are doing the work for them; not wilfully, indeed, but compulsorily. They are merely carrying out what the laws of the land decree.

IN MISSION FIELDS

The Mission in the Caribbean Sea

The Rev. A. Stroebell writes, in St. Joseph's Missionary Advocate, of the Missions in the Caribbean Sea, now in charge of the Josephite Fathers of Mill Hill, England:

It was in the year 1900, when I had charge of the St. Augustine's Negro Mission in Louisville, Kentucky, that I read an article in the German Messenger of the Sacred Heart, edited in Cincinnati, about two little islands, St. Andrew's and Old Providence, belonging to Colombia, South America. It was stated in this article that in these islands, which were inhabited by English-speaking negroes, no attempt ever had been made by a Catholic priest to establish the Catholic religion.

I at once applied to my bishop for permission to go there. Coming to New York I was told that no steamships go to those islands. I therefore took the steamship to Jamaica, Cartagena, Colombia, Limon and Costa Rica. In the latter port I was told that occasionally small sailing boats set out for the islands. At Limon I was detained four weeks on account of the yellow fever prevailing there. At last a miserable little sailing boat set out for St. Andrew's, having four colored men as crew, I the only passenger. They told me that with a fair wind we would get over in about four days. Unfortunately, we had either no wind or contrary wind nearly all the time, and the consequence was that it took us fourteen days instead of four.

For fourteen days I lay on the bare deck of the little boat, day and night without the least comfort. The food the crew had, yuca and salted pork, my weak stomach could not digest, so I fasted fourteen days, and when we finally landed I was so weak that I could scarcely stand on my feet.

When we entered the harbor of St. Andrew's a fellow passing us in a canoe asked the crew of our boat who the stranger was they had on board, and when they said a priest, he replied, "We don't want no priest." This was the welcome. My first call was at the house of the Prefect of the Government, reaching there at about 11 A. M. I was still fasting, for in our troubles on sea I had promised to celebrate Mass in thanksgiving on the day of our arrival, if we should land before noon. With the consent of the Prefect I fulfilled this promise in his room.

After Mass I tried to get a lodging-place somewhere, there being no hotel or restaurant in the island. Everywhere I got the same answer: "No room." Sick and feeble as I was from the fatigue of the voyage and long fast, I tried to walk to the north end of the island, as I was told an ex-Captain Hoopman lived there and had a big house and small family and might give me lodging. On the way there I got so weak that I broke down and sat on a stump of a tree till somebody passed by who helped me to reach the ex-captain's house.

I found the owner sick in bed and unwilling to keep me. He told me that he was a strong Baptist and that he wanted no trouble with his pastor, and that I would have to get the latter's consent before he would keep me. So I had simply to submit to the condition, hunt up the important preacher, and then returning with the required permission, I got a room. On the following day the tropical fever threw me on my cot, on which I could not move for two weeks. The first good Samaritan that called was not the Prefect nor any of the other officials of the Colombian Government, who were all (nominal) Catholics, but a Jew, Abraham by name. One of his boys I afterwards baptized, who later became my altar boy. It took me some months to regain my strength. I celebrated Mass daily on a little table in my room all alone. After six months, assisted by the offerings of friends in the United States, I put up a little frame building. Downstairs I used for divine service, up under the roof was my living and sleeping place.

Six months later I visited the island of Old Providence with some of the people, arriving on a Saturday. I went at once to see the head preacher of the three Baptist churches, Simon Howard by name, and introduced myself as a Catholic priest, and offered him my services for the following day.

He looked at me in surprise and said: "What can you, a Catholic priest, do for me?" I said, "I can preach for you," to which he replied, "I fear this might be dangerous"; still, after a moment's reflection, he consented. So I preached in the Baptist church on the following day. It was the first Sunday in Lent; naturally, I preached on Christ's passion and death and our redemption by Him.

After service Mr. Eusebius Howard, a half-brother of Simon, came up to me and invited me to preach the same sermon also in his church on the following Sunday, to which I consented. Eusebius formerly had worked with Simon, but a split in the flock made him start a church of his own. Something occurred during the week which prevented me from keeping my promise to preach in Eusebius' church, but I fulfilled my promise later on. I had made arrangements with Eusebius to come and stay a week or more and give a revival, or mission as we call it, to which he and his people consented. Instead of one week, it lasted three weeks, closing December 8th, 1902, with the conversion of Eusebius and nearly all of his flock. Thus the former Bethel Baptist church became the cradle of the Catholic Mission in Old Providence Island. Eusebius has since been called to his eternal reward. Rev. Father Timothy St. John (Connelly), whom I met in Philadelphia the following year, 1903, became my first successor, offering his services for the Mission in spite of his age, 61. He was a holy soul, and worked hard all alone after I went to Cuba. Before long he got up another chapel on the east side of the island. In 1910 his strength gave way, and he died in the hospital at Panama.

The colored Sisters of Divine Providence whom I had taken to the island from Baltimore in 1903, and who, for the short time they stayed, had done a great deal of good among the young girls, had no perseverance and left. During the past few years the Josephite Fathers of Baltimore had charge of the Mission, and two young priests, two brothers, the Fathers Albert, natives of Brooklyn, New York, had worked with great success, adding two more mission chapels, when all of a sudden the Colombian Government asked the Apostolic Delegate to have the Josephites of Baltimore replaced by other missionaries.

This is in short the history of the foundation of the first Catholic Mission in these islands. The present Josephite Fathers have a great work before them and deserve assistance, for more chapels are needed and Corn Island must also be looked after. My health being broken down, and having recently undergone a serious operation, I felt obliged to retire to my native place, and can only assist my successors by my humble prayers.

CORRESPONDENCE

The Religious Question in the French Provinces

In passing a judgment upon the religious condition of France, it is necessary to draw a line between Paris and the provinces; the aspect of things being absolutely and wholly different, according as we view them from the one or other standpoint.

Roughly speaking, it may be said that over a hundred years ago, at the end of the eighteenth century, the spirit of skepticism and revolt that was one of the causes of the Revolution of 1793, grew up and was fostered in Paris. The provinces were, at that time, comparatively untouched by the dangerous doctrines of the so-called philosophers, whereas, at Versailles and in Paris, they were looked upon as oracles, believed in and followed by the most intellectual society of the day.

Now, there is in Paris a distinct and most encouraging religious revival; this is a certain fact and one to be gratefully recognized by those who have at heart the welfare of the eldest daughter of "the Church." Since the separation of the Church and the State, the former has gained in influence and in vitality; even parishes have sprung up in the Paris suburbs and there the poverty of the Church, robbed by the State of her legitimate possessions, only seems to stimulate the generosity of the faithful. The Catholics have learnt to unite their forces and sink their individual preferences and sympathies in devotion to a higher ideal. Several important associations, that, at different times, have been presented to the readers of AMERICA, unite the "young men" of France, the Catholic railway employees, the Catholic workmen, etc. Clubs, guilds, athletic associations, "cercles d'études," where the leading questions of the day are studied and discussed, besides many other Catholic groups, too numerous to mention within the narrow limits of this paper, have sprung up and, in spite of obstacles and difficulties, are flourishing at the present moment.

True it is that in Paris, more than elsewhere, the evil powers are actively at work, but hostility acts as a stimulant and opposition breeds self defence.

In the provinces, things are different and after residing in the heart of a province and watching the religious movement from the standpoint either of a small town or of tiny village, it is impossible not to recognize that the Catholic workers in Paris have the better part.

In time, it is true, we may believe that the religious revival that has begun in Paris, will influence the provinces, just as, over a century ago, the skeptical spirit of the free thinking philosophers, spread from the French capital to the uttermost extremities of the kingdom, but, at present, the revival is too recent to have penetrated so far. In the provinces, the Catholic workers are hampered in many ways and they may be forgiven if occasionally they are discouraged by the apparent fruitlessness of their efforts.

The Government schoolmaster who, if he belongs to the younger generation of teachers, is generally, from policy, if not from conviction, an "anticlerical" and a socialist, has far more influence in a village than in a large town; in addition to his functions as a teacher, he occasionally acts as the legal adviser and secretary of the ignorant folk, who surround him, hence his influence not only over his scholars, but over their parents, who often claim his assistance.

Moreover, human respect, once so prevalent among all classes, is now considerably diminished, in all large centres, but it still tyrannizes the Catholics of small towns and villages. In Paris, stress of business prevents interference with the private affairs of others, independence and freedom to follow one's own opinions, are admitted and the "espionage" that exists in the provinces, has no place. It is otherwise when the lack of interest and the fact that people have little to do and live close together, encourages mutual interference. We know of certain small towns, where a "fonctionnaire," a Government servant, however unimportant his functions, risks his position every time that he attends Mass on Sundays, owing to the rabid anti-clericalism of his chiefs. Added to this, there exists in most provinces a certain spirit of routine and indifference that has a depressing effect upon the endeavors of many ardent workers. Hostility may be faced and endured more easily than apathy. Then again small jealousies, mean motives and childish timidity have greater play, where intellectual life is less elevating and active. For all these reasons, to which many others might be added, the part played by the Catholic workers, priest or layman, in the provinces of France, is often a difficult and disheartening task; it needs zeal and tact, but above all it needs patience. Let us add that in speaking of the French provinces, we must make an exception for those of the Western region, Brittany and Anjou, where conditions are absolutely different and the spirit of the people has remained thoroughly Catholic.

Nevertheless, although, taken in the abstract, the religious revival that undoubtedly exists in Paris, has, as yet, incompletely influenced the provinces, there are hopeful symptoms ahead. The associations that have been founded in the capital, are gradually spreading throughout the country; the practice of frequent, even daily Communion, is slowly but surely gaining ground, even in places where a spirit of Jansenism lingered among the older generations; the custom of holding Catholic local meetings, is taking root and the advantage of these gatherings cannot be exaggerated. The congresses of the railway men, of the "Jeunesse Catholique," the "Congrès Eucharistiques," the "Congrès Diocésains," the "Séminaires Sociaux," and many other gatherings bring the scattered Catholics of a province or a diocese together on the common ground of religion and charity. These meetings are not successful always, they sometimes begin with a failure; the provincial Catholics, unaccustomed to public action, have to get used to the methods of their Parisian brethren. But in the long run, they reap the benefit of these public demonstrations, that, experience proves it, are infinitely useful. The younger men, especially there, learn to count their forces, to feel that they are not isolated workers, but members of a compact army; they must throw human respect to the winds and take their stand openly as practical Catholics, who are proud of the faith that they profess.

We write these lines from a little town of Northern France, where, some years ago, religion seemed almost dying out. There is no sensational or miraculous change, but a slow and steady progress. The excellent pastor, to whose care this difficult portion of the Lord's vineyard was entrusted only three years ago, had everything to rebuild, owing to a long period of stagnation that allowed decay to creep in everywhere. The spirit of his people is always indifferent, sometimes rebellious; the small tradespeople are, as a rule, ungenerous in their attitude towards the Church and its pastors and the officials distinctly hostile. Only two or three influential Catholics can be counted upon to help the lonely priest in his uphill progress. The place is poor and the Church has absolutely nothing to depend upon except the voluntary gifts of the faithful, that are insufficient to meet its necessities. Yet a tiny, almost imperceptible new life is growing up; there are more Communions, more worshippers in the once empty church, more willing spirits to assist in the charitable works, whose existence is a constant struggle. A recent congress of la "Jeunesse Catholique," that took place within the walls of the little town, was an unqualified success and a "Congrès Eucharistique," in a neighboring village, is spoken of with wonder and admiration.

Let us add that in this case, the pastor of this hitherto barren soil, works on patiently and untiringly, without counting the results; these are bound to come, but given the conditions of religion in these little towns, it is wiser to put away all thoughts of a rapid transformation. That the members of the younger generation of intelligent Frenchmen are more keenly alive to their social and religious responsibilities than were their elders is perhaps one of the most encouraging symptoms of the future. It leads us to believe that in time the religious revival, whose existence is undeniable in the large centres, will penetrate to the remote and apathetic little cities, that lacking alike the simplicity of the country folk and the intellectual development of the capital are in consequence the most difficult to handle. Norway Coming to Its Own

An old Norwegian legend tells us that in the times when Otho I was ruling in Germany from the year 936-973, an Irish princess, St. Sunniva, who was remarkable for her beauty and wealth, as well as for her fervent piety and charity to the poor, left the Emerald Isle to escape the tyrant who endeavored to take her prisoner and to seize her kingdom. With several faithful subjects she embarked in three ships and after a perilous voyage on a stormy sea arrived at Selja, an island on the coast of Norway. As a protection against the pagan inhabitants of the Norwegian continent they took refuge in the caves of the island. But the pagans under the leadership of Haakon Ladejarl set out to kill them. Anxious chiefly for their souls' salvation, they asked God to let the rocks of the cave fall on them, so as to protect them from the hands of their enemies. Their prayer was heard. The great rocks crumbled around them and formed an immense sepulchre, so that the pagans, in spite of all their efforts, found no victims upon whom to wreak their hate.

But when Olaf Tryggvason ascended the throne of Norway and propagated the faith with tireless zeal in all of his kingdom, miracles, so history says, began to take place at the tomb of the martyrs. The king himself went to Selja and succeeded in finding not only the bones of the martyrs, but discovered that the body of the saint, which exhaled a sweet perfume, was intact. A chapel was built on the island and in it were placed the relics of the saint. That was in the year 996. Later on in 1170 the bishop of Bergen translated them to his cathedral where they were placed in a magnificent shrine. At the time of the Protestant Reformation the shrine was destroyed, and Catholic worship along with the remembrance of the holy martyrs was buried in as great an oblivion as were the relics of St. Sunniva under the rocks of the Island of Selja. But just as in the time of Olaf Tryggvason there were miracles, so in our days remembrance of the martyrs is beginning to exercise its empire on the minds of the people of Norway. This is true not only for the Catholics of the country, but for Protestants, who in spite of themselves feel its influence. The excellent little weekly review of the Catholics of Norway called the "St. Olaf" furnishes us with a striking example: On the feast of St. Peter and St. Paul a cross was erected at Drayseidet in commemoration of what Olaf Tryggvason had done in 997 when he introduced Christianity in those parts. After the ceremonies had been brought to a close, says the "Fjordenes Blad," the Protestant paper of Norway, some of those who took part in the festival went in motor boats to the rocks of the monastery of Selja, which is not far away. About two hundred people gathered on the rock which is called Sunnivahemmeren. At the entrance of what was once the choir of the church the celebrated singer, Kvalheim, described in a brief discourse the ancient buildings of Selja. After having drunk at the spring of St. Sunniva they met again at the church of St. Alban, which is so remarkable for its imposing tower. There the Pastor Hognestad standing before the main altar intoned the Pater noster, in Latin, using the old melody of the middle ages while the assembly listened respectfully with bowed heads and hands united in prayer. It is, says the "Olaf," a striking proof of how the recollections of the past exercise an unusual power on the national mind. Not only were the Catholics in that assembly so impressed, but Protestants as well, who know very little of the grandiose and solemn worship of the Middle Ages, yet who now feel themselves impelled to do what they can to revive the memory of their ancestors.

More powerful than the remembrance of St. Sunniva is the memory of St. Olaf, the holy king of Norway, whose relics in the Middle Ages reposed in the Cathedral of Trondhjem. The distinguished educator, Mr. Iverson, in a recent article written in Norwegian patois tells how the first impulse which he felt when he was on his way towards the faith came from the impressions he experienced in the Cathedral of Trondhjem, where the memories of St. Olaf and St. Halvord and many other holy personages still linger. In fact what is more natural than that the Norwegians should revive old Catholic memories there while they are celebrating the ancient glories of their kingdom. It was the Catholic, Olaf Tryggvason, who in the year 1000 brought Christianity not only to Norway, but also to the Orkneys, to the Faroe Islands and to Iceland. The one who carried on the work was king Olaf in the year 1030. He was the great king and the great saint of Norway the champion of Christianity, and at the same time the founder of national unity, the organizer of its laws and its government.

It is true that his work was destroyed when the Reformation was imposed on the country by royal decree in 1539, and that the Catholic Hierarchy, the strongest rampart of national independence, was overthrown. After that, Protestant superintendents who were tools in the hands of a foreign king ruled the land. The silver shrine of St. Olaf was melted down and sent out of the country. His work for the moment seemed to have perished. If he had been only a king, his countrymen would hardly have remembered him, but being a Catholic and a martyr his name has been kept in veneration through the centuries by millions of Catholics of all nationalities. To-day the royal martyr, just as he was victorious after his death at Stiklastad in 1030, is now reconquering his native land. The day of his death, the 29th of July, is becoming more and more the national holiday of Norway, just as it was in the Middle Ages, and St. Olaf crowned with the memories of the past and the hopes of the future, arises before us as Norway's immortal king.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

The Two Assemblies

The great Episcopal Convention which inaugurated its proceedings on October 8, in the still far from finished cathedral on Morningside Heights, is at least an indication that the interests of religion have not vanished from the lives of great numbers of the American people. It was imposing; it was impressive; the social standing of the bishops and ministers and laymen who took part in it lending something to the effect produced on the public mind. But the disunion or dissension which immediately manifested itself in the opening session must be a matter of grave concern to those who are interested in its success, as it was jarring to those who read the account of the proceedings in the daily press. Its chief aim seems to be not so much to increase its power for good as to avert disaster. Whether it shall change its name from Protestant to Catholic, whether it shall recognize divorce for one reason or none, whether it shall permit the remarriage of divorced persons, whether its ritual is to be high or low, appear to the onlooker the main purpose of this great Convention.

It is in striking contrast with that other assembly which is to meet in Boston on October 19, under the auspices of His Eminence Cardinal O'Connell. That gathering is not a church convention, but a missionary congress. All, or nearly all, of the dignitaries of the Catholic Church in the United States, including the Apostolic Delegate, the three Cardinals of Boston, New York and Baltimore, and the bishops and archbishops of the various sees, with an unprecedentedly great multitude of priests from every part of the country, are to meet for the furtherance of one sole object, viz.: the extension of the Kingdom of Christ in the minds and hearts of their fellow countrymen. There is not nor can there be, inside or outside of that assembly, any dissension or division about doctrine or discipline or ritual or Sacraments. All that is unalterably fixed, and there can be no doubt or hesitation or discussion in the heart or on the lips of any one of the delegates, from the highest to the lowest. The sole purpose of all those who participate in its deliberations is to devise new and more effectual means to teach the doctrine of Jesus Christ and to impart the strength that is given by the Sacraments He has established for the purpose of combating the supreme danger that now confronts us of ignorance, unconcern and contempt for the supernatural, and the utter absorption in worldly material and sensual things, both of which mean the ruin of our country.

Would that those who met on Morningside Heights had the same union in faith, in doctrine, and in Sacraments!

A Boy on Sanitary Reform

The disappearance from apothecaries' windows of cheerful advertisements of tan and freckle lotions, mosquito exterminators and ice-cold drinks, and the reappearance there of the saddening cough lozenges and grip and cold cure, tell us, though the sun may still be warm and the air may still be bland, that summer is over and that winter is drawing near.

As we were mourning summer lately, led thereto by our study of an apothecary's window display, we remembered how a few weeks before when the dog star was at its culmination, we had crossed the continent from San Francisco, and had noticed, as we came further and further East, ponds, streams and rivers crowded more and more with bathing boys. Much of the water was certainly unwholesome, and the bathers were running a risk of typhoid. Here we perceived a new field for the exhaustless energy of health reformers. Every boy in the land might be given an instantaneous microbe detector, and warned not to go in swimming until he had tested the water. But, in the first place, does such a detector exist; and, in the second, could a boy be trusted to use it—unless he were a boy scout? A better way occurred to us. Let an army of medical students be employed to inspect the bathing places and to certify the innocuous. The medical schools were in vacation, and the students would have been glad to get a little of the public funds. But would the average boy abstain from uncertified waters? On the whole, it seemed that a drastic method would be best, the more so as the health reformer has a peculiar love for drastic methods. Let such bathing be forbidden by law, and let a policeman watch every place where transgression is possible.

A bright looking lad was beside us, and we asked him what he thought of the plan. "Typhoid," he answered, "is no joke, especially as it is likely to cut one off in the bloom of his youth. But how many boys are bathing three or four times a day during the summer in unwholesome waters, and how many catch typhoid from doing so? Would it not be rather hard to deprive so large a number of their chief summer joy, in order to save comparatively few? It seems to me that there ought to be a proportion in these things."

The boy was right. Sanitary reform in itself is good. The error of the sanitary reformers is, that they ignore all proportion in the matter. And proportion touches many other things than mere numbers.

School Survey in Ohio

The example given last year in the City of New York, where the Hanus Committee was empowered to make an exhaustive investigation of conditions existing in the common schools, is being followed in Ohio. During the last session of the General Assembly of that State a bill was passed, the Seward Act for a School Survey, to have the school system of the Commonwealth thoroughly examined. As in New York, impetus to this piece of school legislation came from the desire of many citizens to learn the reason of the apparent lack of correspondence between the results attained in the schools and the enormous increase in the public school taxes. The expenditures for educational purposes in Ohio have grown, it seems, from fifteen million dollars annually to thirty-two millions within the last decade.

The School Survey will be in charge of a Commission of three members appointed by Governor Cox. They work without pay and may expend $10,000. The Governor has already announced his selections for the important work. They are all of a certain reputation in educational circles, and they will supervise the work of experts who will attend to the immediate details of the investigation under the directions furnished by the Municipal Bureau of the Sage Foundation of New York.

A writer in the Cincinnati Telegraph some time ago expressed his apprehension lest the vast work done by Catholics in the cause of education in Ohio, as elsewhere, may not be fairly judged and fairly appreciated in the coming work of the Survey. The Chairman of the Commission, Mr. Oliver J. Thatcher, known by the history text-books he has published, is not without bias and prejudice where he speaks of the organization and growth of the Catholic Church, and he may carry his superficial and unhistorical views and his injurious aspersions on the Church and the Papacy into the investigations and findings of the Survey.

One ventures to hope that the apprehension will prove to be without cause. The Catholics of Ohio are to-day supporting 370 parochial schools in which 93,393 children are enrolled. If to this number there be added the total registration of boys and girls now being trained in Catholic orphanages and other institutions we shall have a grand total of 103,684 pupils educated in the Commonwealth at Catholic expense and under Catholic auspices. Surely the members of the Survey Commission will not be so remiss as to fail to give fair consideration to the rights and example of self-sacrificing members of the community who, in bearing this burden, save the State much money and perform a work meritorious in the highest sense. Using the liberty of education, which all of us claim, they seek to promote the temporal and the eternal welfare of their offspring, the coming generation, and at the same time they further the well-being of the State. For this, after all, must always rest on justice, obedience to law, and respect for authority, all of which are engendered only by the teaching and practice of religion, which instills in our children the fear and love of God and true charity for our neighbor.

The Penalty for Trespassing

In a paper entitled "A Nation's Neglect," Marcus A. Dow, General Safety Agent for the New York Central Lines, contributes to the Outlook of September 27, some sobering reflections suggested by the fact that 5,284 trespassers were killed on our railways during the year ending June 30, 1912, while the grim harvest of such accidents during the past twenty years yields a total of 86,733 dead and 94,646 injured. "A large number, that's true," the careless reader will say. "But they were tramps, for the most part, no doubt." By no means. Though 36,276 of these victims were tramps, 25,000 of the remainder were children or young people less than eighteen years of age, and about 120,000 were wage-earning citizens of the vicinity in which the accident occurred. Mr. Dow attributes this enormous list of killed and injured to the "happy-go-lucky recklessness and defiance of the natural law of prudence which is a largely prevalent trait of us Americans," and for the cure of the evil he prescribes a twofold remedy: education and legislation. Children must be taught at home and at school to keep away from the railway tracks, manufacturers ought to be constantly warning their employees of the danger of taking "short-cuts" across the tracks on the way to and from work, and laws should be passed and enforced making it a criminal offence to trespass on the roadbed. The accidents that befell those who walked on the railways of England and Ireland during ten given years were 5,754. In this country during the same period such casualties numbered 103,432. The marked difference in these figures is chiefly due to the fact that in Europe a living law forbids all trespassing on railways.

Aroused by this deplorable sacrifice of precious lives, our legislators, we hope, will make laws to protect such trespassers from their own folly, and railroad officials, police and judges will see that the violation of these laws shall be promptly and severely punished. Parents and teachers, too, will wisely take care that their boys and girls are taught how dangerous it is to play around cars or to walk on the railroad. The caution and vigilance school children in many places are now being trained to exercise regarding the perils of streets through which a stream of trolley cars, wagons and automobiles is constantly rushing, are quite as necessary, judging by Mr.

Dow's statistics, when there is question of railways and locomotives.

Catholic Courses of Social Philanthropy

Philanthropy, as now commonly understood, is the material side of charity. The complex civilization of our present day, the vast and heterogeneous populations of our large cities, and above all the restriction of the Church's influence, which alone was sufficient in happier days to solve the multiform problems of poverty and suffering in accordance with the spirit of Christ, are a few of the many reasons which have made of the civic ministration of charity a difficult and complicated problem. Schools of philanthropy have therefore naturally arisen to answer to the need of the times. In some of these institutions materialism is openly taught, in others materialistic tendencies constitute a serious danger for the pupil.

Since Catholics are rightly interested in the teaching of social experts upon these questions and many are already holding civic positions for which such a knowledge is imperative, it is plainly necessary that an opportunity be afforded them of attending courses of civics and philanthropy based upon Catholic principles. The first attempt to bring together leading Catholic specialists from juvenile courts, circuit courts, protectorates, working boys' homes, industrial commissions, public and private institutions, and municipal and State departments to satisfy this constantly increasing demand has now been made by the Loyola University Lecture Bureau of Chicago, under the direction of Rev. Frederic Siedenburg, S.J.

Two series of lectures, each covering a period of ten weeks, have been prepared. The first of these courses, to judge from the prospectus, is mainly concerned with general social principles and practical philanthropy; the second is purely economic, treating exclusively of industrial questions. Each course consists of twenty lectures. It is hoped that this first effort will be the beginning of a completely developed and permanent school of Catholic Philanthropy, affording opportunity to Catholic probation officers and other officials, as well as to social students, of acquiring the necessary scientific and technical knowledge combined with sound Catholic principles. It is a movement which we trust will likewise be taken up in other large cities.

Let us Learn from France

In the hope of stopping the steady decline in the birth-rate of France, Emile Borel, a statesman of that country, proposed some time ago that this offer be made to married couples: "Square the number of your children under twelve years of age and multiply by thirty; the result will be the number of francs the Government will pay you every year." The $200,000,000 which the adoption of this expedient would annually cost an already over-taxed population were to be raised, with admirable justice, chiefly from bachelors and small families. That M. Borel's measure would much retard the progress of "Neo-Malthusianism" in France is doubtful. The only effective remedy for that evil is, of course, the restoration of vital, practical Catholicism to all the people of the country. The very fact, however, that a subsidy of $200,000,000 is proposed to encourage the rearing of large families indicates that French statesmen realize the perilous nature of their depopulation problem.

Yet with France's example before us, our legislators, as a contemporary points out, have framed an Income Tax law which puts a premium on raising, not large, but small families. "The exempted income," we read, "has been reduced to $3,000; a man living with his wife is entitled to a further exemption of $1,000 and an additional $500 for each of not more than two minor children." In other words, the law makes very unwelcome the arrival of a third baby in a household of moderate means. But if the average American married couple are to bring up but two children, it is plain that before long we shall have a depopulation problem of our own. Indeed there is little enough encouragement being given nowadays to the rearing of large families without our legislators practically setting a tax on the third child. For employers favor men and women without families, no boys and girls are wanted in modern apartment houses, our present economic and industrial conditions keep thousands from marrying, and selfishness and love of ease keep other thousands who are already married from bringing up children. While France is subsidizing large families, we are penalizing them.

The Remedy for Poisoned Morals

Commenting upon the grave menace to public morals that lies in the evil literature so widely read nowadays, the New York Times' "Review of Books" has these words of wisdom:

Public opinion averse to the circulation of books of bad tendencies and magazine literature of an obnoxious sort can be exerted most effectually if the books are left unsold on the booksellers' hands and the magazine publishers are brought sharply to understand that filth does not pay. . . . The author of a book of immoral tendency is culpable, and the publisher shares his culpability. But blame also is the due of people who read the book, discuss it, and encourage others to read it. He who touches pitch is defiled, and the idea that some of us are immune from defilement is erroneous.

To the foregoing AMERICA utters a fervent Amen. We do not agree, however, with the writer's contention that the prosecution of those who publish and distribute filthy books and periodicals is unwise and inexpedient. The general public, we maintain, should not find it easy to buy such works. The young and innocent should not be exposed to the temptation of reading them. But while the salacious magazine and the unclean novel are advertised, exhibited and sold on every news-stand and in every book store, shall good men do nothing but refrain from buying the poison? Shall the weak and curious, however, be invited to infect themselves with it as freely as they desire?

The chemist who sells dangerous drugs to irresponsible people is sent to jail. The publishers and distributors of literary poison should be dealt with similarly. With the least notoriety possible let the objectionable magazine or book be completely withdrawn from circulation and then let those who publish it be prosecuted for corrupting the public morals.

The Times' writer entertains the hope that there will soon be a "healthy reaction from the baneful influence of so-called realism," of which there is just now such a disgusting orgy, and for our comfort calls attention to the fact that the American literature that has stood the test of time is free from all indecency. Grateful for the reminder, we share his hope that present conditions will speedily improve. The most effective means for bringing about this change the Times' reviewer tells us when he writes with uncompromising courage: "What is needed more than anything else to restore the social equilibrium is a revival of the religious spirit."

Excellent! Nothing truer was ever said. If the American people could only be made to believe sincerely and practically that the publishing, selling and reading of filthy literature is a serious sin of scandal and impurity which a just God will surely punish, bad books and periodicals would largely cease to be printed, circulated and read.

Europe's Preparations for "Peace"

There has lately been published in France a startling article dealing with the stupendous growth of armies and navies in Europe. The article is from the pen of Senator Gervais, a recognized authority on military matters. He points out how "at the very moment when all nations profess the strongest aspirations toward universal peace, Europe is in a perfect frenzy over military preparations." And the rapid sketch he gives of the situation across the seas admirably justifies the strong words he uses. Aside from the Balkan troubles, he points out, and the new French and German service legislation which summons 1,500,000 men to the flag yearly, there is scarcely a European parliament in which projects for military reorganization and reinforcement are not discussed.

England has its campaign in favor of compulsory service and a stronger territorial force; Spain is trying to settle the problem of recruits for her new navy; Belgium has her militia question and the ever-present discussion of how best to insure the country's neutrality in case of continental war; Italy's Chamber of Deputies has passed and sent to the Upper House a bill to increase the peace standing of the army by 25,000; Austria's War Minister is preparing a measure to increase the number of recruits from 197,000 to 220,000 in 1918, and to raise the total peace standing from 464,000 to 600,000. Last year, Mr. Gervais informs us, the world's expenditure for the upkeep of armaments was $1,000,000,000, of which immense sum France paid out one-fifth. He adds that the army budget for this year calls for $240,000,000, exactly the same amount in these days of peace as France expended in the great war year, 1871.

The Hansa League, a powerful semi-political organization in Germany, made up of bankers, merchants, manufacturers and shippers, has begun a movement to bring into activity a long smoldering crusade against the American Tobacco Company's influence in that country. This League, it will be remembered, which came into being in 1910 to counterbalance the autocratic powers wielded by the Farmers' Alliance, was especially active last year in prosecuting the plan to throttle American competition in the petroleum industry. The present movement takes the form just now of a vigorous appeal from the League to the Government for repressive measures against the Tobacco Company. The petition sets forth that a large number of German cigarette factories, either partially or entirely, have come under the control of the American Tobacco Trust. So the peril is imminent that still a larger number of the independent concerns will succumb to the transatlantic octopus. "The independence of a very flourishing branch of German industry," says the appeal, "is thus menaced, and an incalculable injury will be done to our economic life." It is also pointed out that the German cigarette manufacturers have hitherto been trying to defend their own interests by a mutual protective association formed for the special purpose of fighting the American invasion, but that this has proved powerless. The hope is therefore expressed that the Government will intervene officially and forthwith institute a thoroughgoing investigation.

.....

The zeal of the French politicians in seizing church property may be explained by the following bit of real estate news taken from La Croix. The Grand Lodge de France (Scottish Rite) has just installed itself in a new establishment in the Ville Lumière, otherwise Paris. The new Masonic Home is an old convent appropriated or expropriated a few years ago. It cost originally 1,400,000 francs to build. M. Duez the ill-famed liquidator sold it for 350,000 francs to an individual with the French name of Bernheim, who in turn sold it to the Lodge. They are thus in a cuckoo's nest. Moreover, attached to the convent, is a chapel which rents at 128,000 francs a year for a moving-picture show. In three years the Masons will have that also and can listen at their ease to their vociferous and gesticulating Grand Master, M. Mesureur, who likewise occupies the lucrative office of Chief of the Public Charities. His charity evidently begins at home.

LITERATURE

The Story of Waitstill Baxter. By KATE DOUGLAS WIGGIN. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Co. $1.30.

The story, too, of Patience Baxter, her half-sister, and of their triumphant lovers, Ivory and Mark. The scene of the novel is down in Maine, and the time the early part of the last century, when the local sect of Cochranites started. The story abounds in those faithful descriptions of New England farm life for which the author is justly famous, and also contains some good character sketches. There is the serene Uncle Bart, for instance, who appraises his shrewish wife thus:

"Your mother's gen'ally credited with an onsartin temper, but folks does her great injustice in so thinkin', for in a long experience I've seldom come across a temper less onsartin than your mother's. You know exactly where to find her every mornin' at sun-up and every night at sundown. There ain't nothin' you can do to put her out of temper, 'cause she's all out aforehand. You can jest go about your reg'lar business 'thout any fear of disturbin' her any further than she's disturbed a'ready, which is considerable."

Waity and Patty are amiable heroines, but their father is too cruel and miserly and the girls too patient and submissive to be altogether lifelike. But unless all three had acted as Mrs. Wiggin describes, Waitstill of course would have had no "story."

Ozanam. Livre du Centenaire. Par MM. GEORGES GOYAU, LÉON DE LANZAC DE LABORIS, HENRI COCHIN, EDOUARD JORDAN, EUGÈNE DUTHOIT, MGR. ALFRED BAUDRILLART. Preface de M. RENÉ DOUMIC, de l'Académie Française. Paris: Gabriel Beauchesne. 6 Fr.

The present Ozanam centenary volume is a monument worthy of the man to whose memory it is dedicated. The many-sided genius of the great French layman of the nineteenth century could have been interpreted in no better way than by the method followed here. The work before us is the product of the intelligent collaboration of a company of noted French Catholic writers and specialists, each of whom has treated that phase of Ozanam's activities which entered into his own particular sphere of work. Each contribution may therefore be considered as a monograph study, perfect and complete in itself. The preface is written by M. René Doumic, of the French Academy. It is brilliant in style and full of sympathy and admiration for the man from whose lips came that glorious appeal which may well be repeated to our own generation: "The earth has grown cold. We Catholics have the duty to revive its vital warmth which has died away; we must bring back the age of martyrs."

Literature, history, philosophy, science, languages, law and economics were all made contributory by him to one sole purpose, the demonstration of the truth of the Catholic Faith. He combined in a rare degree exact scientific knowledge with popular eloquence and possessed that rare and precious gift, a poet's soul which could pour forth its thoughts in glowing words. When only eighteen years of age he had already laid down the plan and purpose of his entire life: "To know a dozen languages in order to consult original sources and documents, to obtain a sufficient understanding of geology and astronomy in order to be able to discuss the various national and scientific systems of chronology and cosmogony, to study in fine universal history in its full compass and the history of religious creeds in its profound significance—all this I must accomplish to arrive at the expression of my idea." This idea, which he was to give to the world enhanced with the charm of poetry and substantiated by the facts of science and history, is, he tells us, "the perpetuity and Catholicism of religious thought, the truth, excellence and beauty of Christianity."

His lectures had therefore, as M. Doumic remarks, what in the jargon of our day would be called "leur caractère tendancieux ou confessionnel." This Ozanam admitted with pride; for why should not the Catholic teacher use every opportunity to defend the truth, when the godless lecturer makes it his purpose to attack it, no matter what branch of knowledge he may discuss. "Those," says Ozanam, "who do not wish to see religious profession made in a scientific work accuse me of a want of independence; but I know nothing more honorable than such a reproach. I can not imagine a true-hearted man putting his hand to the hard task of writing without being moved by a supreme conviction, on which he consequently depends."

It is well therefore that Ozanam should be studied from many points of view, as is done in the present work. M. Georges Goyau is especially fitted to treat of his college and student years, his intellectual apostolate. M. de Lanzac de Laborie, historian and a leading official in that society which remains as the greatest work of Ozanam, describes from original sources the foundation itself of the Society of Saint Vincent de Paul. M. Edouard Jordan, Professor of the Faculté de Lettres at Rennes, devotes a special critical study to Ozanam as a historian. M. Henri Cochin, in his popular literary style, deals with Ozanam as a fellow man of letters whose purely literary value and often poetic language will continue to engage the attention of the literary world. A no less interesting article follows treating of the social and economic ideas of Ozanam. It is from the pen of Eugène Duthoit, Professor of Political Economy at the Catholic University of Lille. Most characteristic, finally, of the supreme aim of the great Catholic leader is the concluding section of the book, L'apologiste, by Mgr. Alfred Baudrillart. A highly valuable appendix is added to the work in the extensive chronological bibliography compiled by M. l'Abbé Corbierre.

For all the disciples and admirers of Ozanam this ably edited and handsomely printed volume will prove a delight.

The Seventh Wave and Other Soul Stories. By CONSTANCE E. BISHOP. London: Washburne. 3s. 6d. net.

A remarkable series of psychological tales, original in conception, Catholic in thought and tendency, and told in a distinctive style with exceptional power. "The Seventh Wave," which occupies nearly half the 228 pages, takes its name from the supposed fact that every seventh breaker is the largest, and in this and some of the succeeding stories one may detect other inaccuracies, more apparent than real, occasioned by the author's eagerness to stress the particular purpose in view at the expense of minor issues; but the purpose is always healthy and stimulating, and if the form is sometimes in conflict with convention, the central principle is soundly Catholic and hedged all around with many beautiful flowers of piety and poesy. The symbolism of "Lachryma Sancti"—in which the physical injection of holy tears is used to soften souls—will escape many readers, but they will understand that the intercession of the saints and personal sacrifice are important aids to conversion. "The Professor's Awakening" is an extraordinarily striking picture of skepticism, its causes, processes and cure; one that lingers in the memory and convinces mind and heart together. The book is a valuable contribution to Catholic literature.

One Hundred Years of Peace. By HENRY CABOT LODGE. New York: The Macmillan Company. $1.25.

This is a very interesting book of some hundred and fifty pages, in which the author gives briefly but clearly the history of Anglo-American relations during the hundred years of peace. He shows very plainly that the hundred years of peace were not a hundred years of amity by any means. Perhaps England was superior to America in culture and refinement during the greater part of the period—Americans who visited England and saw its rural and slum population; Americans who did not visit England, but who saw the Irish coming to their shores in the state to which English rule had reduced a people who needed only bare tolerance to reach the position commensurate with their natural gifts, had their own ideas on the subject—but it was hardly good manners to be insisting on it so pertinaciously, as Mr. Lodge says without much circumlocution. He shows, too, how near war was a good many times during the hundred years of peace, and that, with the single exception of the Trent affair, it was averted only by England's backing down.

We can hardly pretend that this book is a contribution to peace literature. In fact, it reminds us a good deal of the cry familiar fifty years ago, and even later: "We've whipped you once, we've whipped you twice, and we'll whip you again." But we do not think the less of it on that account. We may take it as a testimony that sentimentality is not going to ensure peace, but strict honesty and the renunciation of jealousy on both sides. So long as England and America are unable to control jealousy, and each counts it a triumph to gain some petty advantage at the other's expense, the peace between them must be that of the last hundred years, unstable and in danger of a breach at any time. H. W.

In the October Atlantic there is a very noteworthy article entitled "Science and Mystery," by Harry Emerson Fosdick, which waives aside with contempt "the ultimatum in the concluding paragraph of one of our well-known books" that "mysteries must give way to facts"; in other words, that religion must be supplanted by science. This nonsensical claim, he points out, is based on the delusion that science has penetrated all the mysteries of the universe and that nothing more remains to be known, whereas the very reverse is the case. According to Edison: "No one knows one-seventh billion of one per cent. about anything," which is a rough and ready way of expressing what Job had said long ago: "We are but of yesterday and know nothing." St. Paul tells us, "We now see through a glass darkly"; and Socrates, "One thing I know, that I know nothing." Or taking men of a different stamp, Herbert Spencer assures us that "in its ultimate nature, life is incomprehensible," and Professor William James admits that "in the whole subject of immortality science must confess her imagination to be bankrupt." Even Hackel grants that "essence and substance become more mysterious and enigmatic the deeper we penetrate into the knowledge of nature." Indeed, far from removing mysteries, science multiplies them, and the agnostic Huxley declares that "whoso appreciates all that is involved in the falling of a stone can have no difficulty about any doctrine simply on account of its marvelousness."

"Science," says the author of the article, "has wrought many achievements, but it has not cleared up a single elemental mystery, and it has created a thousand lesser mysteries that never were imagined until science came. Even science starts with faith; a hypothesis ventured first and then defended. The materialist who plants in the vast flower-pot of chaos his primal seed of matter and, like a gigantic master of legerdemain, waves his wand of words over it until the whole flowering universe grows from the dirt, is exercising faith as evidently as is the Christian when he rejoices in God, the Father Almighty, the Maker of heaven and earth."

The purpose of the writer is to show that, contrary to the prevailing clamor of the unthinking, "religion is an inevitable element in human life," and though "the mourners have gathered many times to give her remains a decent burial, the obsequies have always been indefinitely postponed." It is all very true and exquisitely said, but there is an utterance at the end of the paper that is unfortunate. "Religion," he says, "is life, of which theology is the theoretic formulation. Religion puts on creeds like garments, and wears them, as science does hypotheses, until, worn out, they must be thrown aside for better." But, it may be asked, what about those creeds that are not "hypotheses," but are the clear, categorical, unqualified affirmations of Christ? They surely can never be "outworn and cast aside for a better." Nor can it be said, as he urges further on, that religion is a warm confidence in the testimony of man's best hours that the spiritual life is real. "Warm confidence" may easily grow cold, and the memory of "one's best moments" is not a solid foundation in the shock of life's storms. Something more stable is needed. Nor is "the witness of the world's greatest souls that God is good" sufficient. Even the world's greatest souls may testify something false. St. Paul supposes the possibility of even an angel doing so, and warned the first Christians not to hearken to him if anything were said contrary to the doctrine of the Apostles. In brief, the true religion is one based not on our own feelings or the testimony of men, but on the word of the Son of God; and its "theoretic formulation," its creed, can never be outworn. It was meant for all peoples and all circumstances, and all times, and it has the divine promise of unchangeableness until faith gives way to vision.

"The Forty-ninth Annual Report of the Carney Hospital, South Boston, Mass., for the Year 1912," has been issued as the Golden Jubilee Number, for last June that institution celebrated its fiftieth birthday. The attractive booklet we have received contains a short history of the hospital founded by Andrew Carney in 1863, and announces, together with many other interesting facts, that since that time more than 70,000 patients have been received and 1,593,000 have had help from the Out-Patient Department. The Sisters of Charity, in whose efficient charge the institution has been from the beginning, deserve hearty congratulations for its continuous success and high reputation, as do all the doctors, nurses and benefactors, too, who have helped to make Carney Hospital what it is.

The Rev. A. Ailing, S.J., Professor of Latin, St. Xavier's College, Bombay, has out a pamphlet which John Murray publishes, entitled "Why Not Latin? or Latin, the Future Esperanto of the Cultured World." The author makes a strong plea for the restoration of that ancient tongue to its former place of eminence in learned circles, and sees no good reason why an educated Englishman, before ten years are past, should not be carrying on "an easy conversation in Latin with an educated German, Frenchman or Italian." However bright the prospect of such a consummation may be in India, here in the United States certainly it is not good. Though there is a commendable movement among us to make Latin a living language in the class-room, the number of young people who care to study the tongue at all is growing steadily less. Esperanto also has evoked little interest over here. As English is now, to a large extent, the commercial language of the world, no doubt it will eventually be the learned one too.

Just as Elinor F. Kelly's "Our Lady Intercedes" has for its object the increase of the reader's confidence in the Blessed Virgin's power in Heaven, the purpose of the same author's "Blind Maureen, and Other Stories" (Benziger Bros., 60 cents), seems to be the winning of clients for St. Anthony of Padua. He does not figure, however, in all the ten edifying tales in this book, for there is a ghost story among them, for instance, and another about the priest-hunting days in Ireland. Miss Kelly has so strong a sense of poetic justice that her tales never fail to end properly, though sometimes at the sacrifice of literary art.

"Behind the Garden Wall" (Paul Elder & Co., San Francisco, $1.00) is a book of "magic verses on the under side of things," written for the nursery by Robert Wallace. Little children will probably enjoy Elsinore Robinson Crowell's clever pictures more than the author's rhymes. The same house is publishing "The Social Rubáiyát of a Bud," by Mrs. Ambrose Madison Willis (75 cents). The booklet is more daintily printed and illustrated than the flippant parody deserves.

As a sort of companion volume to Mgr. Robert Hugh Benson's "A Child's Rule of Life," a Longmans book which we favorably noticed in our issue of November 2, 1912, P. J. Kenedy & Sons now have out "The Children's Hour of Heaven on Earth, with Pictures by Lindsay D. Symington, and a Talk, with Tales and Texts, by Fr. Vincent McNabb, O.P." (45 cents). Six little poems are selected from the writings of Francis Thompson, S. Baring-Gould, Katherine Tynan Hinkson, Wilfrid Meynell and Father Tabb. Thompson's "Ex Ore Infantium," here entitled "Little Jesus," is the poem that small children will probably understand and enjoy the most. Father McNabb's explanatory talks are good and in several instances quite necessary, if the verses are to be intelligible to tiny hearers. But all will like the pictures.

"The Promises of the Sacred Heart," a new book by the Rev. Joseph McDonnell, S.J., the editor of the Irish Messenger, is similar in plan and treatment to his "Litany of the Sacred Heart," which was commended in our issue of June 29, 1912. The preface of the present volume establishes the genuineness and credibility of the famous revelations Blessed Margaret Mary had, and then follow twelve chapters containing a good commentary and meditation on each of the twelve "Promises." Religious and those who have June or First Friday devotions to conduct will be glad to know of this book. Instead of 90 cents the price should be about 60.

The North American Review of October tells us that to understand Croce's "Philosophy of the Spirit," the reader should imagine himself standing like bold Pizarro, on his peak of Darien, surveying at a great distance the vast outline of a New World. The "peak" is becoming crowded, for does not Keats assure us that it was "the stout Cortez," who "with eagle eyes stared at the Pacific, silent upon a peak in Darien"? And do not most people know that it was Balboa who posed on the "peak"? Of course, Pizarro was with Balboa on that occasion, but was not "staring at the Pacific." He with the rest of the men, if we are to believe the poet, "looked at each other in wild surmise." Possibly this avoidance of the correct is the claim to distinction of the "Philosophy of the Spirit," which insists that "we only err because we wish to do so," and perhaps that is why the article in the North American Review informs us that "Michael Angelo built the Vatican."

THE DRAMA

"Sweethearts"

In Kathleen O'Meara's "Life of Ozanam" an incident occurs somewhat germane to our present theatrical troubles. Young Ozanam had left home to begin his studies in Paris. Having previously met Chateaubriand at Lyons, he made up his mind to call upon the great man, who was just then in all the splendor of his literary and diplomatic career. It was Sunday morning. Chateaubriand, who had just returned home from Mass, received the young man with the greatest cordiality, inquiring solicitously about his studies, his projects, his surroundings, etc. Finally, fixing his eyes intently on his visitor, he inquired: "Have you visited any of the theatres?" Ozanam hesitated. He had promised his mother to shun them, but for a moment he feared that this distinguished man of the world might regard him somewhat as an oddity or a curiosity. However, the struggle was brief, and he answered in a straightforward fashion that he had not yet seen any play and did not intend to see any in the future. "You are right, young man," said Chateaubriand, "the theatre will do you no good, and may do you incalculable harm."

Possibly we may all have to follow the same course of abstention, at least for some theatres. In which case we shall not be worse off than the primitive Christians, who could go to none, so universally indecent were the plays in those days. How far their paganism was removed from some of our modern productions it would be difficult to say. Perhaps, however, the Parochial Movement which, we are informed, has been successfully inaugurated in the diocese of Grand Rapids, may have some effect in bringing about a revolution in stage morality. A circular has been sent out broadcast to excite interest in the crusade, but the document was too prolix to reproduce, and we are not sure that we quite grasp the tactics to be employed. However, we wish the undertaking the fullest success, and will further it with all our power, once we master the methods to be followed.

Meantime, while this army is forming—and we trust that nothing may interfere with its speedy mobilization—there is no reason why individuals may not wage a guerilla warfare of their own. That mode of fighting is often most effective in worrying the foe. Thus, for instance, one of our subscribers, of his own initiative, took to task the managers of a great theatre in New York on account of the characters that appeared on the boards in the play of "Sweethearts." Part of the play was enjoyable, he wrote, "only to be marred in the second act by a representation of four ridiculous monks. Our party happened to be all of Irish descent, and the Irish are generally known to be good-natured and able to see a joke, even, I think, when it is on them, but this was too much. The actions of these pseudo-monks were offensive to us, imitating, as they did, in a rather lengthy song, a Litany of the Catholic Church, and deporting themselves in a way totally unbecoming the monastic habit they wore. We went to your play because it was recommended by a Protestant, but under the circumstances we could not possibly recommend it to any of our Catholic friends. A few Catholics will attend it as we did; but, as you know, there are many thousand Catholics in New York who will hear something unfavorable about "Sweethearts." The writer also threatened to tell AMERICA.

The management immediately took alarm and wrote to us protesting that under no circumstances would they sanction "anything that could give the slightest offense to your great cause." They communicated at the same time with the objector, saying "they would feel regretful if the Catholic community shared his criticism of the Monks' Quartette in the production of 'Sweethearts.'" Our greatest ambition has been from the very formation of the firm to promote only wholesome and welcome amusement, free from any offence, suggestiveness and class or religious distinction."

"The composer of the musical number," continued the managers, "is Victor Herbert, himself a Catholic; and in Falka, one of the greatest of all French Opera Comique, by Chassaigne, a Roman Catholic himself, and produced in a Catholic Republic, an incident similar to that in 'Sweethearts' passed unchallenged. In literature the jovial, genial, characteristic and convivial spirit of the monk has been the inspiration for many a classic volume, notably those of Boccaccio."

In this amazing palliation of the passage objected to is the explanation of how many of the present day abominations find their way to the stage. It is the result of the dense ignorance of managers and playwrights about the commonest facts of both literature and history, even the most modern, as well as an inability to appreciate or even suspect Catholic sensibilities in the fundamentals of religion and morality.

In the first place, to tell me that I ought not to mind these roystering monks because a Catholic wrote the music, is to suppose that Victor Herbert was a costumer and stage-setter as well as a musical composer. Secondly, to attempt to soothe me by saying that "the convivial spirit of the monks was the inspiration of many a classic volume" is to presume that when I have been insulted already by poets I would not mind being treated in the same way by play actors; but to add that such was "the inspiration chiefly of Boccaccio" reveals the fact that the apologists are unaware that Boccaccio was one of the most unclean writers that ever defiled a page. Thirdly, it is no consolation for us or condonation for Chassaigne, composer for the Paris Opera Comique, that he is a Catholic. If that be so, we heartily wish him distinction in a better place than the Opera Comique. But to describe France as a Catholic Republic is to make the sardonic old Clemenceau and Briand and Combes, and the rest of the band of atheists who rule France and hate Catholicity as the devil hates holy water, grin with delight. France a Catholic Republic forsooth!

The managers' apology reveals the fact that at least some of the purveyors of public amusement are not bad at heart, but need a university extension course. Meantime the letter of the offended theatregoer may suggest similar target practice for other sharpshooters.

EDUCATION

Daughters of America, Ohio State Council and the Public Schools—Carnegie Endowment Fund Again Repudiated

One whose particular charge in life makes it necessary for him daily to skim through a number of the newspapers published in this land of ours can not but marvel at the inconsistency in the life of our people which even a hurried reading of the day's spread brings to his attention. Theory and practice are so pointedly at variance at times that one is curious to know whether such old-fashioned things as "principles of right conduct" and straightforward honesty have place in the lives of some men and women who aspire to leadership among their fellows. An incident in the chronicle of recent happenings in Cincinnati, as sketched in the Enquirer of that city, on September 4 last, may serve as an illustration. The twentieth annual convention of the Ohio State Council, Daughters of America, was in session in the Queen City on that date, and one of its "big" features was a grand mass meeting held in famous Music Hall, at which P. P. Claxton, of Washington, D. C., United States Commissioner of Education, was the principal speaker.

The writer cannot boast of any extended knowledge of the aims and purposes of this organization of Daughters, but the fact that one speaker at the mass meeting coupled its name with that of the Junior Order, United American Mechanics, in his tribute of hearty praise for its achievements is not soothing to Catholic sentiment. It was the national Secretary of this body, a Mrs. Julia T. Roth, of Toledo, Ohio, whose speech suggests our wonder. She spoke on the "Daughters of America and the Public Schools," and in the course of her address explained quite frankly how the Daughters work in various communities for the good of the public schools and for the placing of good members on school boards. She warned her hearers against the dangers of having any particular religion taught in the schools, and against permitting public funds to be used for the maintenance of religious schools. "We believe," said she, "the Bible should be read in our public schools, not to teach sectarianism, but to inculcate morality. It is the recognized standard of all moral and civil law. We therefore believe our children should be educated in its teachings, but that no dogma or creed should be taught at the same time."

We quote the words not to comment on the outrageous inconsistency of the speaker in rejecting what she is pleased to term "sectarianism," while in practically the same breath she proclaims her accord with a "sectarianism" that is quite as pronounced as any fashion of the thing she denounces. To teach pure morality untouched by the "corrupting" influence of defined dogmatic teaching has ever been the avowed party cry of a body more fanatical in its creedless creed than any Christian denomination the country has known. Of course the inconsistency of insisting that men and women, no matter what their religious belief, must accept with minds content the lifeless thing these "neutrals" in religious faith propose to put upon them escapes the attention of such as presume thus to insist; that is just what is to be expected from would-be leaders who deliberately avow their faith in a morality which, despite the obvious truth of existing relations, would prescind from every reference to God's revelation to man with all that this implies.

We refer to the address of the National Secretary of the Daughters for another reason. Last September there assembled in Milwaukee a magnificent gathering of Catholic men and women, representatives of the Federation of Catholic Societies in the United States. That body spoke for millions of worthy citizens of the country. Suppose some one, in the course of its sessions, had uttered the words the Enquirer reports as having been addressed to the Cincinnati meeting. Suppose some delegate had explained just how they "were working to place good members on the school boards." He would have been strictly within his rights, had he as an American citizen of good standing been prompted to such action. He would have represented men interested in the public schools as a national institution, if for no other reason than that of the burden of tax the school system lays upon them. He would have stood forth as one claiming the full freedom of a citizen to discuss the needs and prospects of an institution intimately connected with the welfare of the people. He would have exercised his admitted right to suggest proper means and measures to further the interests of that institution. He would have used the privilege of every free American voter to urge the adoption of the policy which appealed to him. Yet had such words been spoken from the platform of the Federation what a torrent of condemnation would have swept in upon the body with the rising of the next day's sun! Why is it that what is virtue in one is vice in another? Why must Catholics refrain from all expression of candid opinion regarding the system and management and courses of study and supervision of the common schools, under penalty of the odious charge that they seek to dominate and control for their own special, selfish purpose? Is it not within the possibilities that Catholics are quite as proud of their country, quite as enthusiastic over the stupendous example their country is showing to the world in its generous outlay for educational purposes as are these self-assertive declaimers who, with a cocksure-ness that amazes one, proclaim the absolute supremacy of the neutral or non-religious school idea among us? Perhaps the time will come when men and women who fear God and revere His law will not endure in placid patience the off-hand throttling of their holiest feelings, simply because the loud-voiced clatter of men and women who scarcely understand the terms they use decry the religious school among us. "Without any beating about the bush, religion must have a place in the school," writes Father Hudson in his "Notes and Remarks" of a recent issue of the always interesting Ave Maria, "or godlessness will grow from less to more in the life of the republic." He had just quoted the words of the Rev. Mr. Radcliffe, a New York Presbyterian minister, who surprised his congregation a while ago with this new expression of an old truth:

"The Godless school ordains an immoral citizenship. It is not enough to make edged tools: the hand should be trained to use them. Culture unsanctified prepares for guilt and graft. . . . Our common schools can not afford to ignore the functions of conscience. As the conscience is, so is the individual. There is nothing morally beneficent in mere knowledge; chemistry can not reform a drunkard, nor can botany make a thief an honest man. It is a popular fallacy just now that vice springs from ignorance and poverty, and virtue grows from knowledge and competence. We must restore the ideals of our school system, or prepare for the barricade and the riot."

And, just as a remark by the way, the Enquirer notes that Dr. Claxton, the United States Commissioner of Education, was the principal speaker on the occasion we refer to. He told of the great strides that have been made both in democratic freedom and in education during the past hundred years, and showed by figures that the number of pupils and the amount of money spent for our public school system have doubled within a brief span of years. He spoke of the many criticisms made against the public schools, and strove to show that they were not founded on fact. May we assure him that one criticism is founded on fact, that, as the Rev. Mr. Radcliffe affirmed, the "non-religious school ordains an immoral citizenship," and strive as he may, he will never prove that it is quite "enough to make edged tools: the hand should be trained to use them."

From Cleveland, Tenn., early in this month, came the news that the Holston Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South unanimously voted to indorse the action of the College of Bishops and the minority of the board of trustees of Vanderbilt University in declining to accept an offer of $1,000,000 by Andrew Carnegie for Vanderbilt University's medical school. The resolutions express regret "that the terms of said gift, as set forth in Mr. Carnegie's letter, were such that it could not be accepted with honor."

SOCIOLOGY

Social Constitution and Social Reform

Zeal for others' welfare is praiseworthy. Hence one cannot but have a kindly feeling for those who busy themselves in social reform. Whatever criticism we express in the matter touches their methods, not the underlying motives. The methods are often wrong because the knowledge of the nature of human society is wanting. One must know the construction of a machine before he is allowed to undertake its repair or its improvement. A physician must understand the nature and the functions of the human body before he is licensed to practise. This rule is followed in every profession and trade; but when it comes to human society, anyone seems to be a competent legislator or a sufficient reformer. Hence we shall say a few words on the nature of that society and draw a few conclusions.

Human society is the union of individuals in order to obtain the common good. It contains two elements: the active principle, authority, and the passive principle, the individuals. The former binds the latter together, directing them to the common good; the latter, united by the former, attain the common good under its direction. Human society is a divine institution in the sense that it comes necessarily from human nature created by God, who has made man necessarily sociable. Its two elements, with their functions, therefore are of divine institution. Submission to authority is a divine law: the due exercise of authority is an obligation of which a strict account is to be rendered. The social bond of union is not physical force, but moral. It is not to ensure merely exterior union of effort, but an interior union of minds and wills. The end of society is the common good, about which there are not a few misconceptions.

One misconception is that the common good means the greatest happiness of the greatest number. This is a contradiction in terms. It implies that the happiness of each individual in society is impossible of attainment, whereas the common good must be of its very nature the good of each one. Its logical consequence is that to procure the maximum of happiness for the maximum of individuals, the members of the minority may be used as means, their happiness sacrificed, their rights ignored. It is, moreover, a rule impossible of application. Who can decide on that course of action which will attain it absolutely? Yet, supposing it to be the true rule of social action, only such a clear and absolute conception could justify the infringement of the rights of the meanest individual. Hence its practical application would involve a multitude of injustices. We may note, too, that it restricts the idea of happiness to mere material enjoyment, to the exclusion of the highest good of man.

Another misconception is that the common good is the perfection of society in itself, apart from the individual good of the members that compose it. Those who take this view represent concrete society, the State, the Municipality, and so forth, as a machine; the individuals, as its wheels, rods, pistons, cylinders, springs, cogs, etc., whose only function is to cooperate in the perfect action of the machine, finding in this their perfection. This is the modern idea of the absolute supremacy of the State and is the complete inversion of the relations between society and the individual. It makes the individual and his rights mere instruments in the hands of the State to be used by this to attain its ends; whereas the State is for the individual. The only reason for its existence is that man needs organized society to attain the end of his creation. This is the last end of man; and the State is but one of the means God has given him to reach it.

The common good of society, then, is not distinct from the sum of the individual good of its members. God has put man in this world primarily, not as a race, a nation, a class, but as an individual with an individual end to attain, with individual rights and duties, by the exercise or performance of which he is to attain it. But He has made man a social being. His rights and duties are mixed up with the rights and duties of his fellow man; and, therefore, are not to be considered independently of them. In presence of these duties he may acquire new rights; in presence of these rights he may be bound by new duties. His individual rights may, in collision with higher rights of others, become suspended, or even extinguished; in which case it is no longer his good even as an individual to exercise them. The rights that he may acquire from relations with others, become his individual rights and the exercise of them appertains to his individual good. The function of authority is to coordinate and to subordinate all these rights and duties of the individual members of society according to justice, to facilitate and protect the exercise of what may be justly exercised, to determine according to justice between rights in collision; and the individuals who claim by right its protection must also submit to its determination and direction. Thus, according to divine institution, social authority binds together the individuals, uniting their minds and wills to attain the common good.

This should be well understood by social reformers, especially when they begin to speak of certain afflicted individuals as a "menace to society." Too often they do so with some of the false social ideas we have pointed out, and thus run the risk of committing grave injustice. Above all, they must remember that they are but individuals, however earnest they may be, and that above them is authority to which they must submit.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

We have already called attention to the battle which Bishop Busch of Lead, South Dakota, is waging for Sunday observance in that mining town. Its latest phase occurred when Father Thill left for Belgium. The bishop's opponents sent out the following despatch from Lead on September 27:

"Pope Pius will be asked to use his office in the local controversy between Bishop Joseph F. Busch and the Homestake Mining Company, which the bishop maintains is entirely due to his efforts to force Sunday observance here. Father Thill, pastor of the cathedral here, after several conferences with Bishop Busch, departed for St. Paul, where he will confer with Archbishop Ireland and then proceed to Rome to lay the matter of the status of the Roman Catholic Church here before the Vatican. It is believed that a way out of the present difficulties will be found by the papal authorities."

To this the bishop replied:

"The above dispatch is wholly and absolutely false. Father Thill goes to Belgium with my permission to attend to private business matters. The attitude of the Church authorities toward the Lead situation is amply shown in the following letter to those who recently signed a protest against myself.

✠ Jos. F. BUSCH,
"Bishop of Lead."

Following up the telegram a certain number of Catholics of Lead thought they would help the bishop's opponents by appealing to His Excellency the Apostolic Delegate, from whom they received the following letter, which we trust will recall them to their senses. It is addressed to Mr. Jas. L. Curran:

"Dear Sir:

"Herewith enclosed, I am sending back the protest that you and your friends sent me against the Right Rev. Jos. F. Busch, Bishop of Lead, because it is full of disrespect for him and is unbecoming Catholics.

"The bishop in his address before the convention of the Federation of Catholic Societies in Milwaukee, and in his circular letter treating of Sunday inobservance in Lead, amply acknowledged the liberality of the Homestake Mining Company toward its employees in general and towards the Catholic Church in particular.

"If you had only carefully read these two documents, you would not have felt the need of sounding the company's praises as if the bishop had not already fully lauded its generosity.

"The bishop denounced, as contrary to the laws of God and of the State, the habitual inobservance of Sunday in Lead, placing the greater part of the responsibility for it on the Homestake Mining Company.

"And thus far this has not been denied by anyone, not even by the friends of the Company, when they formed their resolutions in their meeting of the 6th inst. This fact of Sunday inobservance being once established, it was not only a right of the bishop, but it was also a duty for him, to protest, which he did precisely in virtue of those 'religious prerogatives' that you attack in your protest, and yet at the same time, say you, 'are not in any manner attempting to interfere with.' You similarly disregard these religious prerogatives when you haughtily declare that 'you are opposed to the formation of any Catholic Working Men's Union in the diocese,' as if it belonged to you and not to the bishop to look after the welfare of the faithful. And withal you boast of the fact that you are Catholics.

"You say you are true and loyal friends of the Homestake Mining Company, and of this I have nothing to say, provided your friendship for the company does not cause you to grieve and offend a bishop of whose apostolic zeal and courage you should be proud.

"I am sending enclosed in this letter the copy of an editorial taken from the Telegram, a paper of Deadwood, South Dakota, that will enlighten you about the true situation in Lead.

"A copy of this letter will be sent to the Right Rev. Bishop.

"I am, yours respectfully,

✠ JOHN BONZANO,

"Archbishop of Melitene, Apostolic Delegate."

The following letter will throw much light on the spiritual condition of the Philippines, whose independence has now been formally promised by the new Governor-General, Mr. Francis Burton Harrison:

The Bishop's House, Zamboanga, P. I.

I respectfully invite your attention to the following facts regarding the lately erected Diocese of Zamboanga:

1. It is one of the largest and newest dioceses under the U. S. A. flag, its first bishop having taken possession in September, 1912.
2. It is one-third of the Philippines in area, 600 miles from north to south, 600 miles from east to west, and includes 300 different islands.
3. Local history is, three centuries of bloody encounters with the Moros or Mohammedans; nor is travelling alone universally safe, even at the present day.
4. This diocese includes all the warlike Moros of Sulu, etc., and most of the pagans of the whole Philippine Islands.
5. Our Catholics are generally poor: they have been more interested in protecting their lives than in amassing wealth.
6. We have only 70 priests to cover an area of 40,000 square miles, and this cut up into 300 separate islands, in typhoon-swept seas.
7. We have not sufficient priests to attend the Catholics (300,000) much less to reach all the pagans, though our priests are most anxious to give up their parishes and go into the mountains, if I can get other priests to replace them.
8. Some parishes, formerly of ten to fifteen thousand souls, have been without permanent priests since 1898: as a result I found, when I came here, that some 50,000 Catholics had become Aglipayan heretics, for want of priests to sustain and instruct them.
9. Under American rule, many settlers from the northern Philippine Islands are pouring into this diocese, but we have no priests to send them.
10. We have many American planters of hemp, cocoanuts, etc., but the majority are non-Catholic.
11. We have not a single diocesan institution: no hospital, seminary, college, high school, or asylum of any kind.
12. Half of the children die before the age of five, for want of care, though the land is fertile and the climate excellent.

13. We are dependent on the charity of Protestant Missionaries for Hospitals, who, it must be confessed, are most anxious to have Catholics go to their institutions.

14. In time we shall have descendants of many Americans and millions of Filipinos. Now we can decide what religion shall be theirs.

15. Help us in the beginning, and then, please God, we shall be able to take care of ourselves; send us a subscription to repair our churches, put up a few dispensaries and get homes for poor children; above all, speak to apostolic men to relieve our greatest need, that of priests who will give spiritual food to the many souls that are perishing through lack of it.

Yours faithfully in Christ,

✠ M. J. O'DOHERTY, D.D.,

Bishop of Zamboanga.

July 21, 1913.

In the August issue of Pax, the quarterly published by the Benedictine Community of the Isle of Caldey, the Right Rev. Francis J. Mostyn, Bishop of Menevia, tells the arrangements finally made by the Holy See in regard to Caldey Abbey and its Community, who were received into the Church during the present year. In his statement Bishop Mostyn says:

"As regards the Abbey itself, the Holy See now recognizes it as a canonically established Benedictine Monastery with a novitiate. The observance hitherto followed at Caldey, being in accordance with the holy rule of St. Benedict, has been approved by the Supreme Authority, and therefore in this regard all will continue as before. The principal question, which I had to submit to Rome, was whether the Community might for the future include among the choir monks those who do not aspire to the priesthood, since it is the ordinary rule of the Church that only those are admitted to profession to the choir who are either priests or fitted for the sacerdotal dignity. This concession, I am pleased to say, has been granted, although it is an innovation on existing Benedictine custom, by which those who do not study for the priesthood are accepted as lay brothers only and do not attend the choir.

The people of Florissant, Mo., a primitive little village not far from St. Louis, during the last week of September united in the celebration of the one hundred and twentieth anniversary of the dedication of St. Ferdinand's Church. The church, a landmark in St. Louis County and perhaps the oldest religious edifice in the West, has had a most interesting history. Originally the monastic temple of a Community of Trappists, who later removed their establishment to Gethsemane, Kentucky, early in the nineteenth century, it was handed over to the little band of Jesuits who journeyed from Whitmarsh, Maryland, to begin in the then Indian country the missionary enterprises which developed into the Missouri Province of the Society, with the notable establishments it controls. In those early years the Religious of the Sacred Heart had a convent near the little church, one of the first foundations of the Community in the West, and for years the Venerable Mother Duchesne, whose process for beatification is happily progressing, was a worshipper before its primitive altar. Chief among the attractions during the anniversary week was the half pound rusty key used to open the church door at the dedication in 1792. At the time the sacred edifice was built heavy bolts and massive keys were needed to keep off the Indians.

OBITUARY

Canon Patrick Sheehan, D.D., died at his pastoral residence, County Cork, October 8. Born in Mallow, 1852, and educated at St. Colman's College, Fermoy, and Maynooth, he was ordained in 1875, and having served two years in the English mission, where his eloquence and fine personality were highly appreciated, he returned to his native diocese of Cloyne. He spent his curacy at Queenstown and Mallow and in 1895 was made pastor of Doneraile. His poems and essays in the Irish Monthly had brought him into notice in the eighties, but it was not till 1894 that his first book "Geoffrey Austin, Student," was published. This was followed quickly by "The Triumph of Failure," his own favorite book and judged by many his greatest, and in 1898 "My New Curate," gave him an international reputation. In quick succession appeared "Cithara Mea," a volume of poems; "The Lost Angel," a drama; "Parerga" and "Under the Cedars and Stars," essays; "Glenanaar," "Lisheen," "The Blindness of Dr. Gray," "The Intellectuals" and "Miriam Lucas," novels and studies of Irish life; a book of sermons and lectures, and "The Queen's Fillet," his sole but very successful venture into a foreign field. Canon Barry's appraisal of "The Triumph of Failure," is true of most of his works: "With learning in plenty, secular and sacred; with flashes and gleams undoubtedly of genius; in a language always touching, often exquisite; and deeper than all these fine qualities of an eloquent style is the austere mood, Celtic and none other, that seemed to be falling out of a world not worthy of it." A delightful humor, deep insight into Irish character, and the genuine story-writer's gift of narration, enabled him to popularize with his pen many lofty thoughts and ideals. His books are said to be among those most in demand in English lending libraries, particularly "My New Curate," and several of them have been translated into most European languages. He was made Canon of Cloyne Cathedral in 1903, and Leo XIII created him a Doctor of Divinity and sent him a special medal in recognition of the services his writings had rendered to religion. Canon Sheehan was, moreover, an exemplary and efficient pastor, finding time to organize and thoroughly to instruct his people, particularly the school children, to whom he devoted an hour daily. Father Phelan, S.J., wrote recently in an extended review of his writings, that his personal piety and scrupulous devotedness to his priestly duties were fully on a par with his great literary power and achievements. Though he had suffered long from the cancerous disease of which he died, he continued to the last at the post of duty.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Here is another who dislikes the term "non-Catholic," and never uses the same unless cornered thereto by practical necessity. Please urge the Curia to reprobate non-Catholic among the inexpedient shifts for dissident: "One who dissents, or separates from the established religion" (Webster). Dissenter is already committed to its particular application; but there seems to be nothing either too much or too little in the scope of dissident, to define those who reject St. Peter's established primacy. Even a compound phrase, such as Church aliens, would seem preferable to the barbarism "non-Catholic." Item, a descriptive term like unreclaimed, or unreconciled, or outpaled (unecumenic, perhaps, were a trifle too bookish). Extern or extrane might not come amiss, if one had sufficient influence to float them in this desired direction.

For the matter of repugnant words, I personally beg also to dislike two that have gained reputable currency: superfluous currency, to my humble thinking. These are "alleluiatic" and "cardinalitial." Alleluia sequence, bears the stamp of poetry and rapture; alleluiatic sequence puts clogs to angelic wings, and sabots on their feet. Then why cardinalitial, when already cardinal has fully accredited adjective potency? Or if anyhow cardinalitial, add likewise animalitial heat and capitalitial sentence, collateralitial evidence, initialitial forms!

Very respectfully,

GUILLIEMUS PAULUS.

CHRONICLE

Mexican President Warned.—The State Department sent instructions to Nelson O'Shaughnessy, the American Chargé d'Affairs in Mexico City, directing him to inform the Huerta government that the United States would view with grave displeasure any harm that might come to the Deputies of the Mexican Government that have been imprisoned. These instructions were followed up with a second note couched in more severe terms, in which the Mexican Government was notified that any new Administration set up as a result of the election on October 26, would not be recognized by the United States. President Wilson's note regarding the immediate situation says: "The President is shocked at the lawless methods employed by General Huerta, and as a sincere friend of Mexico is deeply distressed at the situation which has arisen. He finds it impossible to regard otherwise than as an act of bad faith toward the United States General Huerta's course in dissolving Congress and arresting the Deputies. It is not only a violation of constitutional guarantees, but it destroys all possibility of free and fair elections. The President believes that an election held at this time and under conditions as they now exist would have none of that sanction with which the law surrounds the ballot, and that its result, therefore, could not be regarded as representing the will of the people. The President would not feel justified in accepting the result of such an election or in recognizing the President so chosen."

Philippines.—President Wilson and Mr. Garrison, Secretary of War, selected on October 15 four Filipinos as members of the Philippine Commission. This gives the natives a majority in the Commission, the fifth native Commissioner, Rafael Palma, being a member of that body since 1908. The four newly appointed are Victorius Mapa, Vincente Singson, Jaimo C. de Veyra and Vincente Illustre. Mr. Mapa will be Secretary of Finance and Justice for the Philippines.—Carrying out the policy of the Administration to extend to the Filipinos the greatest measure of home rule, thirty-seven of the eighty-five American employees of the Bureau of Internal Revenue in the islands have been replaced by native collectors within six months, according to the annual report of William T. Nolting, Revenue Collector, received by the Bureau of Insular Affairs on October 13. "The results," Mr. Nolting says, "have been better than was hoped for." Incidentally, in the fiscal year ending June 30 last, the receipts from internal revenue were $11,392,382, an increase of more than $800,000 over the previous fiscal year.

Governor Sulzer Guilty.—In the highest court of the State's judicial system, William Sulzer, Governor of New York, was on October 16, found guilty on three out of four of the eight Articles of Impeachment, brought by the Assembly two months ago. On Article I, charging the Governor with filing a false statement of campaign receipts and payments, the court voted guilty, 39 to 18. On Article II, charging him with perjury in swearing that the statement was true, the verdict was guilty by a vote of 39 to 18. On Article III, charging him with bribing witnesses to withhold testimony from the Frawley committee, the defendant was acquitted by unanimous vote. On Article IV, alleging that the Governor suppressed evidence by means of threats to witnesses summoned by the Frawley Committee, the verdict of guilty was rendered by a vote of 43 to 14. Chief Judge Cullen voted for Mr. Sulzer on all four articles. Judge Cullen's position was that whatever moral unfitness Mr. Sulzer's acts before assuming the office of Governor may have shown, the power of impeachment does not reach them, but applies to misconduct only when the accused was actually in office. When the high court convened on October 17 a vote was first taken on the remaining articles of the impeachment, but on all these charges there was a unanimous verdict of not guilty. The vote on Mr. Sulzer's removal from office stood 43 to 12, but the court voted unanimously not to disqualify Mr. Sulzer from holding office in future. On these two questions Presiding Judge Cullen refrained from voting. Interest now centres in the coming administration of Martin H. Glynn, to whom the oath of office was administered on the removal of Mr. Sulzer. Before he was sworn Mr. Glynn made public a statement in which he pledged himself to the people's service, and promised the State an economical, clean, orderly and efficient administration.

Burned at Sea.—Another was added to the long list of disasters in mid-ocean when the steamship Volturmo of the Uranium Line, bound from Rotterdam for New York, was burned at sea on October 9, with the loss of 136 lives. There were 657 persons on board the doomed ship, including 24 cabin and 540 steerage passengers, and 93 in the crew. Most of those who perished were drowned by the capsizing of two of the life boats. All the accounts indicate that there was no cowardice—only exhibitions of courage, skill and brave seamanship on the part of Captain Inch, of the Volturmo, and his crew. The value of the wireless was again demonstrated; had it not been for the help rendered by a fleet of eleven ships which hurried to the rescue, few, if any, might have been saved.

Mr. Altman's Munificence.—The will of Benjamin Altman, the New York merchant, which was filed for probate on October 14, gives the Metropolitan Museum his entire collection of paintings, Chinese porcelains, tapestries, Persian and Indian rugs, Limoges enamels, crystals, marbles and bronzes, all estimated to be worth $12,000,000. Among the paintings are several by Rembrandt and Velasquez, those of the latter including portraits of Philip IV of Spain, and his Minister Olivares. It is the largest gift ever made outright to the Metropolitan Museum. The Morgan collection, which is much larger than Mr. Altman's, was not presented to the Museum, but loaned for temporary exhibition, the final disposition being left to the present J. P. Morgan. Mr. Altman imposed on the Museum certain conditions which must be agreed to by the directors in the form of a contract with the executors of the will, who shall be judges as to whether these conditions have been carried out. The will shows a deep regard for the welfare of his employees and a determination to reward them for their part in the conduct of the business of B. Altman & Co. Besides $50,000 to the Mutual Benefit Association of the Employees of the firm, Mr. Altman gives to several employees blocks of stock, and to 500 others sums ranging from $5,000 to $1,000 each, according to the length of service of the recipient. A large part of his fortune was thus distributed with princely munificence.

Canada.—The Conservatives have won the bye-election in Chateauguay by a majority of 144. Since confederation it had been a Liberal constituency; but the majority had been falling for some time, and at the general election was only 40. The Government is greatly elated, claiming the victory to mean the approval of the Naval Bill. The Liberals attribute it to machine politics and corruption.—Mr. Herbert Samuel, British Postmaster-General, has been touring Canada, speaking in various places. In Winnipeg he took the liberty of interfering in the school question, telling his hearers how pained he was at finding no system of compulsory public education in Manitoba.—The Canadian Federation of Labor met in annual convention at Brockville, and proceeded to express saner views than those of the Trades Congress of Montreal. The President spoke strongly against Internationalism, declaring that Canadian unions should have the Canadian national spirit; and he congratulated the Dominion Government and the Government of British Columbia on their stand against the attempt of the Mine Workers of America to dictate from Indianapolis and Seattle the course to be followed in the Nonaimo collieries. He then stated that the Federation is growing steadily in influence, and that in Nova Scotia it has complete control in the coal mines.

Great Britain.—Mr. Lloyd George has announced his new land campaign. The end he proposes is clear enough, the abolition of landlordism and the transfer of land to the people. The means are not so clear. Hence, it is argued that whatever measure of land reform he has in his mind is not supported by his colleagues.—The displacing of the horse by the motor makes the question of cavalry remounts a difficult one, and its difficulty is increased by the fact that continental powers have been buying every available animal they could obtain in England. It is, therefore, proposed to draw the necessary supply from Canada, especially from the immense ranch of the Canadian National Bureau of Breeding in Alberta.—A shocking coal mine explosion has occurred near Cardiff. Over 900 men were at work at the time, and of these some 200 perished.—There is talk now of a combined Australian, Canadian and New Zealand fleet in the Pacific as a practical solution of the colonial contribution problem. It was suggested by a writer in AMERICA four years ago.—A prisoner is dead in prison as the result of a hunger strike. No attempt at forcible feeding was made, and consequently the prison authorities did not feel bound to report the case to the Government. But he was a mere man, Davis by name, sentenced to eighteen months for theft only.—The Government has decided not to release suffragists convicted of arson, who take up the hunger strike, but to resume forcible feeding. Annie Kenný and Christabel Pankhurst, having proved by their violence that they are able to continue their sentences, have been rearrested. Mrs. Pankhurst finds the idea that the United States authorities will treat her as an undesirable, "unthinkable." She must have a very inactive mind. Nevertheless, she has resolved to come to America in disguise. That she will thus succeed in passing the immigration officers is a little more "unthinkable" than that these will send her to Ellis Island for a season.

Ireland.—Mr. Winston Churchill's pronouncement offering special treatment for Northeast Ulster, and possibly its exclusion from the Irish Parliament's control, has been promptly negatived by Mr. Redmond. Ireland is one nation and there can be no question of dividing it. He is willing to make any concession short of betrayal of the fundamental principle: One parliament for a united country, with an Executive responsible to it. Statesmen should not be swayed or moved by the empty bluster of the selfish champions of ascendancy, and for the Irish Party the word is, till their ship reaches port: "Full steam ahead." Mr. McKenna, another Cabinet minister, has spoken to the same effect, and it appears that Mr. Churchill was speaking for himself only. Lloyd George, it is said, is now anxious to have the Home Rule Bill passed at once, so as to have a free field for his land campaign, and to prevent this the Unionists interested are fostering the Carsonite proceedings. In the four counties that Sir Edward Carson claims as his appanage, the Catholics and Nationalists are forty per cent., and to yield to his threats would be, said Mr. McKenna, the destruction both of the rights of minorities and the authority of Parliament.—A Commission of Enquiry by the British Board of Trade into the Dublin strikes has failed to effect a settlement. Sir George Askwith, the chairman, declared that the sympathetic strike, which the British labor leader, Larkin, had incited, was disastrous to all concerned, and advised mutual agreement. But the employers showed that all previous agreements made with Larkin's organization had been broken, and that as Larkin held himself free as a Syndicalist to break agreements when he found it expedient, they could have no dealings with him or the union he controlled. The employers are resolute in excluding all workers who will not agree to accept their orders only in the discharge of the work, and public opinion supports this attitude. Meanwhile some twenty thousand men are out of work, and there is extreme suffering in Dublin.—A memorial has been erected at Tubrid, near Cahir, in Tipperary, to Dr. Geoffrey Keating, the famous Irish priest, scholar, poet and historian, who was born there, and preached and suffered for the faith, in the sixteenth century, and in a cave of the neighboring Galtees, whither he had to fly from the priest-hunters, wrote, in classic Gaelic, his "History of Ireland," "The Three Shafts of Death," "The Key-shield of the Mass," and other patriotic and devotional works in prose and poetry. During the Mass, which was celebrated in the open air, Rev. Dr. Power of University College, Cork, and Rev. Dr. Sheehan of Maynooth, delivered addresses in Gaelic and English on the permanent influence of his work and character.

Rome.—The new editor of the Civiltà Cattolica is Father Chiaudano. He succeeds Father Brandi, who has been for some months past in Naples, suffering from a stroke of apoplexy. The appointment of Father Chiaudano came from the Sovereign Pontiff himself, but he was the natural successor of Father Brandi. He was prominent lately in the controversy over the five Italian newspapers whose views were a cause of anxiety to Catholics. His pamphlet on the rights and duties of the Catholic journalist was solemnly approved and recommended by the Holy Father. He is prominent as a theologian and philosopher. The loss of Father Brandi will be greatly felt by the Civiltà. While wielding a trenchant pen and always uncompromising in matters of principles, he was nevertheless conspicuous for his kindness and courtesy. Perhaps one of the most remarkable facts in Father Brandi's career is that although during almost all his youth and young manhood he lived in countries where he scarcely ever spoke Italian, yet when summoned from his chair of theology at Woodstock to the Civiltà staff his writings immediately attracted attention. Only a short time after his arrival he was made Editor-in-Chief. One or two of the Italian papers professed to see in the retirement of Father Brandi and the appointment of Father Chiaudano an internal crisis in the Society of Jesus. The new appointment was said to be a victory over Liberalism. That, of course, is the veriest nonsense, and nothing but newspaper stuff to create a sensation.—Singularly enough, Riciotti Garibaldi, son of the famous Garibaldi, cannot, it is said, be elected Deputy from one of the four constituencies in Rome because of his Clerical tendencies. He is opposed not only by anti-Clericals, but by Socialists, Democrats and even Republicans. Garibaldi explains that his Clerical sympathies are based on the electoral platform of the Catholic candidates.

France.—Americans who purchase Rodin's sculptures will be interested to know that one hundred "fake" works have been sold to rich Americans. The artist is instituting legal proceedings to prevent the fraud from continuing.—Poincaré's visit to Spain is announced as having fulfilled all the expectations hoped for by the President and the public, and is even announced as epoch making in its establishment of an English-French-Spanish alliance. Romanones said in an official note that the principles of the various Franco-Spanish agreements in the affairs of Morocco will be applied in a more general way in the politics of the two Governments.—The authorities are raiding the infamous district of Montmartre to suppress, if possible, the sale of opium. Its victims are many, and the drug is obtainable at a lower price than absinthe.—Despite the glowing tributes paid to the army by foreign visitors for its brilliant manoeuvres, the Minister of War has placed on the retired list for incapacity two Generals of Division, three Brigadiers and five Colonels.—On Sunday, October 12, eighteen balloons representing eight nations started on a race from the Tuilleries Gardens in Paris, in presence of 500,000 spectators. An American aeronaut was the winner.

Spain.—General Weyler is still to the fore in his native country. He is one of the three Liberals who are making a fight for the Presidency of the Senate; the other two are Salvador and Sevester. The Radicals and their allies in Parliament and elsewhere threaten all sorts of trouble if Maura is called to power. Even revolution is hinted at.—Estimates for educational purposes have risen from 18,000,000 pesetas in 1900 to 65,000,000 in 1913, and a further increase of 20,000,000 is talked of, but it is said in the press that in spite of it all the character of the education imparted in the primary schools has not improved. In the colleges and universities conditions are better.—In the matter of public decency the Acting Governor of Barcelona has been waging fierce war against immoral books, post cards, shows, etc.

Germany.—The great event of the day was the centenary celebration at Leipzig of the "Battle of Nations." The festivities began at Möckern, a suburb of Leipzig, where General Blücher, on October 16, 1813, won the first of the succession of victories which ended in the final downfall of Napoleon. The enthusiasm was boundless. Especially solemn was the transference of the remains of four Russian generals who had fallen in the battle of Leipzig. The coffins of the generals, as well as of soldiers buried in the Johannis churchyard, were conveyed to the Russian memorial chapel in the presence of the Russian Grand Prince Kyrill and a great number of Russian officers. The ceremonies were conducted by Russian popes, while a choir sent by the Czar sang during the services. The placards hung up by the Socialists in protest against the celebration were removed by the police, and a counter celebration arranged by the Poles for their hero, General Poniatowski, who was drowned in the Elster while fighting for Napoleon, was forbidden. On Friday, October 17, took place the magnificent parade of the students, provided with weapons and marching like a vast army. Saturday was the day set for the main ceremony, the dedication of the centenary memorial at Leipzig, which was to be the culminating event of the many celebrations held in the various parts of the Empire. Present with the Emperor were twenty-three Princes of the Federated States, army societies from every part of Germany, delegates from all the schools of higher learning, and countless representatives from Russia, Austria and Sweden whose ancestors had participated in the great battles of a century ago. Emperor Franz Josef of Austria, whose years prevented him from being personally present, had sent the heir to the Austrian throne with a cortège of fifty persons, many of whom were of the highest nobility. A special memorial was unveiled on the battlefield of Leipzig in honor of the Austrian heroes. At the same time celebrations and solemn religious services took place in every part of the Empire, and all the cities were magnificently decorated and illuminated in honor of the occasion.—The latest Zeppelin naval airship, "L 2," was wrecked by a series of explosions on her trial flight at Johannisthal. Twenty-eight lives were lost.—A new sensation has been created in Germany by the interference of the Crown Prince in the question of succession to the Brunswick throne. His views, as in the Morocco crisis, were in direct opposition to the Emperor's policy.

Austria-Hungary.—The centenary of the great Völkerschlacht at Leipzig, the "Battle of Nations," was splendidly commemorated at Vienna in the Schwarzenberger Place, named after the commander in chief of the allied forces, Prince Karl Philipp von Schwarzenberg. The Emperor, Franz Josef, with the nobility and all the active generals and State officials, came to review the parade. The banners which had been carried to victory a hundred years ago were borne by a company of honor, before the first rank of which the Emperor passed and laid a large laurel wreath at the foot of the Schwarzenberg memorial. He then addressed the representatives of the Schwarzenberg and Radetzky families, both of which were noted for their active participation in the war. A jubilant ovation was given to the Emperor by the vast multitude gathered for the celebration. A visit of Emperor William of Germany to the ancient monarch, who is now in his eighty-fourth year, is expected soon to take place at Schönbrunn. It will be another of the countless public demonstrations of the firm friendship that binds together Germany and Austria-Hungary.

Balkans.—Prince William Frederick of Wied has decided to accept the nomination to the throne of the independent State of Albania. The decision was reached after a conference with the King of Rumania. The unrest in Macedonia is said to have originated in Constantinople. The peace arrangements are being purposely delayed, and Turkey is credited with demanding as an indispensable preliminary the return of the Islands of Chios and Mitylene, and even with preparing an army to seize them. The success in recovering Adrianople has prompted the Young Turks who rule in Constantinople to play politics for the seizure of more territory, though as a matter of fact Adrianople fell back under Turkish control through the folly of Bulgaria, and not because of any action in Constantinople.

China.—Yuan Shi-kai, now "Constitutional President" of the Chinese Republic, was inaugurated at Peking, October 11, in the interior of the Tai-ho palace, where many an emperor has been crowned.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

"Schools Blamed for Lax Morals"

In an editorial of its issue of September 25 some one of the New York Independent staff presumes to enter the lists in favor of creedless or neutral schools, those schools, that is, in which the direct teaching of religion does not form an essential part of the course of study followed. One may question whether it is worth the while to go out to meet such an adversary. The reasons compelling assent to the necessity of religious instruction as a detail of the program of studies in a child's proper formation have been urged a thousand times and in a thousand fashions. If one will not or cannot see the force of these, why urge the old-time argument once again? The Independent writer admits the need of moral training in the schools. Conceding this, as conceded it must be, he certainly cannot deny that this moral training implies a something more than the mere learning of what is good and what is evil. He must grant that moral training ought to include the power and inspiration to do the good and to avoid the evil. Underlying that power and inspiration, however, there must be incentive and motive and compelling authority, and where is the teacher to find these if, in the precepts of the classroom, he is debarred from all reference to the last end of the moral order, God; to the final criterion, whence the moral law derives alike its necessity and its knowableness, God's absolutely perfect being; to the reason of that law's obligatory force and sanction, God's supreme will? It is as difficult to comprehend how the ethical principles involved in the moral law can be taught without an explanation of these relations, as it is impossible to conceive how these relations, the very foundation of the moral law, can be intelligently discussed by a teacher whose duty it is to abstain from everything that savors of positive religious teaching.

These are first principles; and no matter how jauntily the writer in the Independent may juggle terms, no matter how easy the flippancy with which he presumes to brush aside age-old truths, the word of Archbishop Ireland is unassailable,—“the common schools of the land,” if those who direct them be loyal to the dominant characteristic of their teaching program, “do in fact consecrate secularism as the religion of America.” That the decay of morals, which must eventuate from a school training in which religious formation is perforce debarred, is not making more rapid headway among us is due precisely to the fact that many of the boys and girls whose days are spent within its poisonous atmosphere, as the Independent editorial rather coarsely suggests, “get their religion in other ways, if they do not get it in school.”

Unfortunately, too many young Americans “get it” in no way whatever. Our day is one in which laxity in the matter of church attendance and of religious practice has grown to be very common, and it was not a Catholic, by the way, but the Calvinist Guizot, who stated that “primary education to be truly good and socially useful must be given in the midst of a religious atmosphere.”

Of course it is no task at all for the Independent writer to “insist that the output, the product of the teaching in public schools is quite as moral, quite as religious, quite as decent and honorable as that taught by the method of enforced religion.” But one may be allowed to insinuate that his insistence, backed up by no convincing proof, and by no authoritative force other than his mere word, will have little weight against what a vast and daily increasing number of men and women of the country affirm emphatically to be the verdict alike of reason and experience. It is easy sneeringly to claim that “boy for boy and girl for girl the young people trained in non-religious schools will bear comparison with those that are taught by ‘brothers’ and ‘sisters’”; but mere words, after all, are mere words, and fair-minded people will recognize the prejudiced animus of the scoffer, and they will, as well, look for more substantial evidence than a sneer.

Little more than a year ago, on April 21, 1912, to be exact, there appeared in the New York Times, a full-page interview with Hon. Lewis I. Fawcett, County Judge in Brooklyn, a man whose long experience with the erring and criminal classes gives him the right to be heard in the question of how our young people ought to be trained. “Every little while we have a report in the papers of lax morals in the public schools,” says the writer in the Independent, but this interview was one that was exceedingly worth while, coming, as it did, from one who finds a basis for his judgment not in sentiment, but in the cold, hard facts of human nature as they are revealed to him in an important criminal court. “Are morals given enough attention in the schools?” Judge Fawcett was asked. “No,” he answered, “and I regret exceedingly the elimination of religious teaching from the schools.” And then in remarkably straightforward terms he stated that much could be done to stem the ever-growing tide of criminality among the youth of the country were greater zeal to be manifested in their religious training. By strange coincidence it was a similar figure of the “flood-tide of Niagara,” used by Archbishop Ireland to express a like line of thought, which among other things gave bitterness to the pen of the Independent writer.

The Brooklyn jurist does not “orate” simply; he draws his arguments out of his daily dealings with the evil-doers who appear before him. And it may be well to remember as one reads his words that only those accused of felonies are taken into his court for trial.

“Approximately,” says Judge Fawcett, “2,700 cases have been brought before me in my five and a half years of service on the bench, and of these prisoners 42 per cent. have been between the ages of 16 and 21, which, by the way, is somewhat startling, isn't it?”

“I have asked each young defendant if he was a member of or an attendant at a Sunday school, and I never have been answered, ‘yes.’ Many have attended Sunday school at some period in their lives, but investigations show that they have been out of such worthy influences for long periods before yielding to the temptation to turn to crime."

The Brooklyn jurist's testimony might be amplified a hundredfold were one to care to repeat anew similar statements of thoughtful men which have become trite through the frequent rehearsing of them. Moreover, what would be the use? A man capable of penning these ridiculous words: "A nation can have no religion,—only people individually can have religion," needs something more than right material on which to exercise his reasoning faculty. He were a tyro, indeed, in philosophical study who could not prick the bubble of conceit of the Independent writer who used that poor old sophism. Yet he rashly assumes to quash by a simple "I tell you so" the daily developing demand that our schools do the supremely needful thing in the formation of our boys and girls.

Or does he deem himself safe because his sneer is directed against what he fancies to be a declaration of rights by Catholics only. It was not a Catholic, he should know, who affirmed a few years ago in San Francisco, at the great gathering of the National Education Association, a body made up largely of the public school teachers of this country: "Civic sloth and depravity are general throughout the country because the schools fail to train for citizenship." It was not a Catholic, but a prominent non-Catholic professor of education at a great State University, who there protested: "The present pressing need in education is to arouse in the life of each person dealing with children the conviction that the moral and religious development of the child is an immediate necessity." It was not a Catholic, but the distinguished Protestant Chief Magistrate for the first division of the Municipal Court in Greater New York, who, in the first report issued by the Board of which Mr. McAdoo is the head, wrote that New York is menaced by an army of young men and boys, who, devoid of respect for the law, terrorize, shoot and rob without regard for police restraint. "These make the most troublesome element we have to deal with," declared the Chief Magistrate in a remarkable sketch of conditions as they came under the observation of himself and his brother judges. "Without reverence for anything, subject to no parental control, cynical, viciously wise beyond their years, utterly regardless of the rights of others, firmly determined not to work for a living, terrorizing the occupants of public vehicles, and disturbing the peace of neighborhoods, they have no regard for common decency. From the ranks of these lawless rowdies . . . come the so-called gunmen and dangerous characters."

When testimony such as this is laid before us,—not the testimony of unthinking impulse, nor that of unreasoning enthusiasm,—are we to ignore it, and ignore, too, the only conclusion to which it leads, simply because the Independent editorial writer tells us: "We dissent." Even did we not know of old the lack of logic and the strength of bitter prejudice that used to mark much of the criticism of that weekly magazine, our common sense would bid us pay little heed to the farrago spread before us in the "Schools Blamed for Lax Morals" article of its issue of September 25.

Happily the new management which took over the Independent a week or two after the appearance of that article promises better things. Surely in the large spirit that marks the policy announced by those now in control, they will scarcely permit to teach, with the authority of their venerable review, one who, in the face of the scandalized protest of even the daily press against the smut and filth now so common in the world's life, presumes to pen such stuff as this: "Has any old man ever lived at a time when the decencies of morality were more honored, when temperance was more taught and practised, when a greater effort was made to close vile resorts, and when profanity was more eschewed?"

Some Points Arising Out of the Gould-Castellane Case

The enemies of the Church are always on the lookout for ways and means to revile it. Such persons are using the Gould-Castellane marriage case for that purpose. The case has been fully explained in Catholic periodicals, and were the enemies the only ones professing to be troubled by it, we should say no more on the subject.

But they are not the only ones. There are others, even Catholics, who in good faith feel upset over the affair, and we have been trying to see what the reason is. We think the fundamental difficulty is a misapprehension of the attitude of the Church with regard to the marriage contract. Suppose a couple before getting married had drawn up an agreement that their union was to be terminable at pleasure, and that whatever promises they should make would be under this condition. Should one of them afterwards plead this agreement in a secular court as the grounds for a declaration of nullity, the answer would be most probably: "You have been married according to the forms of the law. The court refuses to recognize a previous agreement that would make a mockery of them." The civil power assumes a jurisdiction over all contracts, and holds that a couple legally capable and going through all the prescribed legal forms are legally married. The Catholic Church, on the contrary, holds that the essential marriage contract is of divine institution. It is the free mutual promise according to God's ordinance, duly made and accepted, of a man and woman capable of contracting. Hence, unless the promises exchanged have for their matter the matrimonial society ordained by God, no power, ecclesiastical or civil, can make the contract a real marriage. In such cases, therefore, as the Gould-Castellane there is no question of nullifying marriage. The whole investigation is to discover whether the marriage is, or is not, void in itself by reason of an essential defect in the contract.

Hence, a declaration of nullity by an ecclesiastical tribunal does not make the marriage null and void, but merely states that the evidence adduced proves its nullity in foro externo. Yet the tribunal is not infallible. It uses every means to test the credibility of the witnesses; but should these impose upon it by perjury or conspiracy, the guilt rests on them and on the party to the suit that suborned them, and any marriage the parties may afterwards attempt will be null and void in conscience. So, too, should the marriage have been really null, still, if this cannot be proved before the tribunal, the judgment that nullity has not been established does not make it a good marriage in conscience, and the parties must govern themselves by this in their mutual relations, though their failure to establish it in foro externo forbids them to contract new alliances.

Others find difficulty in the constitution of the Rota and its mode of procedure. The object of every court is to do justice; and we should guard against the idea that this cannot be safeguarded except by the English method, or by methods derived from it. The procedure of the French courts differs radically from that of the English. There are some so utterly prejudiced as to think that justice cannot be obtained in them; but we do not count such among our readers. If one considers the procedure of the Rota carefully and impartially he will see that it is eminently calculated to secure justice. Three judges try a case and give their decision. Three others then take it up and give theirs. If they disagree a third set of three sit on it, and to gain a decision of nullity one must have two trials in his favor. This is equivalent to a provision for two appeals; and it has this advantage, that the appeal belongs not to the extraordinary, but to the ordinary procedure. One may object that the appeals are not from a single judge to the full bench, or from a lower to a higher court, as in our practice; but any one will see that this is a mere matter of detail. Virtually the second and the third sittings have the essentials of the appeal to the full bench, or to the higher court.

A third difficulty is found in this, that the status of the children is affected. A little reflection will show that whatever affects their status comes from the original fact, for which the parents are responsible, not from the judgment of the court upon that fact. If the parents contracted a marriage null in itself the children are illegitimate; and such cases may come up in our secular courts at any time. Suppose a woman who has not heard of her husband for years, thinking him dead, attempts another marriage in good faith. After ten years the husband turns up. The courts would hold the second marriage null, and as a necessary consequence its offspring illegitimate. We have just had a similar example of English justice in the matter. The late Lord De Freyne was not the eldest son. His parents were Catholics and married before a Catholic priest. After three or four children had been born they discovered that their marriage was not legal, because it had not been contracted before a minister of the Established Church of Ireland. They remedied the legal defect; but the children remained illegitimate in the eye of the law, and the late Lord, the first to be born after the remedy had been applied was their eldest legitimate son, and consequently the heir.

Some complain that on account of the prevalence of divorce, final decision against the validity of the Gould-Castellane marriage will upset any number of others. Suppose this to be true, the responsibility rests entirely on those who legalize divorce and those who practice it. Even if it were in the power of the Catholic Church to change its law on the subject, one would be presumptuous to ask this. The Catholic Church is older than any modern state, and viewing things from a merely natural standpoint one is justified in holding that it will survive them all. The matrimonial law of the Church was the law of every Christian state. If the states of Christendom have abandoned that law, this hardly gives them a title to demand the same from the Church. But in this the Church cannot conform to the modern world. Marriage as established by God, as raised by Christ to the status of a sacrament, has been given into her keeping by her divine Founder, and the Church must protect that deposit until He returns to take account of her stewardship.

Nevertheless, the danger is not so great as some think. As we have pointed out, a mere intellectual error regarding the possibility of divorce does not necessarily pass over into the act of the will which makes the contract. It is quite likely to do so in such marriage as the one that has stirred up the discussion, in which a title on the one side and a fortune on the other are too often the sole motives. But ordinarily speaking, the young man and the young woman, whatever may be their erroneous ideas, have no other intention than to contract marriage as marriage is rightly understood. If they introduce into their consent a formal intention of divorce, should things not turn out well, that is their own affair, and the sooner they retract it and give the proper consent the better. But the cases in which such a malicious intention can be proved in foro externo are as yet extremely rare; and in all others the rule holds: we must stand for the validity of the exterior act. If a man and woman say, "till death do us part," we must assume that they mean it, unless they can prove the contrary. Should society deteriorate still farther until it is generally accepted that those words mean: "till death, or the divorce court, do us part," society must be responsible for the consequences. As yet, however, it is far from that.

HENRY WOODS, S.J.

Ozanam on Poverty and Wealth

"Back to the masses!" was the cry with which Ozanam startled the generation in which he lived. We shall not convert Attila and Genseric, we can do nothing with the men who are misleading the people, but with God's help we shall convert the people themselves. We may do little with the luxurious rich and the men of letters and science, inflated with their importance and centred in their own conceit. We may do little even with the classes of self-indulgent Catholics who have lost the spirit of their faith, and who perhaps pose as leaders within the Church while they are sending their sons and daughters to non-Catholic schools and exposing them to all the dangers of the new paganism. We build little hope upon them. "Since the fifth century," says Ozanam, "a vast number of saints had a greater liking for the Goths and Vandals, the Arian and idolatrous Franks, than for the effeminate Catholics of the Roman cities."

Of all nature's gifts, learning was dearest to Ozanam, nor was wealth ever attacked by him when justly gotten and rightly used. Both are meant to be of invaluable service to the Church as well as to humanity in all its needs. But it was the poor above all others whom Christ sought out, it was in the hordes of the barbarians that the Church wisely saw the hope of the future. It is upon the masses that the strength of Catholicity must be built in our age as in the days of the Cæsars and in the days of the barbarian invasion. To this latter Ozanam figuratively alludes when he gives us the watchword of the future: Passons aux barbares. Spend yourselves upon the masses. If we can hope nothing from these, he argues, "then are we at the end of the world, and so at the end of all controversy." (Lettres, II, p. 224.)

"Are we not," he writes in another letter, "like the Christians of the early ages, cast into the midst of a civilization which is corrupt and a society which is decadent? Cast your eyes upon the world which encompasses you. Are the rich and the happy of our time much better than those who answered Saint Paul, 'We will hear you another time'? Are the poor and the people much more enlightened? Are they more well-to-do than the men to whom the Apostle preached? For the same evil the same remedy is needed. The earth has grown cold. It depends upon us to rekindle the vital spark which is being extinguished." (Lettres, I, p. 148.)

Education has greatly advanced, wages have been increased, but the same dissatisfaction remains among large classes of the people. What, then, is to be done? Teach generosity to the rich, that social conditions may be more equalized, but Christianize the masses. The only magic that can unlock their hearts is charity. "My children," said Pope Pius IX in 1855 to the Vincentians gathered about him at Rome. "I consecrate you Knights of Jesus Christ. The world does not believe in preaching or in priesthood, but it still believes in charity. Let us advance to the conquest of the world by the love of the poor." What are these words but an echo of the great cry of Ozanam.

In urging generosity upon the rich he reminds them that while our Lord taught us to ask for our daily bread, He never counselled that we should make provision for ten years of luxury. The great value of wealth, he says, is the possibility it affords of making sacrifices. We know of no more beautiful words upon this subject than those which occur in his defence of property against Socialism:

"Christianity," he writes, "does not weaken property; on the contrary, it preserves it, as the material itself of sacrifice, as the condition of self-despoilment, as a part of that liberty without which man can not merit. . . . If it has made a crime of theft, it makes a duty of almsgiving, a counsel of the abandonment of worldly possessions, and a state of perfection of that community life whose attainment has been more or less realized in all ranks of Catholic society." (Les Origines du Socialisme.)

His sharpest lance is leveled at the doctrine of Socialism which, in opposition to the direct teaching of the Sacred Scriptures, condemns the giving of alms. How little Socialism has changed in spirit is evident from the opening statement of his article De L'Aumône, published in L'Ere Nouvelle, December, 1848. The words which occur there might have been written to-day with equal truth: "It is a set thesis of Socialists to denounce almsgiving as one of the detestable abuses of Christian society." Human pride resents the dependence which it implies. Yet dependence is the very law of our being. The child depends upon its mother, as the mother in turn depends upon the love of the child. In a thousand things we daily must depend upon our fellow-man. Seen from a spiritual vantage point, the dependence of the rich upon the poor is far greater than that of the poor upon the rich. It is not merely that the poor afford to us the blessed opportunity of charity, but they perform a ministry of expiation, a sacrifice whose merit returns as a blessing upon society. There can be no comparison between the gift of the rich and the gift of the poor. The latter is unspeakably more precious. But these are truths which can be fathomed only by a Christian soul.

"Do not say," he argues to forestall a difficulty, "that because we look upon misery as a priesthood we wish to perpetuate it. The authority which assures us that we shall always have the poor with us is the same which bids us to do all we can that poverty may no longer exist. It is precisely 'that eminent dignity of the poor in the Church of God,' as Bossuet says, which places us at their feet."

Those who know the road to the homes of the poor, who have brushed the dust from their narrow stairs, never knock at their door without a feeling of respect. "They know that the poor man, in receiving his bread from them as he receives the light from God, bestows an honor upon them. They know that men can buy admission to the theatre and public fêtes, but that nothing can ever pay for two tears of joy in the eyes of a poor mother or for the handclasp of an honest man whose return to work they have made possible."

Charity, therefore, is for Ozanam the great solution of the social problem. Charity must bridge over the chasm that yawns between the rich and poor. Charity must overleap the difference between men, the distinction of rank and fortune and learning, to unite all men in one true brotherhood. This is possible only through Christianity. It is, therefore, the first duty to look to the souls of men in attending to their temporal needs. Charity will chasten those who give and will make those who receive susceptible to the lessons of divine truth and love. Justice will thus be brought back to earth. Nor is charity to be extended only to those who are in need of alms. There is still the immense class of those who need not alms, but institutions, as Ozanam wisely says. Charity impels us to provide for these by the necessary organizations. "If a great number of Christians, and above all, of priests," he wrote with apostolic fervor, "had but occupied themselves with the working class these last ten years, we should be more secure of the future. All our hope rests upon the little that has been done in this direction." A prudent warning this for the Church in our own country, which is so slow to appreciate the need of Catholic Workingmen's Associations. Such organizations are not intended to replace the labor unions, but to supplement them by a sound social, economic and religious education, connected with wholesome entertainment and mutual benefit foundations.

Allusion is frequently made by modern reformers to the parable of the Good Samaritan in order to point out that the great need of our day is not so much the cure of those who have fallen among robbers as the proper lighting and policing of the roads in order to prevent future outrages and provide safety for passengers—in a word, that we must strike directly at the causes of our economic evils, rather than concern ourselves too greatly with the victims of them. Socialists even look upon the lesson of the parable as entirely debasing and opposed to revolutionary ideals, since their principles oblige them to combat Christian charity under every form, except where it can be made the means of revolutionary propaganda. Thus they are willing to advertise their cause by ostentatiously transporting the children of poor striking laborers into large cities, there to parade them for political purposes.

More wise than either of these classes, and deeply versed in the wisdom of the Scriptures, Ozanam correctly read the parable. "Charity," he says, referring to the obligations of the State, "is the Samaritan who pours oil into the wounds of the traveler who has fallen among robbers. It is the duty of justice to prevent the attack." (Mélanges, II, p. 586.)

No less than the most ardent modern reformer he insists upon the claims of justice and the supreme obligation of jealously watching over their maintenance. Charity and justice have both their place, and neither can ever, even for a time, render unnecessary the other. As long as human nature exists, with its physical and spiritual ailments, it must still be athirst for the milk of human kindness, and depend upon human help, nor can the sword of justice ever be sheathed. A great fact there is which will always remain and with which we must always reckon, no matter what social order the world may accept, and that is Original Sin. It is therefore the duty of the Christian to see that just wages, sanitary conditions, reasonable hours of work and all the many other demands of justice be duly enforced. But in the meantime the work of charity must continue, bridging over the social chasm and bringing together rich and poor into one Christian brotherhood, looking to the soul even more than to the body.

It is society itself, as Ozanam wisely says, which has fallen among robbers and is bleeding from her many wounds. Priest and Levite do not now pass by unheeding; but in her frenzy she rejects their service. The laity must, therefore, come to their aid and help to staunch the flowing blood, and pour the oil and balsam into the wide-open wounds, and gently bring her to that divine hostelry of the Church where her wounds may be healed and she may be fed with the bread of immortal life. To sum up, we conclude with the following forcible words from Les Origines du Socialisme:

"In deciding in favor of property for well-weighed reasons, Saint Thomas did not renounce the strong maxims of the Fathers, he did not hesitate to quote the words of Saint Basil and Saint Ambrose: 'The bread which you hold back belongs to the hungry, the garment which you lock up belongs to the needy who are left naked, the shoes which are rotting in your mansion belong to those who go unshod, and it is the money of the poor which you are hiding away in the earth.' These texts are familiar to Socialists, who abuse them. But Saint Thomas explains their true meaning by completing their sense with those other words from Saint Basil, not to be separated from the preceding: 'Why, then, have you an abundance while another goes begging, if it is not in order that you may gain merit by the good use you make of it, and that he may gain the crown of patience?' And he concludes that, according to natural right, the superfluity of the rich should be devoted to the necessities of the poor; but because there are many necessities and because the goods of one can not suffice for all, the economy of Providence leaves to each one the free dispensation of his own goods." Here, therefore, is Ozanam's solution of the problem of our modern unrest: "Voluntary despoilment in place of spoliation, sacrifice in place of theft."

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

Modern Preferences in Poetry

Poetry, in the opinion of many, is not so much read now as formerly. "Problem novels" and works on sociology interest the public more. Though magazine editors still pay a moderate price for whatever verse is required, whether three, seven, or ten inches, for filling a page that the end of a prose article leaves partly bare, if the minor poet would gather these verses into a book he has to guarantee the publisher against loss. On the other hand, the works of poets who long have held a place of honor in the Muses' temple are constantly appearing in expensive, popular and "pocket" editions, and anthologies of verse, or bouquets made by men of taste and discernment out of the sweetest flowers in the garden of poesy, are warmly welcomed nowadays and widely discussed. Poetasters and versifiers we doubtless admire no more than have other ages, but the true poets we are eager to know and love.

When Francis Turner Palgrave compiled, some fifty years ago, "The Golden Treasury of the Best Songs and Lyrical Poems in the English Language" (Macmillan), he gave the world an anthology of so high and distinct a quality that the book has long been regarded as a sort of original classic. The volume has been time and again reprinted, widely adopted as a text-book in schools and colleges, two generations of successful verse-writers have made it their vade mecum, and, probably to a greater extent than any other book, the "Golden Treasury" has formed in its readers a correct taste in English poetry. In preparing the work, Mr. Palgrave considered "carefully and repeatedly," he tells us, both the "pieces chosen and the far larger number rejected." Throughout the task he was assisted by Tennyson's counsel and that of two other friends of "independent and exercised judgment." He kept steadily before him, he says, canons of criticism like these: A poem must be worthy of the writer's genius; it must reach a perfection commensurate with its aim; passion, color and originality cannot atone for serious imperfections in clearness, unity or truth; a few good lines do not make a good poem; popular estimate is serviceable as a guide-post more than as a compass; and above all, excellence should be looked for rather in the whole than in the parts.

The admirable result of all this labor, discrimination and counsel was the "Golden Treasury." Notwithstanding all its excellencies, however, Palgrave's anthology, as good critics have not failed to point out, suffers from certain remarkable omissions, and somewhat also from the insertion of other verses that would have been excluded by a none too rigid application of the rules he himself laid down. Like many of his Victorian contemporaries, Palgrave was swept along so violently by the Romantic Movement in poetry that he seemed unable to discern the true worth of seventeenth century poets like Donne, Crashaw, Vaughan, Cowley and Herbert. Their best work is not adequately represented in the "Golden Treasury." No doubt the compiler found them too "metaphysical." Yet there have been no English poets who have more feelingly and sweetly expressed the hunger of the soul for holiness, and the pathos of the never-ending battle between the spirit and the flesh, than have Crashaw, Herbert and Vaughan.

When the first edition of the "Treasury" appeared, Palgrave, strange to say, had not discovered Blake, though that poet's work is now represented in the anthology. Some of the eighteenth century poets, on the other hand, with Scott, Moore and Byron, were treated more generously, some would say, than the quality of their verse deserves. In their case, perhaps, Palgrave made popular estimate a compass rather than a guide-post. The compiler, moreover, seems to have held in such reverence the name of Wordsworth, some ten years dead when the "Treasury" was published, that the canon, "a few good lines do not make a good poem," was more than once violated. There are now forty-three selections from Wordsworth in the anthology, but they include "Simon Lee," with his most unpoetical ankles so "swollen and thick," and his no less prosy legs so "thin and dry." No room was found in the "Treasury," however, for the thoroughly Wordsworthian "Stepping Westward." But these are mild criticisms, after all, and largely rest on vague, uncritical personal preferences, which also had their influence, no doubt, even with so consummate an anthologist as Francis Turner Palgrave.

Whoever is appreciatively familiar with the writings of Alice Meynell could feel sure that any collection of English lyrics she should make would be of exceptional poetical value; and after examining her "Flower of the Mind, a Choice Among the Best Poems" (Herder), would find his expectations thoroughly fulfilled. The compiler calls the book "a general anthology gathered from the whole of English Literature—the whole, from Chaucer to Wordsworth—by a gatherer intent upon nothing but the quality of poetry." Her selections number in all only 247 poems. Some authors that are quite well represented in Palgrave scarcely appear in Mrs. Meynell's anthology. Gray, Rogers, Southey and Moore are wholly absent, Burns is saved only by his "To a Mouse" and "The Farewell," and Byron by his "Isles of Greece," which Palgrave, by the by, leaves out. Mrs. Meynell has aimed, she says, "to gather nothing that did not overpass a certain boundary line of genius." Gray's "Elegy" is one of the poems that, in her opinion, falls just below the mark. But so close to genius, she explains, is his masterpiece that it "almost deserves that Shakespeare himself should defeat it. Mediocrity said its own true word in the 'Elegy':

"Full many a flower is born to blush unseen,
And waste its sweetness on the desert air."

But greatness had said its own word also in a sonnet:

"The summer flower is to the summer sweet, Though to itself it only live and die."

Shakespeare, Herrick, Herbert, Milton, Crashaw, Lovelace, Marvell, Vaughan, Blake, Wordsworth, Shelly and Keats are the poets from whom Mrs. Meynell gathers her richest harvests. She is very exacting in her requirements. In the preface and notes of "The Flower of the Mind" will be found some of her reasons for the rejection of certain poems that the reader would naturally expect an anthology to contain, and for the inclusion of other pieces that he never considered poetry of the highest excellence. But no one can study carefully Mrs. Meynell's collection of English lyrics without gaining a keener appreciation of the best poetry and a remarkable chastening of his literary taste. She is a severe critic, but a just one.

Wider in its range and less exacting in its tests than are the two preceding anthologies is Sir Arthur T. Quiller-Couch's "Oxford Book of English Verse" (Frowde). Mr. Palgrave's "Golden Treasury" (First Series), and Mrs. Meynell's "Flower of the Mind" cover a period beginning no earlier than the middle of the sixteenth century and ending about 1850. But our third anthology opens with a lyric from an anonymous singer of the year 1250 and comes down to 1900 with the work of living poets like Robert Bridges and Rudyard Kipling. Nor is it in the British Isles alone that Oxford's Professor of Poetry has sought for the best English verse. He tells us that he has pushed his quest "wheresoever the Muse has followed the tongue which among living tongues she most delights to honor." The thick volume of nearly 1,100 pages contains 883 selections, representing 270 known authors, besides a good number of anonymous ones.

As Sir Arthur T. Quiller-Couch allows us to range more widely and freely in his garden of verses than do our two other anthologists in theirs, of course we shall wonder all the more why this poem was let in and that kept out. Why is Longfellow, for example, represented solely by "My Lost Youth"? and how does Richard Le Gallienne or Austin Dobson manage to slip into the book at all? Why are so many of Matthew Prior's trifles included, while we find nothing of Francis Thompson but "The Poppy"? Every compiler of poems, however, must be prepared to meet objections of this kind. Sir Arthur T. Quiller-Couch assures us that he has worked hard to make his volume a collection of what he considers the best English verse that has been written, and begs us to believe that "the anthologist's is not quite the dilettante business for which it is too often and too ignorantly derided." In the "Oxford Book of English Verse" can be found many a beautiful poem that is excluded by the narrower scope or stricter exactions of the other two anthologies. For in this volume we can read, for instance, the anonymous "Hymn to the Virgin," written about the year 1300, Mrs. Meynell's "Lady of the Lambs," composed only yesterday, and hundreds of sweet lyrics that were sung during the long interval between these periods.

All three anthologies might be fittingly the possession of every lover of true poetry. Those who from their early childhood have been storing the memory with masterpieces of the deathless bards will here find new riches to acquire; those who wisely devote a portion even of their busiest days to the cultivation of their taste will be glad to have in convenient form a collection of those poems the world's keenest critics have judged to be the best ever written, and readers who have already trained themselves to appreciate thoroughly a perfect lyric will rejoice to be brought again and again by Mr. Palgrave,

Mrs. Meynell and Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch beneath the spell of the world's "music makers," who can justly sing of themselves:

"We are the music-makers,
And we are the dreamers of dreams,
Wandering by lone sea-breakers,
And singing by desolate streams;
World-losers and world-forsakers,
On whom the pale moon gleams:
Yet we are the movers and shakers
Of the world forever, it seems.

With wonderful, deathless ditties
We build up the world's great cities;
And out of a fabulous story
We fashion an empire's glory:
One man with a dream, at pleasure,
Shall go forth and conquer a crown;
And three with a new song's measure
Can trample an empire down."

WALTER DWIGHT, S.J.

"Americans have but a vague idea of the conditions in South America," said Dr. Rosalie S. Morton, of the Polyclinic Hospital staff, New York, on her recent return from a four-months' tour of the Latin-American Republics.

"I was very pleasantly surprised," she continued, "to find such excellent work being done in the hospitals of the countries I visited. Most of us have an idea that if we were in South America and needed an operation we would have to come to this country, but this is not so. . . . I was particularly anxious to see what philanthropic work was being done for the blind, deaf and dumb, and orphans. Naturally I could not visit every city, but in Buenos Aires I found some very excellent treatment of the blind, and in Lima splendid work is being done for children. There they have nurseries such as exist here, where mothers who work during the day may leave their babies, knowing that they will receive proper care."

The light is spreading. If such disclosures go on, the average American citizen will actually begin to believe that those benighted, papistical South Americans are occupied now and then with something besides siestas, bull fights and revolutions. But the old Protestant tradition will die hard.

Mayor Fitzgerald, of Boston, has made and promulgated some excellent regulations for public dance halls. At such places a matron and a policeman must be on hand to see that indecent movements are not danced, boys and girls under seventeen years of age, unless accompanied by a parent or guardian, are not allowed to enter these halls, no dancing party may continue after 2 a. m.

without the Mayor's special permission, and on Saturday night all dancing must cease at 11.45. If similar regulations were made and enforced in all our large cities much of the evil now associated with public dance halls would disappear.

CORRESPONDENCE

Catholicism and the London Stage

CLAPHAM, LONDON, ENGLAND.

A London theatrical season of surpassing interest and importance is by this time barely a month old. With one notable exception—Mr. Henry Arthur Jones—it is conspicuous for the silence of the "Old Guard" among British dramatic authors, e. g., Sir Arthur Pinero, Mr. Carton, Mr. Sydney Grundy, and Mr. Haddon Chambers, though I understand that the latter's adaptation of Miss Anne Douglas Sedgwick's "Tante" is earmarked for early production at the Haymarket. On the other hand, those authors of distinction whose triumphs in the field of essentially dramatic art have been of more recent years—as Sir J. M. Barrie, Mr. Bernard Shaw, Mr. John Galsworthy and Mr. Arnold Bennett—are all represented by new works.

A Catholic critic of the London theatre at once finds himself asking the question, what is the general trend, as affecting my religion, of all this vast output of "new and original" plays? The answer must necessarily be very much of a negative character. Almost wherever Catholic thought and faith and ideals are touched by the writer for the modern stage, the result is hopelessly poor, unconvincing and inadequate—"beaucoup de bruit, pas de mal."

And the worst sinner is Bernard Shaw. If the late Wilson Barrett's "Sign of the Cross" was rightly stigmatized as "a religious pantomime," Mr. Shaw's much-advertised "fable play" at the St. James's Theatre, on the subject of Androcles and the lion, is worse. It is the feeblest fable play I remember to have seen, and it is conspicuously lacking in that vaunted mystical quality cheaply known as Shavian wit. Most of Mr. Shaw's jokes are in detestable taste, and his so-called Christian martyrdom scene consists of one long sneer at the Catholic religion. There is a pantomime lion who declines to attack the Christian Androcles in the arena because he identifies in him the individual who has extracted a thorn from his (the lion's) paw; there is a pantomime Cæsar; and there are pantomime Christian martyrs (?) of both sexes who, as they are led away to execution, opine that they will be the lion's "hors d'œuvres," his "soup," his "fish," his "roast," etc. This sickening drivel has been denounced by the ministers of all denominations who have, at the instigation of Mr. Shaw and his coadjutors, been induced to go and see it. I am happy to say that this silly and blasphemous twaddle is a dire failure, and will doubtless have vanished from the bill at the St. James's ere these lines are in print. I only hope that the lion will survive to play a fitter rôle in one or other of the Christian pantomimes!

Turn we now from the puerilities of Bernard Shaw's nauseating piece to Arnold Bennett's clever comedy, "The Great Adventure," in which Henry Ainley and Wish Wynne are still scoring a great personal triumph at the Kingsway. The author treats whimsically and well of the great adventure of life—and death; and it is surely the greatest of pities that he has stooped to the introduction of a Catholic priest (played by Acton Bond) who is a decided travesty. It is true that this individual figures in only one scene of an otherwise delightful and diverting comedy, but while on the stage the reverend (?) gentleman has his full share of grotesque things to say. It is only fair to Mr. Arnold Bennett to add that the pair of young Anglican clergymen, twin brothers, whom he introduces in another scene, are more impossible and egregiously silly figures even than his Catholic priest. But the effect generally is not good, and is wholly unnecessary, detracting as it does from a comedy replete with little human touches and "truth to life." It seems a pity that this playwright should have gone out of his way to wallow, if only for a few minutes, in a welter of Shawesque agnosticism and anti-clerical banalities.

Altogether about a score of new plays have been produced in West London since the middle of August. Under the suggestive title of "The Ever Open Door," that well-known melodramatist, George R. Sims, ('Dagonet') has staged at the Aldwych a drama of slum life in Westminster, in which the treatment of our priesthood is quite sympathetic and the portraiture reverent and not unrefined, the author having evidently drawn on his own first-hand knowledge of the underworld of our nation city. At the older established home of melodrama, the Lyceum, "The Beggar Girl's Wedding," similarly does no outrage to the conventions of the Anglican Church. And ministers of religion have been induced to give their testimony in favor of the somewhat lurid and blasé humors of "Years of Discretion," in which Miss Ethel Irving scored a big personal success at the Globe, though the play itself has failed to attract.

Charles Hawtrey has withdrawn from the Apollo, "General John Regan," the work of an Irish Protestant clergyman, Canon Hannay, who has written successful novels under his nom de guerre of "George A. Birmingham." "General Regan" contains one of the worst travesties of a Catholic parish priest in the Green Isle that has ever disgraced the prejudiced pen of a Protestant partisan. Mr. Hawtrey has now replaced it with a rollicking farce, "Never Say Die," which includes an ideal rôle in which to exploit his own peculiar gifts as actor, contains no gross errors against good taste, and is said already to have sold upwards of fifty thousand dollars' worth of advance bookings.

At the moment of writing Sir Henry Irving's two talented sons are both extremely busy. Lawrence Irving has enjoyed the singular experience of transferring to four different theatres in succession that brilliantly bizarre tragedy of Japanese life in London, "Typhoon," and is still playing it to packed houses. H. B. Irving is rehearsing at the Savoy "The Grand Seigneur," a French Revolutionary play, in which he will have the accomplished Marie Löhr as his leading lady. "The Grand Seigneur," I undertsand, does ample justice to the Catholic priesthood under the Terror. I have no doubt that it does, for whenever he handles a play touching a Catholic theme, Mr. Irving approaches it with a becoming reverence, modesty and consummate artistry. This was notably the case with his production here, a year or two ago, of A. E. W. Mason's "Princess Clementina," embodying certain vivid episodes in the romance of the Polish Princess, who wedded James Stuart, the "Old Pretender." Irving himself enacted the Prince's faithful friend, Charles Wogan, and one of the most striking scenes had an essentially Catholic setting—the marriage by proxy of the Princess Clementina Sobieski, Wogan acting in behalf of his Royal master.

Sir Herbert Tree's gorgeously beautiful production of a biblical pageant play, "Joseph and His Brethren," calls for little comment here. Neither does Henry Arthur Jones's witty "Mary Goes First," in which the veteran dramatist breaks a long silence with a comedy of very light, almost farcical, texture, and in which he wisely refrains from tilting at sects and creeds. It was not ever thus with "Mr. H. A. Jones, whose "Judah" and "Saints and Sinners" long ago fluttered many a Church of England dovecote. For this playwright dearly loves to break a lance, and he has been the bitter opponent of shams and "isms" all his life.

At the Duke of York's the delicate craftsmanship of Sir J. M. Barrie is nicely expressed in a long and a short comedy, wherein the veteran, Sir John Hare and Mrs. Patrick Campbell—a rare combination of talent this—are starring. That virile drama, "Within the Law," continues to pack the Haymarket, but poor Oscar Wilde's "Picture of Dorian Grey" has failed at the Vaudeville. The autumn drama at Drury Lane, "Sealed Orders," has even more than the wonted quota of thrills, ranging from jewel robberies to airship disasters. The residue of current theatrical output is mainly compact of the farrago freely styled "musical comedy" and "revue." Shakespear and Ibsen are not represented at all, but Mr. Johns Galsworthy's "The Fugitive," appears to have caught on at the Prince of Wales's. It is a strong piece of work.

In fine, if we Catholics have nothing so revolting as "The Sacrament of Judas" to try our susceptibilities this season, we have also nothing as human and tender as Mr. J. D. Beveridge's delightful old Monsignor in "The Turning Point." It may be recalled that "The Sacrament of Judas" was translated for Mr. (now Sir) J. Forbes-Robertson, by Louis Napoleon Parker, from the French of Louis Tiercelin. As I write there lies before me a criticism of this poignant Revolutionary tragedy from the pen of a well-known but non-Catholic critic, in which I find the following illuminating passage: "It initiates laymen into the fascinations and gigantic power of the Catholic Church, since it shows us how heavily the hand of Rome weighs on those who adopt priesthood (!) . . . Forbes-Robertson is the ideal representative of the struggle of conscience, and of the man who forsakes the world, takes the vow, and then vacillates between the mundane and the divine." Surely our "earnest critic of the drama" does not seriously suppose that a priest of the Church of God enters upon his priesthood in that kind of spirit of lightheartedness which, par exemple, animated the late Emile Olivier when he entered upon the Franco-German war?

PERCY CROSS STANDING.

Kevelear

Where is it? How many readers of AMERICA know where it is, and yet it is one of the hallowed spots of Mother Earth. There multitudes of souls are strengthened and consoled; there the Mother of God is honored and appealed to, and there Our Lady responds to thousands of hearts.

The little, miraculous picture of the place has a long history. It is a small wood cut of Our Blessed Lady Consolatrix Afflictorum. The chapel, which was built in 1654, contains only one simple altar, and consequently Mass is often said there at 2 a. m. in order to give the many priests a chance to officiate. It is noteworthy that pilgrims do not go to the Shrine for the cure of bodily ailments, but for spiritual blessings. Their faith and their devotion is marvelous. From daybreak till nightfall one hears the Ave Maria sung or said. In pouring rain or sunshine, the pilgrims, led by their parish priests, arrive by thousands, coming from long distances on foot or by train, with their bands of music playing, and the people always accompanying them in song. The churches are crowded. The communicants are so numerous on feast days during the summer that seven priests begin at 3 o'clock in the morning and continue for several hours giving Holy Communion. The Communion rail is about 110 feet long, and is most beautifully carved with representations of the Last Supper and other subjects of the Life of Our Lord. The miners from the Rhine come in their working attire, the fishermen and fisherwomen in their distinctive dress, and mingling among them are seen the Kaiser's uniforms. Besides the great procession, which is formed on the arrival of the pilgrims, there are other smaller ones, in which the participants are in gala dress and national costume, and which are as effective as they are touching. If the pilgrims reach Kevelear in the morning they enter the church at once, so as to assist at the Mass and listen to the sermon. Those who come in the afternoon have benediction and a sermon, and when the weather permits the sermons are preached in the open air.

But where is Kevelear? It is in the northwest part of Germany, near the Dutch frontier. It is a neat and clean little town, and has a population of 8,000, and traces its history back to the thirteenth century. It has good streets and four large churches. The new parish church is very spacious, and is proud of its beautiful stained glass windows. The Marien Kirche, a pure Gothic structure, was built in 1858; and holds a vast number of people. It rejoices in excellent stained glass windows, and parts of the wall and pillars are covered with exquisite frescoes, equal to the best seen in Italy. The church of the poor Clares is also open to the public. Finally, there is the "Grosse Kapelle," which was erected in 1645. It holds 1,000 people. In this "Kapelle" the pilgrims meet to get their last benediction before leaving for their home, and one notices a look of sadness on the faces of those good folk as they bid good-by to the Consolatrix Afflictorum. In this "Kapelle" is placed the large wax candle which each pilgrimage brings annually. It bears the date of their coming and also the shield of their guild. In this "Kapelle," Frederick William I of Prussia, once offered a candle and promised his protection to Our Lady's chapel; a promise which he faithfully kept. He bought many rosaries also, saying that they were for his Catholic soldiers. At Potsdam, just outside the town, are the twelve Stations of the Cross, handsomely carved in gray stone, fixed in beautiful little Gothic chapels, and all along the way are lines of trees, with rose gardens on every side, for flowers are much cultivated in this little town. Near the eleventh Station is an immense oak, under which a pulpit has been erected. Here a sermon is preached for those who are making the Stations. There are torchlight processions also, which are very impressive, as the pilgrims march along they sing the Ave Maria, that re-echoes all over the town. Surely God must send many blessings on the little town where so many prayers ascend to Heaven. The pilgrims are Germans, Dutch and Belgians. Such is Kevelear, which I have had the privilege of visiting this year.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

The Unvarnished Truth

While the Episcopalian Convention was in session in New York one of the delegates, Bishop Weller, of Fond du Lac, preached in the Church of St. Mary the Virgin, which is so imitative in its ritual that simple people often mistake it for a Catholic church. According to the New York Sun of October 6, Bishop Weller announced that an entire congregation of Catholics in the part of the country in which he officiates had been received into the Episcopal Church.

Naturally, the Catholics of New York and elsewhere were somewhat startled by this apparently wholesale apostasy, and a letter was immediately despatched to the ecclesiastical authorities of Green Bay, Wis., to inquire about the facts.

The Chancellor of the diocese, Rev. Joseph A. Marx, informs us that the "congregation" which Bishop Weller boasts of having received consists all told of seven families. They belong to a small mission of Bohemians. When the bishop of the diocese determined to unite that mission and two others, which were about a mile apart, into one central parish, these seven families, yielding to the persuasion of a saloon keeper whose business the change would injure, refused their consent to the new arrangement, although all the other families of the mission made no objection. The move was made; a common site was selected and the three missions were united into one parish, under the pastorship of the Rev. J. Rous.

The pastor of the three united churches, who also writes us, adds the further detail, that two of the seven families went over because they were convinced that Bishop Weller was a Catholic. They refused to believe the priest, but now that it has got into the papers they are about to rejoin their brethren.

Thus Bishop Weller's triumph consists in the capture of five poor Bohemian families under the spiritual guidance of a saloon keeper. He might have been more candid in explaining the real state of the case to the admiring congregation of St. Mary the Virgin.

Bishop Greer's "Common Ground"

AMERICA is glad to put itself on record as agreeing heart and soul with some of the utterances heard during one of the meetings of the general convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church last week gathered on Morningside Heights. The House of Bishops and the House of Deputies, in a joint session, listened, the press reports of October 15 inform us, "to a scathing criticism of the present-day system of education, in which the schools were charged with lack of religious instruction and disregard of true character building."

Bishop Thomas F. Gailor, of Tennessee; Bishop Greer, of New York, and George Wharton Pepper, of Philadelphia, a member of the Religious Board of Education, were the speakers. This last was particularly severe, declaring that the system followed in our schools to-day was founded upon a misconception of what true education is, and describing the curricula of most of our colleges as "intellectual bills of fare," composed for the most part of "half-baked" items. And he gave grave reason for the faith that is in him:

"There are two theories of education," he said. "One of them is that religious education is one department of education at large and more or less supplementary to secular education. The other theory is that there is just education and that if you neglect the religious side of it you not only dwarf religion, but make a mess of the whole business."

"This country is obsessed with the idea that education is the imparting information and vocational training, whereas the chief value of education is to draw out a man's capacity, and man's highest capacity is to be able to find God. If an educational system makes no attempt to examine the relations of man to the Unseen, then I dare assert that it is not a scientific system."

Mr. Pepper spoke of the lack of thoroughness now so notable in educational work; he instanced "our young teachers in colleges who are constantly asserting their convictions in respect of matters to which they have not given sufficient thought." He meant, he said, those so-called scientists who make hasty, and consequently false, assertions of the discovery of cures of great evils founded upon superficial research and insufficient experience. They are not intellectually deficient, said Mr. Pepper, but they are victims of wrong methods in education; they lack thoroughness, which after all, is not so much a matter of intellectual operation as it is of character. "They do not know that to deceive people by the false announcement of a great cure of some of the world's evils is to do an irreligious and an un-Christian act."

"In our colleges," he went on, "we are not suffering from the elective system, but from an irreligious use of that system. The young men and the young women drop the subjects they find difficult, notwithstanding their disciplinary value, and proceed to take those which will fit them to make a living. Our universities by their feverish efforts to increase their registration and their prosperity are now offering to the young men and young women of this country a vast intellectual bill of fare of miscellaneous courses, scarcely any of which may be said to be more than half baked.

"The points I wish to leave with you are that true education is impossible without religious training, and that this church has peculiar responsibilities in the matter because of its great opportunity."

Evidently the speaker is not of the number of those intellectually great men who, as Dr. Eliot, late of Harvard, assures us, have cast away from them the old view of religion and its responsibilities.

Dr. Gailor, Bishop of Tennessee, was even sharper in his criticism. He held that the "greatest battle of this Church and of Christianity is the battle among those who have been educated and are being educated in our colleges, and unfortunately the class of people who are able to send their sons and daughters to college have not been setting us a very high example of Christianity during the last few years."

And the Tennessee prelate was not afraid to give pointed reason why this battle is the greatest. He said:

"The 80,000 students who attend the State universities of this country each year must get their instruction in religion and in morality founded on religion outside of the curriculum, and less than one-third of them are reached by the message of the Gospel.

"Eight States forbid by law any religious reading in the public schools. Fifteen have no moral instruction based on religion, and only nine of them have legislative provisions for such instruction.

"Much dependence is placed on the personal influence of the teachers, but this is not so true as it was thirty years ago, when all of our teachers came from Christian homes and were God-fearing men and women themselves. According to the figures I have only 194,000 of the 817,340 school children in New York attend Sunday school. No religious instruction is provided for 623,340 children in New York city.

"I am informed that of the 104 bribe takers who were convicted out in Ohio only eight had not been educated in the public schools, and therefore I say that unless the public schools supplement the work of our Sunday schools the outlook is not very bright in this country."

Bishop Greer, of New York, was more worldly wise than either of these two speakers. He agreed that "the justification of taxation for the support of public schools is not that they should teach reading, writing, arithmetic and other scholastic things, but that they should train and qualify the children in character—such character as will fit them to discharge the duties of American citizenship." Character training to merit the name, as the worthy Manhattan Churchman is surely aware, is not to be thought of without religious formation, but here he faltered and evaded the question. The flag of distress, "Sectarianism," was flung to the breeze. Bishop Greer would resist, he said, any attempt to make the schools sectarian, but he thought there was a common ground on which all people, whether Roman Catholic or non-Roman Catholic, could unite to the end that religious education in the public schools might not be neglected. Of course, he knew the answer Roman Catholics would make to his "thought." If he means what the so-called Liberals of Continental Europe term "fundamental Christianity" and which pre-scinds from everything that savors of positive dogmatic teaching, we Catholics say there is no such "common ground." If he means a common ground which, without any feature of possible proselytism, will provide for the definite training of every child in the religion he professes, we are eager to work with him. And such a common ground it is not impossible to find.

Aggrieved Anglo-Catholics

In Victoria, British Columbia, as in many other places, there are people calling themselves Anglo-Catholics. They feel that they are slighted. The Protestant branch of the local Episcopal Church is well provided for, while the Anglo-Catholic is left unfed. Several of them held a meeting lately, preparatory to putting their case before the bishop; and from its proceedings we learn that they are not modest in their demands. They want a Missa Cantata with incense every Sunday, wafer-bread, vestments, the mixed chalice, lights of various kinds, a pastor who will not only hear their confession but also go to confession himself—this may be difficult in Victoria—and other things as yet unspecified.

The chairman of the meeting confessed naively that he did not know whether there are enough Anglo-Catholics in Victoria to support the church they desire and its clergyman. When they go to the bishop they will learn that upon this everything must hinge. The Church of England in the colonies is liberal enough. One may have almost anything he pleases in the way of doctrine and practice, provided he be willing to pay for it, either directly, or indirectly by means of subscriptions from England. If the Anglo-Catholics build a church, furnish it, and provide the clergyman they want, the bishop will bless them and their work as readily as he blesses their Low Church and Broad Church brethren. If they cannot look out for themselves, they must not expect him to do so.

Are the things demanded by the Victoria Anglo-Catholics essentials of Christian worship? Whether they get them or not in the Church of England, they will never be in that denomination anything more than luxuries, used because the congregation likes them, just as in the next church there are hearty services and undogmatic preaching, and in the next but one, fine music and doctrine heretical. If the Anglo-Catholics are in earnest, there is a bishop in Victoria who will give them the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass, and what is still better, compel them to attend it. But if they go to him, they will be Anglo-Catholics no longer. They will become Catholics pure and simple, which will be a change for the better.

St. Paul's Bewilderment

The dissensions which characterized the meetings of the great Church Congress on Morningside Heights, in New York, are only a reproduction of another similar meeting which has just closed its sessions in Southampton, England. The Archbishop of Canterbury, who presided, expressed his opinion that "if St. Paul visited Southampton he would hear a recital in which he could join without bewilderment and without reserve." And yet the Rev. C. W. Emmet assured the Congress that "the belief in an infallible Church was obviously impossible under present conditions, while modern studies had shown that the belief in an infallible Bible was equally untenable, for it was pretty generally agreed that the mass of Our Lord's teaching came from the hypothetical document which scholars called Q. Even in the Lord's Prayer and the Sermon on the Mount they could not be absolutely certain of the exact words used." Ordinary people will naturally ask if St. Paul at Southampton would accept "this recital without bewilderment and without reserve"?

Again, the Dean of Christ's Church, Dr. T. B. Strong, who read a paper on "The Historic Christ," informed his hearers that "the Apostles selected the Resurrection as the main features of their witness," but he added "it was sometimes maintained (1) that they were themselves deceived as to the actual facts at the tomb and afterwards; (2) that the relation of their teaching to the facts alleged to have happened was accidental. The difference between truths proclaimed on these grounds and the historic form of Christianity was a difference between two conceptions of religion." Would St. Paul "accept this recital without bewilderment and without reserve"?

Dr. Henson, the Dean of Durham, with his usual audacity, declared that "the modern State avowedly non-religious might have a clearer vision of the right application of Christian principles to the ancient problem of marriage than the Christian society itself, and they might not wisely attach too much authority to ecclesiastical decisions which, in point of fact, ignored some of the factors of the problem with which they dealt, and it was fairly arguable that there was no Christian law of marriage." Would "St. Paul have listened to that recital without bewilderment and without reserve"?

One of the speakers at this Congress was Mrs. H. Luke Paget, wife of the Bishop of Stepney. Would St. Paul have listened to the recital of that amiable lady at an ecclesiastical conference "without bewilderment and without reserve"?

Omitting many other subjects that were discussed in this wonderful fashion, one of the speakers, in treating of the relative superiority of the sexes, was moved to say that "the view needed to-day was the man and the woman on the horse, and the man in the front, but both moving on together, side by side." Possibly this contortionist attitude might describe the proceedings of the Southampton Church Congress.

"Lying to One's Husband"

Scribner's of October, in an article, entitled "The New Republic," informs its readers that ever since "St. Elizabeth, the consort of King Diniz," told her husband that she was carrying roses instead of loaves of bread in her apron, "a wife's lie to her husband is justified by the Roman Church, if uttered in the cause of charity."

The writer who formulated this charge apparently confounds St. Elizabeth of Portugal with St. Elizabeth of Hungary, though we must admit being puzzled by his reference in the same paragraph to "the revered Princess of Prussia, who had statues and pictures in her honor." We were not aware that there were any princesses of Prussia until it was Protestant, and then there were no saints. Again in Butler's "Lives of the Saints" there is nothing about "roses" in connection with St. Elizabeth of Portugal, but as she was a relative of the dear little saint of Hungary, perhaps the magazine writer regarded the flowers as a family heirloom. It is true that Elizabeth of Portugal was a lover of the poor, but she is honored more as a peacemaker than as an alms-giver. Hence, it is more than probable that it is St. Elizabeth of Hungary who got the Church into this difficulty about canonizing a lie. However, she can be acquitted.

There is no difficulty in doing so, for it is simply not true, even if Scribner's vouches for it, that "the benevolent queen was forbidden by her husband," who by the way was not Diniz nor Denis, but Ludwig, "to give alms to the poor," or that he suspiciously demanded what she was carrying; and that "in trepidation she answered: 'Roses,'" or that "roughly he insisted upon seeing for himself."

The whole indictment is false. She was not a queen; she was only the wife of a landgrave; he did not forbid her to give to the poor; he was almost as lavish himself in alms-giving; she did not answer in trepidation; she did not answer at all; he did not roughly insist; he was a gentleman and a saint and an adoring husband, and he told his courtiers that he would give her his dominions to help the needy.

Whether this beautiful story of the roses is a legend, springing from the popular fancy in its endeavor to describe picturesquely for intelligent people the fragrance of charity that clung, as it were, to the robes of "dear St. Elizabeth," as she is still affectionately called, or whether it is a historical fact, it matters very little; but to proclaim, in a popular magazine, that it is an ex-cathedra pronouncement by which "a wife's lie to her husband is justified by the Roman Church, if uttered in the cause of charity," is not only a falsehood, but an outrageous calumny. The "Roman Church" does not allow anyone to lie, even a magazine writer. Scribner's ought to remember that it has some Catholic readers; or does it want to lose them?

"The Live Issue"

All the sacrifices made in support of the Common Cause, the monthly magazine of the Social Reform Press, have seemingly been futile. Sufficient encouragement was not given to render its continuance possible. But there is often a triumph even in failure. Whatever opinions may have been formed of it, no one will deny that during its brief existence it has helped greatly to awaken a wider and more intelligent interest in the social questions of the time. This in itself was a service not to be underestimated.

The editors have acted wisely, however, in withdrawing from a project which would too greatly deplete their resources, and in concentrating their efforts upon the Live Issue, which is the remaining publication of the same press. "As the Common Cause was a tremendous drain upon the receipts of the Social Reform Press," they tell us, "we concluded that the same money could be more effectually used in developing the Live Issue." This, they believe, "strikes a more responsive chord in the campaign against socialism and in behalf of social reform."

The Live Issue has been alert in following the movements of socialism and keen in answering their arguments. It is written in the popular manner and sold at the popular price of the papers against which it has entered the lists. It constantly advocates, moreover, the interests of social reform. In sections where socialism is rife it should be a good antidote against the poisonous influences of the radical literature which is certain to be scattered broadcast there. The inexpensive little paper, devoted mainly to this purpose, is written throughout in a style which will appeal to the very men among whom Socialists carry on their effective propaganda. There is more enthusiasm, it is true, in attacking than defending. It is easier to tear down than to build. In so far Socialists will always have the advantage. But the final victory must lie with truth and progress. There is room and reason for the Live Issue, and every hope of success.

Modern Marks of Catholicity

In one of his recent lectures in England Father Bernard Vaughan said he had been in districts of America where Catholic sermons were preached in twenty-five different languages, but all agreeing on one faith and one authority. He might have added that in the same districts Protestant sermons were preached uttering twenty-five or more different faiths in one language, and agreeing only in accepting no authority whatsoever. We notice in the paper reporting Father Vaughan's lecture that the President of the English Church Union told the delegates of that body at Southampton that Protestantism as a religious organization was passing, and that the great truths of the Redemption and the Atonement, and the Holy Scripture itself, were secure only behind the bulwarks of Rome. In the same connection a declaration of Mr. William J. Bryan before the Knights of Columbus at Philadelphia is pertinent:

"I am proud of what the Catholic Church has accomplished. Having traveled in many countries, I have not found one that has not been reached by the missionaries of your faith."

All of which is up-to-date testimony that at home and abroad the Catholic Church alone is carrying out exactly the commission Christ gave it: "Go ye into the whole world and preach the Gospel to every creature."

Figures obtained from the statistical office of the Hamburg Senate regarding the business done in that port and quoted by the New York Times seem to show that the record of the German city for 1912 is probably the largest of any port in the world. Roughly, the Port of Hamburg cleared in imports and exports nearly 25,000,000 tons, valued at over $2,000,000,000. A comparison of these enormous figures with the latest available figures of the Port of London Authority, covering the period to March 31, 1912 only, makes it clear that Hamburg's record exceeds that of the English port hitherto conceded to be the busiest in the world. The London figures for the year ending March 31 last have not yet been published, but the statistics of the preceding twelve months show the entire paid tonnage in that period to have been 29,395,636. This, however, includes the Port of Queensborough, at the mouth of the Thames, and also the Port of Leigh, both of which are under the Port of London Authority. The total value of exports and imports was nearly $150,000,000 under the German figures.

Hamburg's success, says the Times correspondent, is due to the fact that it is a free port where goods may be reshipped without incurring customs duties. The free port extends over 2,000 acres, half of which is water surface. Quays fitted with loading and unloading apparatus run for thirteen miles; mooring places on open water are eleven miles in length, and the shed warehouses eight miles, and the space under roof measures nearly 100 acres.

America and England were the best customers, America leading in imports, valued at $170,000,000, as against $166,250,000 worth from Great Britain. The export figures credit Great Britain with $130,500,000 and America with $106,000,000. These figures, adds the Times, merit the attention of those who believe that with the opening of the Panama Canal, the establishment of a free port at New York would be conducive to the prosperity of the Empire City.

LITERATURE

Ethiopian Studies in Rome

In a recent Literary Supplement of the Kölnische Volkszeitung (Sept. 11) Professor Sebastian Enringer draws attention to the fact that just four hundred years ago the first Ethiopian book was printed in Rome and thus the first impulse given to the study of the Ethiopian language and literature. There is a bit of most interesting Abyssinian Church history connected with this publication.

At Florence, on February 4, 1442, a delegation of monks from the Abyssinian monastery at Jerusalem, in the name of Zara-Yacob, the negus of Abyssinia, of their abbot, Nicodemus, and their fellow-monks, declared their submission to the Holy See. Since this auspicious event the Popes spared no effort to make the reunion of the Ethiopian Church with Western Christendom a lasting one. A favorable occasion, however, of communicating directly with the Abyssinian rulers did not present itself until many years after the Council of Florence. In 1478 the Negus Escander (Alexander) had succeeded Baëda-Marjam, the son of the famous Zara-Yacob, on the Abyssinian throne. In the same year he sent ambassadors into various parts "to discover," as he formulated their instructions, "the most excellent priest of the Ethiopian Church to perform the coronation rite," which the Metropolitan of Axum had probably refused to do. One of these embassies also came to Jerusalem, where there was an ancient Abyssinian monastery. Becoming acquainted with the Latin Franciscan monks, the ambassadors thought they had at last come upon the most excellent priests and proposed to the Custodian of the Holy Sepulchre to send one of his monks to Abyssinia for the sacring of their king. The Franciscans, however, directed them to the Eternal City. So to Rome our ambassadors, with their strange petition, went, and were kindly received by Sixtus IV. It was resolved to send twelve Franciscans, together with an archbishop and a number of bishops, to Abyssinia to carry out the Florentine Union. Nothing, however, came of this plan. As a token of his affection for the Abyssinians, or Indians, as they were then styled, the Pope gave them the old Church of St. Stephen, behind St. Peter's, as their national church, and the adjoining building as a monastery and hospice for pilgrims. Hence this little church is called to this day: San Stefano dei Mori. The dark-skinned Ethiopians have long since ceased to frequent the church and hospice of San Stefano and the Latin rite has superseded the Coptic, but the inscriptions on the tombstones, in Latin, Arabic and Ethiopian, carry us back to the sixteenth century, when apostolic men like St. Ignatius visited the humble temple to pray for the conversion of the most distant daughter of the Church, and Western scholars came to the Abyssinian monks in order to learn their language.

The first successful attempt to fathom the mysteries of the sacred, or Ethiopian, and vulgar, or Anchorian, language of the Abyssinians was made by John Potken, called Poccanus, Provost of St. George's Church in Cologne. Potken was an Orientalist, and when he came to Rome in 1511 one of his first visits was to the Church of St. Stefano dei Mori. During the divine service he thought he could distinguish the names of the Blessed Virgin, the Apostles and other Saints. By the aid of these and other clues he concluded that the language he heard was some branch of the Semitic family, related to the Chaldean. His interest being thus awakened, he tried to find some one who could act as interpreter. But not even amongst the cosmopolitan Jews of the Eternal City could he discover any one possessed of even a smattering of Ethiopian. Nothing daunted, he applied to the monks themselves, and after two years of incessant application he had made such progress in the Abyssinian language and writing that he ventured on the publication, in 1513, of the whole Psalter, the biblical canticles and the Canticle of Canticles, together with a short treatise on the Ethiopian syllabic script. He received especially valuable assistance in his arduous undertaking from the Abyssinian monk and pilgrim Thomas, the son of Samuel. The letters, cut in Rome by Marcellus Silber, compare favorably with the best modern letter-press type. One of the few extant copies of this first Ethiopian print is preserved in the Court Library at Munich.

On his return to Germany Potken published, in 1518, the Psalter in four languages, Hebrew, Greek, Latin and Chaldean, that is, Ethiopian, in four parallel columns, the prototype of the future polyglots. It was from the Potken editions that Castellus took the Abyssinian texts of the Psalms and the Canticle of Canticles for the London Polyglot Bible of 1657.

Other Catholic priests followed in the footsteps of the Cologne Provost. The Italian Mariano Vittorio Reatino published the first Ethiopian Grammar (Rome, 1552), and the Belgian Carmelite Jacob Wemmers, of Antwerp, is the author of the first Ethiopian Dictionary (1638). These were the pathfinders and pioneers who opened up the land since then so successfully cultivated by a Ludolf and a Dillmann.

Perhaps some reader, on his first, or on his next, visit to Rome, will follow the advice of Professor Enringer and step into the Church of San Stefano dei Mori and pause before the tombstones of the pilgrims "from the confines of the earth" who have found their last resting-place within the shadow of St. Peter's Dome. On the right-hand wall, as he enters the church, he will read the epitaph of Tesfa Sion, also called Petrus Ethiops, who wrote in the epilogue to his edition of the Ethiopian New Testament (Rome, 1548-49) these beautiful words:

"Nowhere did I find rest for the body or for the soul except in Rome. The repose of the soul is the true faith of Peter; the repose of the body is the successor of Peter, Paul III, full of gentleness and wisdom, together with all his sons (the faithful) and his (spiritual) daughter Hieronyma (Farnese), who served the Church in humility and is the delight of the Saints."

The Northern Iron. By GEORGE A. BIRMINGHAM. Baltimore: Norman, Remington & Co. $1.20.

Rev. Canon Hannay, though an Irish Protestant clergyman, is not one "who fears to speak of Ninety-Eight" or "blushes at the name." His former books showed more of the genuine Irish ring than was expected of his class, but here he stands square on every issue with the most fervid of Irish patriots, singing out with heart and voice every note and sentiment of the "Wearin' of the Green," and with a force and skill that few romancers of that centuried theme have surpassed. He had been on a trip through Antrim with Francis J. Bigger, of Belfast, and that learned archeologist and patriotic Irishman took care to lead him to every spot that was glorified by Irish sacrifice and distinguished service, whether of the pagans or saints of old, the Catholic soldiers of O'Neill, or the Protestant farmers and artisans who fought stubbornly in '98 for Irish freedom and Catholic rights. The latter is his theme, and he enters into it whole-heartedly with all his feelings on the Irish side, and with all his experience and power as a story writer supplemented and vivified by an earnestness he had not known before. There is a thread of love, and it is strong and fine, but the main story is of the wrackings and burnings inflicted by the Government and the bold resistance and unselfish patriotism of the victims, all of which found place as markedly among the Protestants of Antrim as the Catholics of Wexford. And the air they marched to was the same—"Brian Boromhe's March, a tune which sends the battle fever through men's veins," and reawakens to-day the feelings of Brian's warriors a thousand years ago. Whether the inspiration was the tune's or Mr.

Bigger's, it has made Mr. Hannay an Irishman, and his book will doubtless help to react likewise on those of the Protestant men of Antrim who are now marching, or threatening to march, in the opposite direction to their forbears. One could find fault with a Yankee Captain whose traditional boastings are taken from Dickens rather than fact, but he is balanced by a good type of American revolutionary soldier, and the whole story is so satisfactory that minor faults are negligible. The Honor of the House. By MRS. HUGH FRASER and J. I. STAHLMANN. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.30.

The house in question is that of Prince Bordelacqua, who lived in Rome about the year 1696, when Innocent XII was reigning. Honor is the subject of the story because the Prince has killed his unfaithful wife but charges with the crime his fourteen-year-old son Giacinto, and then with the consent of a remarkably unsuspicious Pope he imprisons the boy as a maniac; all to preserve, of course, "the honor of the house." Giacinto had been married not long before to his cousin Fiordelisa, aged ten, who was whisked off to a convent after the wedding, to be educated by her aunt Olimpia, the lady abbess. On the girl's return to the Palazzo Bordelacqua, seven years later, she succeeds in discovering her husband's place of detention, sets him free and off they run, the Prince in hot pursuit. The fugitives then fall into the clutches of Charles IV, Duke of Mantua, who is disposed to hand over Giacinto to Prince Bordelacqua, but the resourceful Fiordelisa again saves the situation and the story ends happily. The vividly described murder of the Princess is too horrible, and the development of the story's plot calls now and then, as is not uncommon in romances, for some straining of probabilities. "The Honor of the House" is not the equal of the authors' "Golden Rose." But the atmosphere of the book is Catholic, excellent sketches of Italian life and character abound, for which Mrs. Fraser is doubtless responsible, and all who begin the novel are pretty sure to read it with interest to the end. The Marriage of Mademoiselle Gimel. By RENÉ BAZIN. Translated by EDNA K. KNOTT. New York: Scribner's Sons. $1.25 net.

This is a book of five short stories, the first, from which it takes its title, occupying nearly half of its 270 pages. They are all eminently readable, betraying in their limpid simplicity the light and easy touch of a master hand, but the longest are the best. Bazin like John Ayscough, the writer of English romance who most nearly resembles him in deftness of style, needs elbow-room to do himself justice, but even without that liberty he knows how to get along. At first sight one would hardly classify these tales as definitely Catholic. They are just stories of French folk whom you know from their faults and virtues and tastes and ways to be just French and nothing else; but gradually it is borne in on you incidentally, and seemingly accidentally, that their inherited virtues are a Catholic heirloom, and the acquisition of new ones, and the conquest of their faults are the outcome of Catholic faith and practice. "The Little Sisters of the Poor" is the only title that has a religious implication, and this is worked out only in the delicate, cunning charity of the Sisters that by good-humored patience moulds an irreligious old soldier into a loyal Christian without his ever becoming cognizant of the process. There are many lessons in the Gimel story, notably in the visit of the worldly-minded city girl to the old French mother in the country, but the teachings are always an essential part of the story, not one of them obtruded, and therefore all the more effective. This is not among the most striking of M. Bazin's books; it is good and pleasing rather than great, and therefore, perhaps, has something of greatness. The translator has coped very well with the difficulties of the original. M. K.

Paradoxes of Catholicism. By ROBERT HUGH BENSON. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $1.25.

Mgr. Benson has probably been told more than once by the reviewers that he is "indefatigable." He must own they are right. For last January "Come Rack! Come Rope!" appeared; last March, "Confessions of a Convert"; in September, "An Average Man," and now here is a new book of sermons. They were preached in Rome, the author tells us, last Lent, though some of them had been previously given in New York. The eleven discourses in the volume are applications and developments of the truths that the Church is an extension of the Incarnation, and that she too, like her Founder, has a divine and a human nature. Therefore her history and doctrine are as full of paradoxes as were Our Lord's own life and teaching.

So she is attacked by both the Pagan and the Puritan, but for wholly opposite reasons. She is too "other-worldly" says the one, she is too worldly, protests the other; she is too hard on sin, objects the one, she is too indulgent to sinners, maintains the other; she is too meek, observes the one, she is too overbearing, remarks the other. But these were just the charges, as Mgr. Benson shows, that were made against our Saviour by His enemies. As the author's method is to put an objection very forcibly and then meet it with a satisfactory and conclusive answer, "The Paradoxes of Catholicism" makes a good apologetic. The sermons, however, are so short and pithy that they often seem to be little more than outlines or well articulated skeletons. The reader will wish that these discourses had been more fully developed, and that he had received a bigger book for the price asked for this one.

The Way Home. By BASIL KING. New York: Harper & Bros. $1.35.

The art of this popular author is deteriorating. Many will read the early part of his latest novel with the same interest with which they followed to the end "The Inner Shrine" or "The Street Called Straight," but long before the 547th page, or rather stage, of "The Way Home" is reached most readers will probably be thoroughly tired of silly Hilda and unfaithful Charlie. The latter, when a boy, promised his mother to be a minister, but on growing older determines to be a "rich man" instead, and when his father, the Rector of St. David's, is forced by the church's trustees to resign, all his years of service being forgotten, Charlie is so disgusted that he promptly renounces Christianity altogether, which shows, of course, what a deep nature and logical mind he had. He grows wealthy, marries Hilda, but still runs after two other women, one of whom is a friend's mistress, and behaves, on the whole, quite like the "hero" of a modern novel, except that when he learns that he has but two years to live, he recovers with remarkable ease and suddenness his vague faith in revealed religion. There are some good character sketches in the book: Dr. Grace and his wife, for instance; Remnant, the sexton, and Mrs. Legrand. The "exclusiveness" of the Episcopalian Church is gently satirized, and the social changes that have taken place in New York during the past forty years are cleverly indicated.

In "Saints and Festivals" (Benziger Bros., $1.25) Mother Mary Salome has made from the Acta Sanctorum a "Cycle of the Year" for children. The Bishop of Northampton in his preface observes that "Without heroic virtue—without Saints—God's work stands still. In the history of the Church the Saints head every movement that can justly be called Catholic." This is what the author undertakes to show her readers. From each month she selects a half dozen saints and an occasional feast of Our Lord or His Mother and tells little tales about them. Though it seems to be English boys and girls Mother Salome has chiefly in mind as she writes—for one says,

"I'll pay him out!" and "Oh, give it him jolly hard"—the little Catholics over here will doubtless enjoy the stories too. Probably St. Aloysius does not mind being called a "scout." Gabriel Pippet furnishes the numerous pictures.

"Billy Boy," by Mary T. Waggaman, is a well-told story of a New York lad who visits his brother's ranch in Colorado and has so many "adventures" there that youthful readers will like the book. (The Ave Maria Press, 75 cents.) Another recent "Juvenile" is called "The Quest of the Fish-Dog Skin." (Houghton, Mifflin Co., $1.25.) James Willard Schultz relates how Pitamakin, the young Blackfoot brave whom we met "With the Indians in the Rockies," now accompanies his pale-face "brother" to the Columbia River, where they secure a seal as a "medicine animal" for old Stone Arrow, but not until they have had many hairbreadth escapes.

The "Poems" by Sister M. Blanche of the Sisters of the Holy Cross (The Devin-Adair Co., New York) are of a somewhat higher quality than is usual with verses composed within convent walls, for the author does not allow piety to rule over poetry with too high a hand. The verses in the little book are carefully selected, musical lines are frequent, and the beauties of nature are often described with grace and fidelity. Sister Blanche's "What Is a Sonnet?" runs thus:

"A sonnet is a peal of silver bells.
In mellow cadence blending, beat on beat;
It is a rare exotic flower sweet,
Anon, a wilding rose of fancy's dells.
Like unto veery thrush whose heart upwells
In heavenly strains the ear of night to greet,
Oft to a listening world in accents meet
A tale of joy or grief the sonnet tells.
An opal grey, it flashes sudden fire
That smoldering in the soul to flame doth start;
Or 'tis a flute whose notes soar clearer, higher,
When breathed by lips impassioned; now a dart
From prayer's quiver, winged with fond desire,
Or mirror where is glassed the poet's heart."

The Rev. Charles Gordon Ames was a Unitarian minister who succeeded James Freeman Clark as pastor of the Church of the Disciples, in Boston. Alice Ames Winter has now edited her father's "Spiritual Autobiography" (Houghton, Mifflin Co., $1.25) and furnishes the book with an epilogue. Mr. Ames revolted when a mere boy from Calvinism, joined the Free-Will Baptists and became, at eighteen, a "licensed preacher" of that sect, his chief qualification for the office apparently being a plentiful outpouring of "the spirit." But the Baptists did not keep him long. For his admiration for the "large theology" of New England "heretics" like Channing, Parker, Emerson and Clark was fatal to whatever belief he had in dogma, or the divinity of Christ, so he became, as he expresses it, "a Catholic, but without Roman, Anglican, or other limitations"—a wholly novel species, no question.

F. Pustet has just published a sumptuous Editio Typica of the "Rituale Romanum," revised, corrected and enlarged, and bearing over Cardinal Martinelli's signature the date, June 11, 1913. It is interesting to observe among the blessings which are included in the voluminous first appendix, formulas for hallowing a telegraph line, a fire engine and an electric-light plant. Lux orta est justo: rectis corde letitia, is the appropriate antiphon for the Psalm read in the latter blessing, and the Source of all Light is besought to lead us, when this world's darkness is over, to Him the Lux Indeficiens. Unfortunately, however, there is no special blessing in this new edition of the Ritual for airships and aviators. That is an omission that should certainly be supplied when the book is reprinted. For what machine, what class of men needs a blessing more? In composing the prayer some appropriate and striking metaphors could easily be introduced. In the volume's supplementum are prayers and exhortations in English and German for the marriage rite, etc. Price, $2.75.

The third volume is ready of the "Compendium Theologiæ Dogmaticæ" into which Father Christian Pesch, S.J., is condensing his well-known larger work. De Verbo Incarnato, De Beata Virgine Maria et de Cultu Sanctorum, De Gratia, and De Virtutibus Infusis are the treatises now offered, and a fourth volume will contain those that remain. The work was commended in our issue of May 31, 1913. Herder, $1.60.

A new set of pamphlets has been published by the Boston School of Political Economy: "Wage Earners' and Employers' Rights and Duties," by Cardinal O'Connell; "Socialist Bubbles Punctured," by David Goldstein; "Socialism in the Schools," by Hon. Bird S. Coler, and "Science and Darwinism," by Dr. James J. Walsh. These carefully selected pamphlets are sold in combination lots for $5.00 a thousand. The Central Verein likewise publishes two new pamphlets by Rev. John A. Ryan: "Minimum Wage Legislation" and "A Minimum Wage by Legislation," the former one cent, the latter five cents per copy, with a reduction for purchases in large quantities.

The Rev. Edward Flannery, of St. Bernard's Church, Hazardville, Conn., has had printed "for private circulation" a pamphlet containing eleven "Letters to a Layman." They are meant to answer the objections made by lukewarm and parsimonious Catholics to their pastor's management of his church and congregation. The letters are full of good sense and sound reasoning.

THE DRAMA

Stage Censorship

One of the most famous of Shakespearian actors, who is at the same time the director of the Shakespearian Memorial Theatre at Stratford, Mr. F. R. Benson, has told the world at large that the theatrical taste of New York is so degraded that he could not think of appearing before any of its audiences.

Will the people of New York, respectable or otherwise, feel the rebuke? They cannot do otherwise, for Mr. Benson is not a man to be lightly waived aside. The press tells us that on the day he left London he was given a luncheon by the leading English men of letters and of the stage and other professions. Sir Sidney Lee, the eminent Shakespearian scholar, presided and toasted Mr. Benson as "The Ambassador of the Shakespearian lovers of the Old World to those of Canada and the United States." Other speakers included Sir Herbert Tree, Henry Ainley, who is an old "Bensonian," and who, like so many of the famous actors of the English stage to-day, learned his art under Mr. Benson; Sir Squire Bancroft, Sir John Gray Hill and Sir J. Forbes-Robertson, who declared: "Mr. Benson has done more for our calling than any other single man."

In Canada he was treated with similar honor. In Montreal, at the end of one of his plays, the audience rose to its feet and cheered the company to the echo. Subsequently McGill University made him an LL.D. in recognition of his services to the stage as an actor and a trainer of actors, as well as for his work in producing thirty-four of the thirty-six plays attributed to Shakespeare. No wonder that such a man should not like to subject himself to the criticism of people who are fighting for seats at "The Lure," "The Fight," "The Family Cupboard," and similar horrors.

Possibly it was under a sense of this disgrace that an appeal was made to some distinguished men to find out if the appointment of an official censor would remedy the evil. William Winter, the dramatic critic, whose opinion is of the greatest value in such matters; Henry Clews, who could discuss the situation from the point of view of a man of the world; a well-known theatre manager; a judge from the bench and some others were consulted, and they all, or nearly all, concurred in the opinion that in the present state of public morals official censorship would be of no avail.

As if to confirm this view, an indecent farce called "The Censor and the Dramatists," by Sir James M. Barrie, was immediately presented at the Globe Theatre for the purpose of throwing ridicule upon any such attempt at stage control. The vehicle of the satire, if satire it can be called, is the old story of moral dirt, viz., a faithful husband, an unfaithful wife, and a poet lover. The censor, who is seated in the audience, declares that he knows nothing about plays, but is an expert in architecture. He objects to the scene, because the room where the villain is to be trapped is not correctly set. The press critic remarks that "The Censor and the Dramatists" will add nothing to Sir James Barrie's reputation as a playwright or a satirist. It certainly does not, but it does throw a limelight on the nastiness that has settled upon such a large part of the stage, when dramatic writers can find no means of being witty without being disgustingly wicked.

Meantime new depths of depravity are being sounded. Lust is now presented as allied to brutality. "The Black Mask," from the press accounts, furnishes an example, if one were needed, of this blood relationship. It presents the audience with an unfortunate miner who has been injured in an explosion, and whose face is covered with a mask through which one eye is allowed to look. He is murdered, or thought to be, by his wife and her paramour and thrown into a pit, but returns to confront the guilty pair. The man who developed that loath-some theme should wear a black mask for ever with no opening in it at all, as should the people who sat out the drama. There is no need of throwing them in a pit. They are already in it.

EDUCATION

The Problem of Control in State Supported Schools

Two years ago, in his pamphlet "Socialism in the Schools," Mr. Bird Coler, a non-Catholic, in view of the radical evils he portrayed as existing in them, boldly advocated the teaching of religion in the common schools. It is not contrary to the spirit of American institutions, he argued, to teach religion; what is contrary to that spirit is the use of public funds for proselyting purposes. "Can we have a God-fearing, religious people educated each according to his own faith?" It is not, as is evident, a practicable thing to teach all religions in the public schools, and how else can the most desirable change be effected? Mr. Coler deems the solution a simple one. "The State can take supervision of all schools, public and private, insist upon character and competence in the instructors, and then pay each school upon a per capita basis for the secular education furnished."

Mr. Coler believes this measure of supervision conceded to the State need not frighten the most ardent defender of liberty of education. He contends that the State would do its full duty if it assured itself that the subsidized schools were efficient for the purpose they professed. And this assurance is easily obtained. "The State," he says, "can conduct examinations yearly, and upon the result of these examinations base its appropriations to each school. This would not be using the public funds for sectarian purposes, but for purely secular education." The religious training of children would then be considered or not considered at the option of parents, and if given, would be paid for by those who chose to insist upon it for their children. The plan would require, to be sure, some slight changes in the fundamental law of the various States; but Constitutions, as Mr. Coler remarks, have been amended before this and for purposes much less important.

The proposal certainly appears to be a fair one, as it does seem to do away with a fear which sways many of the friends of private schools, that State supervision might lead to speedy restriction of liberty in education. That liberty believers in direct religious instruction as an essential in education would prefer to retain, even with the sacrifice of monetary help from the State, under conditions that might hamper them in fulfilling a duty they regard as paramount in the training of the child.

Catholics have a peculiar interest in the question, since they, above all others in this country, realize the enormous burden put upon those who are determined to hold fast to this liberty at every hazard. To be sure the matter has not with us in the United States passed beyond the point of academic discussion; conditions unhappily are still unripe for practical planning and suggestion. But the day may come when public recognition of the great service which private schools are rendering will not be denied; when it will be granted by all fair-minded Americans that in these private schools which insist on religious training as an essential element of all education true and stirring citizens are formed; when the grievous unfairness manifested in their regard in the matter of expense incurred through their loyal devotedness to principle will be acknowledged. In that day it will be imperative upon all Catholics to have clear and definite ideas to guide them concerning the character of the interference they may properly permit to the State in the supervision of their educational enterprises.

The London Tablet, October 4, in its review of a paper read before the Educational Section of the British Association, during its meeting at Birmingham a short time ago, suggests the fundamental principles on which is based the Catholic point of view. The Right Rev. Dr. MacIntyre, Bishop Auxiliary of Birmingham, the author of the paper, began by calling attention to two points; "First, that the State had an obvious right to protect its subjects from being defrauded in education as in food, etc., and hence it had the right to ensure that schools should be efficient for the purpose they professed. Secondly, on the principle that prevention is better than cure, it seems quite reasonable that the State should be able to take measures to prevent the opening of incompetent institutions. Under these circumstances it was obvious that no one could have a legitimate quarrel with the civil authorities if they should demand the registration of institutions, and the possession of the necessary qualifications by teachers in all cases where provision was made by the State for offering the public the benefits of education."

Such safeguards and precautions, the Bishop claimed, would never be objected to by Catholics. He admitted that there were certain antagonistic views advanced by men who see danger in the monopoly that looms black behind the policy of those who conceive of education as a natural and necessary activity of the State itself, and who assume the obligation of its support as a natural and necessary part of the cost of a nation's progress. These argue that education will be better if left to the stimulus of free competition; that by the mere force of competition inefficient institutions will be gradually pushed out of existence; that any person who had suffered from fraud in the matter of education had a legal remedy, as in the case of all other frauds; that State control was likely either to drift into a rigid system which would prevent the expansion of a living education, or to degenerate into the worst kind of tyranny—the tyranny of a bureaucracy. They fear, in a word, that a State-controlled school system might easily develop into an autocratic domination as dangerous to liberty and truth as ever was the old pagan ideal of education by the State and for the State.

Bishop MacIntyre, says the Tablet, did not attempt to bring into harmony these antagonistic views. He was definite and clear in his statement of the concessions he was ready to make in regard to State supervision, and for the rest he pointed out certain basic principles regarding educational control, which do not admit of compromise. "Two points he readily granted at the outset: (1) effective supervision over the hygienic conditions of educational institutions, and (2) insistence upon the effectiveness of teachers and teaching. Beyond that he could only go with extreme reluctance. Education ought to be kept as free as possible, for teachers with a zeal for education would do their own work best in their own way." The principle which he affirmed to be paramount in determining to what extent State interference in education may be allowed or must be restricted he found partly in the consideration of parental rights and duties and partly in our ideal of education. Assuming as evident verities that the family was prior to the State, that it was a primary product of nature, that it was autonomous and self-contained, that the State did not create the internal relations between parents and children, and could not supersede them, the Birmingham prelate was emphatic in his conclusion that the State must respect the home, and could not claim any right of intrusion or of interference. "We hold," said Bishop MacIntyre, "that it is an indefensible violation of a natural right for the State to oust parents from their throne of affectionate authority, and to take from them the care of educating their children."

The conclusion of the excellent paper reminded the Association of a point which is vital in this whole question of the limitation of the authority of the State in educational matters: "The father was well within his rights in choosing for the discharge of his duty towards his children those teachers who would give them the education he desired. He could delegate his authority to others, and, by this delegation, continue to exercise his own rights. The rights and authority thus possessed by a teacher was derived from the father, and were one with his."

This, to be sure, is not the doctrine of those among us to-day who preach complete State monopoly of elementary and of all higher education; nor is it drawn from the viewpoint of men who, to flatter the unthinking, describe that monopoly as "a trust, governed by and responsible to the people, an education of the people, by the people, and for the people." It is, however, the only idea of State supervision in which is conserved a proper esteem of the rights and duties of parents regarding education, and, whatever be the outcome of the suggestion made in Mr. Coler's admirable pamphlet, it presents the one clear principle for the guidance of Catholics in allowing or restricting State interference with their schools.

ECONOMICS

The Threatening Famine

We are glad to see the world recognizing the true cause of the high price of living, namely, the gradual increase of consumers with regard to production. As we pointed out a short time ago, this is bringing about a very serious state of affairs in the matter of wheat. As regards beef and other meats the condition is still more serious. We are simply eating up our supply, and, unless prudence intervenes, the day is not far distant when the people will find themselves face to face with the fact, not that the price of meat is high, but that meat is unobtainable at any price.

The history of the exhaustion of the cattle of the Western United States is almost like that of the extinction of the bison. For years we exported in live stock and chilled beef alone about 800,000 head of steers annually. In 1901 the number was close on a million. To supply this constantly would alone have required a gross herd of about five million head. When we consider the annual consumption within the United States, one begins to realize what an enormous herd would have been needed to keep up a continuous supply, and how true it is that we have been consuming not only the annual increase of the herd, but the very herd itself.

What took place in this country is now being repeated in Argentina. In 1907 came the first clear sign of our exhaustion, and in that year the export from Argentina was 427,042 quarters of beef. In the years following to 1912 inclusive, the Argentine export was respectively 767,284, 1,066,134, 1,593,001, 2,151,170, 2,220,707. It is clear that this cannot be maintained long. The Argentine herd is being exhausted as our own. To prevent this the Argentine Government, moved by that of Great Britain, proposes to restrict the slaughtering of cattle. This would preserve the herd; but it would also precipitate the famine, and it is opposed by the cattle owners and meat companies, whose influence is very great.

The danger of famine is grave in more ways than one. We know what an important part it played in the French Revolution. We do not say that it caused the Revolution, which had been prepared for years by persons sufficiently removed from any suffering on account of famine. But it made the people in town and country ready to listen to the preachers of Revolution. There were many social abuses at the time; but they would hardly have stirred the people to revolt had these not been hungry. The first grievance of the masses was lack of corn in the country, of bread in the towns. The march on Versailles was, in the eyes of the common people, for bread. In bringing the King, the Queen and the Dauphin to Paris, they thought they had found the means to put an end to their hunger; and so they said they were bringing back the baker, the baker's wife and the baker's boy. No one can pretend that society is tranquil to-day. We may hope, if time be given us, to tranquilize it by the removal of just grievances and the revival of religion. But if in the midst of our efforts we find ourselves confronted with a hungry populace, we shall find ourselves face to face with the Revolution.

In the French Revolution reasons of the existing famine were given recklessly. Nobles, merchants, farmers, religious were accused of storing the grain needed by the people; and this led to the first outbreak of violence. We see something of the same kind to-day. The meat companies, the "Trusts," have been accused by those who should know better, of storing up meat to raise prices and so fill their pockets. The meat companies have done many things they should not. They took hold of the Western herds and wasted them for their own profit. They have gone into Argentina for the same purpose. With the supplies from the West in their hands they were able to undersell stock raisers and dealers in other parts of the country, and so destroy the local cattle trade. But we have a part in this. We were glad for a season to get cheap meat, and closed our eyes to the wrongs that were being perpetrated.

The cure, then, must not consist in making baseless accusations, but in restoring the old order and improving it. No one imagines for a moment that this country is not able to support a population of 100 or even 200 millions, provided the lands now lying almost waste close to our largest cities be properly cultivated and stocked. This should be the care not only of the national Government, but of the Government of every State, of every municipality. It means, of course, a realization of the "Back to the land movement."

But here is the real difficulty. As Virgil tells us,

"Facilis descensus Averno:

Noctes atque dies patet atri janua Ditis;

Sed revocare gradum superasque evadere ad auras

Hoc opus, hic labor est."

It is easy for young men to forsake the farm for the city; but to carry young men from the city to the farm is a difficult task. Almost as well might one cast them upon a desert island. They are by acquired habit consumers. They have a horror of labor. The first step is to educate them; morally, to teach them to esteem production above consumption and the labor that it demands; physically, to fit their bodies for labor; intellectually, to teach them the art of producing food profitably. For this the money wasted on useless things in schools should be given, and whatever more is needed to make the agricultural school efficient. These schools should be multiplied. The exhausted lands should be fertilized, and whenever these are occupied by those sent out from the schools, experts in agriculture should be sent about the country, as is done even in Russia, to advise and direct the young farmers. A scheme of saving the cities' sewage for fertilizing purposes should be devised. The chance of gradually acquiring the land cultivated should be given to the cultivator. But all this will cost money. True. But the cure of sickness is always expensive; and let us remember that in this matter we are very sick indeed.

Over the Telephone

The following clever little skit from the Boston Truth deserves to be quoted:

"Hello, Truth?"

"Yes."

"This is Sex Hygiene, Truth."

"Well."

"I know you don't think much of me, Truth, but there is something I want to talk with you about."

"Where are you, Sex Hygiene?"

"I'm sorry to say, Truth, that I'm at the door of the public schools."

"You're sorry? I don't understand."

"I thought you didn't, Truth. You see I'm here against my will. I know the public school is no place for me, but great educators and advanced thinkers, like Charles W. Eliot, for instance, are pushing me on and I can't help myself."

"I see, Sex Hygiene. You realize, then, that you are a menace to the morals of the boys and girls in our public schools?"

"Most assuredly, Truth. I know that if I once get a foothold amongst them they are ruined, morally and physically. I don't want to ruin them, understand. I have my proper place in life, but that place is not amongst innocent school children, unless we wish to make sexual perverts of them before they are old enough to understand."

"I'm glad to hear you say that, Sex Hygiene; but what are we to do? The spirit of a powerful portion of the educational world seems to be against us, as well as what Prof. Muensterberg calls 'the erotic atmosphere into which the new anti-puritanic nation has come.'"

"I know, Truth, but much can be accomplished by constant and aggressive opposition. The policy of silence must be maintained at all hazards—that silence which respects the inherent modesty and sense of shame that lie in every child, and leaves 'God and nature to teach him all that is necessary for a child to know' of the sexual organs and their functions."

"You can do nothing yourself?"

"I am as helpless, Truth, as the grain of morphine in the hypodermic syringe and just as dangerous."

"Do you think parents will rebel if you are introduced in the public schools?"

"I don't know, Truth, but it seems to me that the only way parents can save their children from moral destruction, in case I get into the public schools, will be to take their children out and send them to private schools."

"And you think that's what will happen?"

"I do."

"I hope you are right, Sex Hygiene. If the public schools are to be made recruiting stations for prostitutes and sexual perverts, it is time the public schools were legislated out of existence. I'm glad you called, and you may count on me to do everything I can to keep you in your proper place."

"Thank you, Truth. I know you will be a powerful aid. Good-by."

"Good-by."

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

Owing to the large attendance at the Columbus Day Retreat the Laymen's League was compelled to refuse twenty applicants who wished to make a Retreat at that date.

One of the Retreatants at "Mount Manresa," speaking of the account which appeared in the Catholic press last Sunday, remarked that if this was a "harvest retreat," it had certainly brought forth fruit. If the large number of Retreatants that overcrowded the capacity of every available part of the building at "Mount Manresa" meant anything (which certainly their joyful appearance showed), then it could indeed be considered one of the most successful retreats given this season.

The Retreat was largely under the auspices of the Holy Name Society of St. Gregory's, Brooklyn, and although there were other sections of the country represented, notably Lawrence and Lowell, Mass., as well as Connecticut, Pennsylvania and Manhattan, yet the burden of the Retreat was borne by Brooklyn men.

What ought to be a very interesting piece of work and rich in very practical results is the Triduum or Retreat or quasi-Retreat of three days which is to be given by Rev. Father Shealy, S.J. It is for physicians exclusively. Those who participate in it will meet twice a day in the chapel of St. Vincent's Hospital, New York, from November 17 to November 21. The arrangements are such that there will be no interference with professional duties. Nor is it restricted to the physicians who are connected with the hospital. All members of the medical profession, Protestant as well as Catholic, will be most welcome.

Columbus Day was celebrated in Philadelphia under the auspices of the Knights of Columbus by what the Public Ledger describes as "one of the most enthusiastic demonstrations the city has witnessed in a long time." The exercises at the Academy of Music drew a crowd that packed the historic old Academy from pit to dome. The Most Rev. Edmond F. Prendergast and Auxiliary Bishop John J. McCort were the principal guests, and with them upon the platform were several hundred men representing the Church as well as the political and the business world. William Jennings Bryan, Secretary of State, and Boies Penrose, Senior Republican Senator from Pennsylvania, were the principal speakers of the evening. Secretary Bryan paid a glowing tribute to the Knights of Columbus, whom he eulogized as "an earnest, intelligent, patriotic body, of men who have accomplished much and have before them greater work than has already been done." No man, he said, who is interested in the great ethical problems of the present generation, with elevating the honor of the nation, could be indifferent to the principles upon which the Catholic men's organization rests.

Mgr. Edward Kozlowski, pastor of St. Stanislaus' Church, Bay City, Diocese of Grand Rapids, Mich., has been appointed Auxiliary Bishop of Milwaukee.

The Association for the Preservation of the Faith is a society of ladies in Buenos Aires, whose aim is to aid abandoned children by providing them with industrial schools, in which they may be taught to support themselves, to be useful citizens and to have a love for God and for the fatherland. Fifteen of these industrial schools, with an attendance of 5,600 boys and girls, have been built and equipped within the past ten years. The Southern Cross of Buenos Aires gives an interesting account of the ceremonies attending the formal opening of two new schools last August. Archbishop Espinosa of Buenos Aires presided and the President of the Republic, Dr. Saenz Peña, and lady were the honored guests.

A decree of the Holy Office informs us that the Sovereign Pontiff has abrogated all the indulgences hitherto annexed to Mission Crosses, i. e., the crosses set up either within or without churches, in memory of the missions held in them, and the special privileges in the matter granted to particular persons and religious institutes.

In place of them the following indulgences are granted: I. A plenary indulgence, applicable to the dead, on the day of the erection or blessing of the cross, on its anniversary, on the Feast of the Invocation of the Holy See (May 3), and on the Feast of the Exaltation of the Holy Cross (September 14), or on one of the seven days following each of those days, under the conditions of confession, Communion, a visit to the Cross and some church, or public oratory, during which the intention of the Sovereign Pontiff is to be prayed for. II. A partial indulgence of five years and five quarantines, also applicable to the souls in purgatory, to be gained once a day by those who with a contrite heart salute the said Cross with some exterior sign of devotion, and recite the Our Father, Hail Mary, and Glory be to the Father, in memory of Our Lord's Passion.

The Cross must be of solid and becoming material, and fixed to some determined place, or supported firmly on its base. It must be blessed by a priest who has preached during the mission, with the consent of the Ordinary.

OBITUARY

On October 14, at the rectory of the Sacred Heart Church, Chicago, Rev. James F. X. Hoeffler, S.J., closed by a happy death a period of devoted service there, which ran through fifteen years. Few would have foretold thirty years ago that the greater part of Father Hoeffler's priestly career was to be spent in the ordinary ministry of the cure of souls in a parish made up almost entirely of poor toilers. As a young man he had given promise of a brilliant career cast in entirely different lines. A man of signal mental gifts, a captivating speaker, a remarkably strong man in the college lecture room, and withal of a gracious, winning personality united with excellent qualifications for a successful administrative career, Father Hoeffler was a most distinguished member of the Jesuit body in the earlier years of his priesthood. Immediately following his ordination he was appointed director of studies in St. Louis University, the principal house of the Order in the Missouri Province; then he was designated successively President of the Colleges in Omaha, Chicago and St. Louis. In all of these dignified positions Father Hoeffler scored success, and the development of these institutions whilst under his guiding hand proved how well-founded had been the hopes built upon him.

But the Lord, in whose service he gave always the best that was in him, chose to call him to less brilliant work. A serious attack of illness in the late 90's left Father Hoeffler a nervous wreck and he was never thereafter able to lead in the enterprises of his brethren. Sent to the humble folk in the Sacred Heart parish, he gave himself with fidelity to the simple duties of a parish priest laboring among the poor and lowly. That his great gifts served him well in the work which his physical condition permitted him to accept, the affectionate regard in which that people held him gives striking testimony. For the past ten years Father Hoeffler was Superior of the Chicago residence of the Sacred Heart. He was born in Cincinnati, February 1, 1852, and entered the Society of Jesus September 3, 1869.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

The New Income Tax

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I notice among the editorials of AMERICA in the issue of October 18th, received to-day, one on page 40 entitled "Let Us Learn From France." The basis of the article is what is stated to be a provision of the new Income Tax Law as to exemptions allowed for children. The quotation I refer to is as follows:

"The exempted income, we read, has been reduced to $3,000; a man living with his wife is entitled to a further exemption of $1,000 and an additional $500 for each of not more than two minor children."

This is not a correct statement of the law, although this was the provision that was under discussion for insertion in the Income Tax Law but was finally stricken out.

The provision now is: "That there shall be deducted from the amount of the net income of each of said persons ascertained as provided herein the sum of $3,000, plus $1,000 additional if the person making the return be a married man with a wife living with him or plus the sum of $1,000 additional if the person making the return be a married woman with a husband living with her; but in no event shall this additional exemption of $1,000 be deducted by both husband and wife: Provided that only one deduction of $4,000 shall be made from the aggregated income of both husband and wife when living together."

Yours very sincerely,

JOSEPH H. FARGIS.

CHRONICLE

Government Telephone Possible.—Representative David J. Lewis of Maryland, the House father of parcel post, in a speech delivered in Washington before the national convention of second and third-class postmasters, predicted that in the next two years Congress would authorize the Post Office Department to take over the gigantic telephone monopoly of the country, capitalized at $1,000,000,000, and operate it as a part of the Federal system. The announcement was received with applause by the 200 postmasters present at the convention. Mr. Lewis will push the matter in the House as he did the parcel post legislation two years ago. He believes that the time is near when we shall have the Federal postal telephone and the Federal postal telegraph. Mr. Lewis announced also that within the next few days the Interstate Commerce Commission would extend the parcel post service so as to include books.

Pleads for Coal Industry.—The American Mining Congress, at its final session in Philadelphia on October 24, adopted a resolution urging Congress and the State Legislatures to modify the anti-trust laws as applied to natural resources. The resolution recites that the coal industry is in a deplorable condition, returning only a small profit; that Federal and State laws, preventing reasonable cooperation, result not only in preventing a fair return for the investment of capital, but in most cases allow the recovery of only from 50 to 80 per cent. of the buried heat, light and power. Other resolutions adopted urged "the more liberal administration of land laws in Alaska"; the creation of a department of mines; stringent laws for the protection of minority stockholders, and an investigation of "scandals regarding securities listed on the New York Stock Exchange."

Philippines.—Frank L. Crone was appointed by the Philippine Commission Director of the Bureau of Education, a position made vacant by the recent death of Frank Russell White. Mr. Crone has been connected with the schools of the islands since 1901, and had been assistant director of the bureau from June, 1909, until his recent promotion.—Flying the Stars and Stripes and under American registry, the three-masted steel steamer Robert Poizat, a new purchase made in Leith, Scotland, arrived at Manila on September 8. The Robert Poizat is the first steamer in the inter-island service equipped with wireless telegraphy and will be placed on the Manila, Iloilo and Mindanao route.—The annual report of the Collector of Customs shows an increase in exports and a decrease in customs receipts. The total foreign commerce for the last fiscal year increased $5,000,000, which is five per cent. more than last year, giving proof of continued progress in the industrial development of the islands. The total amount of hemp shipped during the fiscal year 1913 was actually less than any year since 1908, but the average value per ton was more than fifty per cent. higher than at any other time during the past five years. On the other hand, the rice importations showed a decrease as compared with 1911 and 1912; but the report explains that those years were exceptional and that the importations of rice have returned to the normal of the preceding years.

Mexico.—The Federal election took place quietly on October 26, and at this writing it is believed that it will be declared void and that General Huerta will remain in power pending the calling of another election. Therefore the statement of General Huerta to the diplomats that he would not be a candidate has not been considered as indicating any intention on his part to allow the election of any candidate. It is believed, however, that the new Congress will declare itself elected, despite the small number of votes cast. Leaders of the Catholic party claim a long lead for their Presidential ticket, although they were unable to estimate the number of votes polled for their candidates, Frederico Gamboa and General Rascon. If this contention is correct, it is generally thought that General Felix Diaz and Señor Requena ran second. A light vote was cast everywhere. Felix Diaz has resigned from the army and remains at Vera Cruz, refusing all requests that he go to Mexico City.

England's Mexican Policy.—Sir Edward Grey, Great Britain's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in a talk with Walter H. Page, the American Ambassador, makes it clear that the policy of the British Government toward not only the de facto Government of Mexico, but toward the whole Mexican question, is diametrically opposed to that of President Wilson. The accuracy of the statement is vouched for by the New York Herald. His Majesty's Government, Mr. Page was told, is in entire sympathy with the motives inspiring President Wilson's policy and is as sincerely desirous as he for a settlement of the Mexican problem that will insure permanent peace. But Sir Edward Grey sees no reason to doubt the wisdom of his action in recognizing General Huerta as constitutional ad interim President of the Republic, nor does he consider it advisable to bind Great Britain at this time to any particular course of action to be pursued after the election of October 28. A full report of the conference with Sir Edward Grey was received from Mr. Page by the Department of State on October 21. By inference if not in so many words, Great Britain notifies the United States that it sees no reason for questioning the validity of an election in Mexico, since that is an "entirely internal affair." There can be no doubt that Sir Lionel Carden, the British Minister to Mexico, has the complete confidence of his Government.

Cuba.—President Menocal, on October 21, issued an appeal to the Cuban people against the obstructive tactics of the Liberal members of Congress. In it he intimates that he may be compelled to take extraordinary action if Congress persists in its refusal to convene in special session to consider his recent message recommending a new foreign loan of $15,000,000. This sum is needed, the President affirms, to pay off the indebtedness incurred by the previous Liberal administration. He adds that he is compelled to appeal directly to the people by reason of "the gravest confusion in public affairs produced by the lack of a quorum in both Houses of Congress, whereby the working of all departments of the Government has been paralyzed, and so that the people may understand the real characters of this most lamentable conflict and be prepared for what may result from it." The President speaks of the confidence he had until a few days ago that Congress would convene, but his manifesto clearly shows that he has lost all hope of the Senators and Representatives coming together. He fails to state just what measures he proposes to adopt in case Congress continues obstinate, but the tone of the appeal indicates that he considers some drastic action necessary.

Canada.—The agent of the Canadian Pacific Railway in Vienna has been arrested by the Austrian Government. The company is charged with violating the conditions of the concession granting it power to establish a trans-Atlantic line from Trieste, by carrying out of the country men who have not performed military service and by carrying on a propaganda in favor of emigration. The deficiency of men coming to the colors this year is 80,000. The Government is expected to act against all the steamship companies.—A general election is in progress in Newfoundland. The Government, which hopes for the support of the fishermen, has arranged for these to cast their votes either in their own districts or in St. John's, whence the ballots will be sent to those districts. The Liberals expect the arrangement to help them, as the Fishermen's Protective Union is supporting them.—The bye-election for the Dominion Parliament in East Middlesex has gone in favor of the Government by a majority of 368. At the general election the majority was 661. As the district of which it formed a part up to 1903 has been Conservative since confederation, the Liberals find in this result a compensation for the loss of Chateauguay.—Benjamin Ortenberg sued J. C. Plamondon for libel on account of some general accusations against the Jews. He lost his case on the ground that no individual has a right to damages on account of a general charge.

Great Britain.—Mr. Lloyd George has developed somewhat his scheme of land reforms. He proposes to set up a Minister of Lands. This new department of government is to have power over everything connected with land, even the reducing of rents. It will be the organ to determine the minimum wage and the hours of labor for agricultural laborers, to see that he is well housed, and so forth. It will be authorized to acquire waste lands, under which come game preserves; and it is to be not merely authorized and empowered, but also compelled to act.—The Admiralty has renewed its proposals to Germany to suspend the building of warships for a year.—Sir Rufus Isaacs has at last become Lord Chief Justice of England. The Unionist press says merely that the dignity of the office compels it to silence.—The old age pensions numbered on March 28, 1913, 967,921, an increase of 2.7 per cent. over the previous year. The amount paid them for 1912 was £11,704,396, an increase of 21 per cent. There was a reduction in the number of the inmates of poor-houses and of those receiving outdoor relief.—The large landholders continue to put their estates on the market, and they will probably do so more freely now that the new land campaign has been made clear.

Ireland.—The Dublin labor strike has taken a new phase. Sir George Askwith's conciliation scheme broke down when the employers refused to recognize the Transport Union till that body eliminated the syndicalist principles that Larkin, the Socialist agitator, had given it, and organized on trades-union lines, and, owing to the public sympathy with this attitude, the opposition was gradually giving way, when its collapse was quickened by the attempt, at Larkin's suggestion, of Countess Warwick, Mrs. Montefiore and other English Socialists, to spirit away the Catholic children of the strikers to England. Archbishop Walsh issued a letter, October 21, protesting against the scheme of putting Catholic children in Socialist or atheistic and certainly non-Catholic environment, and the following day a committee of priests intercepted the transportation of fifty children, some of them already aboard the steamer, in charge of a body of English women who were said to have seized them without their parents' permission or by means of bribes and false pretences. The parents having denied they had given permission, the children were promptly restored to them, or put in Catholic homes, and Mrs. Montefiore and Mrs. Rand, an American, were arrested and held on bail on the charge of kidnapping. The indignation aroused among the people of Dublin, inclusive of the strikers who are for the most part loyal Catholics though temporarily misled by Larkin on labor issues, promises to dissolve the strike and destroy the Socialist leader's influence. The feeling was intensified by the recent judicial exposure of the extensive and unlawful operations of organized Protestant proselytizers in Dublin, who used large funds and much unprincipled ingenuity to gather the children of impoverished Catholics into their "birds'-nest" institutions.—The annual Conference of the Catholic Truth Society, was held in Dublin last week under the presidency of Cardinal Logue. The Society, said his Eminence, had done much for religion and literature, and had given opportunity to literary talent, which was plentiful, to enlighten and safeguard their people, but much remained to be done, and he outlined plans for the further development and dissemination of literature on economic and social as well as religious lines. The Lord Mayor added that in Dublin particularly the propaganda against Socialistic, immoral and other pernicious literature, and the bringing of the Catholic position on every question into the homes of the people, was urgently needed, and he felt bound to give it every official support that the law allowed him. Mr. Hilaire Belloc delivered a remarkable address on "The Church and the Modern World," which will be published by the Society.

Italy.—General elections were held throughout Italy on October 26, with some disorders, in which one person was killed and many were wounded. The balloting was light but the Government is assured of a large majority. Giovanni Giolitti, the Premier, has been re-elected almost unanimously with the other members of his Cabinet, including Martini, the Socialist leader, and the former Minister of Public Instruction, Nunzio Nasi, who served a term in prison for embezzlement. In a hundred constituencies a fierce struggle was waged, especially between the Socialists and Catholics, and in these a second ballot will be taken next Sunday. In some constituencies, particularly in the Venetian provinces, ecclesiastics voted openly. At Cesena the bishop was the first to go to the polls.

Rome.—The press says the Rota tribunal will shortly examine into the facts of the annulment of the marriage of Count Boni de Castellane and his former wife, the Duchess de Talleyrand-Perigord, née Gould. This action will be taken because the Duchess appealed from the last decision of the tribunal on the ground that she had not been regularly summoned to the trial. According to report, this plea has already been disproved by the Archbishop of Paris. This evidence in the case will come before the reunited College, which consists of twelve instead of three judges.—Although several papers have announced the coming in the near future of a Servian Embassy to negotiate a Concordat with the Holy See, it has not only not arrived, but the Osservatore declares that there is no foundation for the report.

Spain.—In spite of the jubilations over the virtual alliance of France and Spain in consequence of the visit of Poincaré, the Spanish Conservatives are reported as angrily denouncing it. Maura declares that he will not accept office if such an agreement exists.—A royal decree was published on October 20 for the establishment of a Bureau of Moroccan Affairs, but the publication has caused a new outburst of opposition to the Government. The Africanist League condemns the war in Morocco as a waste of national energies and insists that peaceful measures should be resorted to. Two days afterward the Romanones Cabinet resigned. Then Maura refused to organize a Cabinet, but Dato accepted the premiership conditionally.

Portugal.—Discontent with the Republic is manifesting itself, the three years experience having shown that matters are no better than under the monarchy. The secret society known as the Carbonarios rules everything and the police do not dare to interfere with it. They are the supporters of Costa, who is said to be universally detested by the people. A revolutionary plot was discovered on October 21, and a great number of arrests were made. Two days after an outbreak occurred. Lisbon is under martial law and all the royalist newspapers have been suppressed.

Belgium.—The Belgian Colonial Minister is determined to put a stop to the vexatious measures employed by the Congo officials against the missionaries. One of these offensive Government men who was discourteous to a Prefect Apostolic has been cashiered and sent home; two magistrates whose inquisitorial searches into the affairs of the missionaries were extremely exasperating have been remanded for trial at Boma. Other functionaries have been replaced by more trustworthy public servants.

Holland.—A Union-Liberal and a Socialist have been elected respectively President and Vice-President of the Chamber of Deputies. The new Administration faces the reverse of plain sailing, having to steer its course between contradictory parliamentary questions. The present session is likely to be marked by successive attempts at bolstering up the rather precarious life of what has aptly been styled "a Cabinet of Despair." The militants of Holland, unlike their rude and noisy English sisters, have indulged in a very decorous public demonstration by way of protest against the rather dubious promise of female suffrage held out to them in the speech of the throne.

Germany.—A veritable lion hunt took place at Leipzig. A street car ran into a circus wagon and freed eight lions. The animals leaped into the streets, which at the time were filled with people, and made their first attack upon the cab horses. Two of the lions were trapped and six were killed by the police. Although a regular fusillade was instantly opened by the latter, and no fewer than two hundred shots were fired, not a single person was hurt.—The bodies of the victims of the Zeppelin "L.2" disaster were buried October 21, with solemn religious ceremonies at which the Emperor and Empress, the Crown Prince and his wife, and the other Princes of the House of Hohenzollern assisted. Sermons were delivered both by the Protestant pastor Goens and the Catholic garrison chaplain, Dr. Schwamborn. The accident has not shaken the confidence of the nation in the Zeppelin airships. The pupils of the oldest Lubeck Gymnasium have even issued an appeal to the students of the Empire urging a subscription for the building of a new naval airship. At the same time comes the news that Otto, third Prince von Bismarck, the nephew of the Iron Chancellor, has just entered an aviation school. He is in his seventeenth year.—No encouragement is given to the English overtures made to bring about a year's cessation in the building of war ships, in order that more money may be devoted to cultural purposes. Germany, it is said, would be decidedly the loser by such a plan, while England could strengthen herself by means of her colonies. Churchill's "holiday bird-lime," we are told, will catch no birds.—The International Tuberculosis Conference opened at Berlin, October 24, in the presence of Empress Auguste Victoria, who always has shown a great interest in the systematic combat against the white plague. The meetings are attracting great public attention.—Unfavorable press comment has been called forth by the rejection on the Emperor's part of Peter Behrens' plans for the new German embassy building at Washington. The architect in question had been awarded the first prize in a public competition for the best plans. The drawings of Geheimrath Ernst von Ihne, made at the Emperor's own request and not submitted to the judges, received the royal approbation. The action is regarded as arbitrary.

Austria-Hungary.—More than five hundred arrests have been made in connection with what the press calls "an emigration scandal." It is said that no less than 170,000 men serviceable for the army were smuggled out of the country by agencies which carried on a special business for this purpose. The Austrian bureaus of the Canadian Pacific are in particular held responsible; but the office of the Universal was likewise closed after its director had been arrested, while the Uranium Company, to whose line the Volturno belonged, is considered to be under suspicion. The Commissary General of Navigation has been deprived of office, and various public officials are thought to be compromised. The Government regards the movement as an attempt to reduce the defensive power of the land, and it is evident that stringent measures will be taken. The burden of military service is pressing heavily upon the people, while the military officials insist on the necessity of raising the number of recruits.

Balkans.—On October 19 Austria gave Servia eight days to vacate Albania, and on the following day the Servian Minister at Paris presented a note proposing to arrange an international commission to decide whether the points occupied by the Servians in Albania are Albanian or Servian territory, but on the same day the Servian Government notified the Powers that it had ordered its troops to withdraw immediately behind the Albanian frontier fixed by the Peace Conference in London after the first Balkan war. Thus Austria's ultimatum is complied with.—Carnegie's Commission of Inquiry finds that all the nations participating in the two wars were guilty of cruelty.

Russia.—The Uniate Greeks, it is reported, are not to be allowed to practice their religion in Russia. The pretext alleged is that the peasants fancy it is the religion of the Empire because of the similarity of the ritual.—The ritual murder trial is not yet completed, but the accuser is largely discredited and is showing signs of physical collapse, but on the other hand, it is feared that an anti-Semite rising may result in massacre of the Jews. Some appeals have been made to that effect.—The domain of the Czar has been increased by the discovery of a large island or continent north of Siberia. It extends about 60 miles north of Northeast Cape. It is called Nicholas II Land.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

The Science of Charity

We hear much in our day of scientific philanthropy. It has become a branch of university instruction. It is taught in theoretical and practical courses. It is frankly acknowledged to be a modern profession offering attractive salaries to students desiring to make of it their life work. The loss of Christian charity consequent upon the suppression of Catholic activities and the confiscation of chantries and monasteries, more than any other reason, has made necessary this new method of relief, as it has created the new pauperism.

Aside from the public administration of State charity, the dole of the rich, who frequently give not of themselves but only of their wealth, is thus generously divided between an army of high salaried officials and a multitude of classified poor. Too often, if the name of Christ is remembered at all, it is only "a statistical Christ," and not the Jesus Christ of the Gospel. We have no fault to find with scientific philanthropy in itself, for it is the best the world has to offer, and we welcome whatever lifts, however lightly, the heavy burden of the poor. But there is a danger lest Catholics may come in time to confound it with what it is not—the charity of Christ as taught in the Gospel.

It is well that we should learn whatever valuable lessons scientific philanthropy may have to teach us. We may even, for special reasons, employ its trained and salaried services. Still less is there fault to be found with those of our number who would devote themselves to it as a profession, provided they supernaturalize their motives. But they must be careful to learn likewise, from far higher sources than economic authorities, the true Catholic Science of Christian Charity, as distinct from mere scientific philanthropy. Neither must we fail to point out the dangers of attendance at the materialistic schools of philanthropy, with their evolutionary or rationalistic theories.

That charity is a science is no modern discovery. In the first pages of the history of The Acts of the Apostles by Saint Luke, we read of it as a special vocation demanding for its proper and fruitful exercise the grace and wisdom of the Holy Ghost.

"The Twelve, calling together the multitude of the disciples, said: It is not reason that we should leave the word of God, and serve tables. Wherefore, brethren, look ye out among you seven men of good reputation, full of the Holy Ghost and wisdom, whom we may appoint over this business. . . . And they chose Stephen, a man full of faith, and of the Holy Ghost, and Philip and Prochorus, and Nicanor and Timon, and Parmenas, and Nicholas, a proselyte of Antioch. These they set before the apostles; and they praying, imposed hands upon them." (The Acts, vi: 2, sqq.)

There is question here of more than the mere practice of charity. There is question of an ordination, while charity itself is the duty of every Christian. Charity is the supreme test to be applied at the day of judgment, according to our Lord. By it the elect are to be distinguished from the lost. But the charity of which Christ speaks is that by which the giver devotes himself, as well as his gifts, to the needy and afflicted, the charity inspired by the Holy Ghost and directed by His wisdom. This is the scientific charity of the Catholic Church, under which pauperism was unknown in the ages of faith, and every human suffering was made the object of organized relief, when men were found willing to sell into slavery their own bodies for the love of Christ, that they might save both the bodies and souls of their fellow-men. This was scientific charity of which the world knows little to-day. To renew the pristine splendor of this virtue Ozanam founded his first conference of Saint Vincent de Paul.

The Science of Charity may be studied in each of its two distinct aspects, the one temporal, the other spiritual. Both are combined into a single exercise of Christian virtue by the true Catholic charity worker. Whether enlisted in the organized army, or serving privately, every Catholic is called to be an adept in this supreme science of Christian Love.

Considered from its natural point of view, the science of charity, like that of philanthropy, consists mainly in tracing poverty to its causes and seeking to remedy them. Mere temporary relief, as the Catholic charity worker well knows, is insufficient. It is at times even harmful when given without discretion, no matter how deserving the poor may be. True charity consists in meeting at once the urgent necessities of the poor, and above all making it possible for them finally to help themselves. By tracing every form of misery to its source we shall come upon evils of many kinds. The removal of them will not merely afford the only true and lasting relief to those in distress, but will be likewise a real service to society at large. Questions of character, environment, social and domestic relations, and others of a similar nature, will be seriously taken into account before arriving at a final solution. If scientific philanthropy has worthy and feasible suggestions we do not hesitate to accept them; but what we shall stand most in need of is the one condition demanded by the apostles, the grace and wisdom of the Holy Ghost.

To give wisely l'aumône de la direction, the alms of good advice and moral assistance, was the first lesson Ozanam learned from M. Bailly, who presided over the first meetings of the young men whom Ozanam had brought together in answer to the taunt of the St. Simonians, "Show us your works!" The first case dealt with by him, to use a technical expression, is too well known to be circumstantially repeated here. No past master of scientific philanthropy could have "handled" it more perfectly. Ozanam did not merely still the hunger of the poor starved woman with her five children, but investigated "the case" until he was able to free her from the brutal drunken master whose marriage with her, Ozanam found to her surprise, had never been legally contracted. She was freed from his pursuit and revenge by a police order, which forced him to remain in Paris, while Ozanam begged the means that enabled her to return to her mother in Brittany. He likewise found employment and protection for her two eldest boys. It was a clean and perfect solution, a masterpiece of scientific charity, although only the work of a beginner. Yet all this might likewise have been accomplished on its purely material side by scientific philanthropy, though not with the same grace and sweetness. Of the sublime moral effects produced by Ozanam there could, however, not have been the slightest question.

The Science of Charity is not merely material. It is above all a spiritual science, and so differs from mere philanthropy, as much as grace from nature, as heaven from earth. If the purely material side of charity is thought to call for teaching and training to make it truly effective, and raise it above a mere giving of alms, the spiritual science of relieving poverty requires even far greater care and study. It can be learned only by the humble of heart. And it is for this reason that Ozanam always insisted so much upon humility and retirement. This characteristic it was which at once caught the attention of Léon Le Prévost, who thus noted his impression of the first conference of Ozanam:

"There is here at this time," he wrote in a letter, "a splendid movement of charity and faith; but it is all hidden away in its obscurity, and so escapes the notice of the indifferent world. Out of these new catacombs, if I am not mistaken, a light will go forth for the world." (Vie de M. Le Prévost, p. 35.)

There is something mysterious, sacramental, about poverty which only the eyes of faith can perceive. "Blessed is the man," says the Psalmist, "that understandeth concerning the needy and the poor." The poor are for us the representatives of Christ. He in a manner identifies Himself with them, so that the good we do to them is done to Him. The negligence and indifference we show towards them He considers as affecting Himself: "Amen, I say to you, as long as you did it not to one of these least, neither did you do it to Me." Such is the final word of everlasting judgment. God will eternally ignore those who ignore Him in the poor.

We readily, therefore, understand the reverence and humility with which Ozanam appeared in the presence of that mystery of poverty, of God in His poor. So far from looking upon the poor as indebted to him, he most sincerely considered himself highly indebted to them. He rightly understood, and ever insisted upon this fact, that the gratitude of the giver must by a divine logic far exceed the gratitude of him who receives. This is the fundamental principle of the science of charity. The poor can never accept as much as they give. No man is a true Vincentian who has not thoroughly grasped this truth, that humility and gratitude must be on the side of the donor.

Hence, likewise we can perceive why personal perfection and not the relief of poverty is the first object of the Society founded by Ozanam. It is through charity that personal perfection is sought. It is by prayer and frequent Communion that his disciples are to prepare themselves for their visits to the homes of the needy and afflicted. In the same manner it is the soul, rather than the body of the poor, which they seek to cure and to enrich. Temporal assistance, consolation and advice are an opening and preparation for spiritual instruction and counsel. Properly, therefore, to fulfil their sublime function they must daily seek to conform more perfectly to that ideal pointed out to them by the apostles, that they may be "men of good reputation, full of the Holy Ghost and Wisdom." Such is the science of charity which can be learned only in the school of Christ.

"Our main purpose," said Ozanam in brief, "was not to help the poor. This was only a means. Our object was by the practice of charity to strengthen ourselves in the Faith, and to win others for it." For this reason he avoided the publicity of modern philanthropy. The grass ever remains small and lowly, though it covers the entire earth, and so he wished the society, of which he considered himself only a promoter, to remain established in humility, no matter how largely it might gain in membership. To-day it has spread everywhere, fashioning after the model of the Divine Master countless self-sacrificing souls, devoted like Him, to the cause of humanity.

Such is the splendid answer Ozanam has given to the taunt of the Saint Simonians, the Fourierists and rationalists at the University of Paris: "What are you doing, you who boast of your Catholicity. Where are your works that prove your faith, that can make us respect and accept it?"

Novel Ethics and Education*

No country is without popular heroes. America has at least one. Like young Lochinvar he "has come out of the West." He is in Chicago at present. His name is J. Howard Moore. He is instructor in ethics in the Crane Technical High School, Chicago, Illinois. He is an author too. He has written "The Universal Kinship," "The New Ethics," etc. In fact he became a hero by a book. It happened this way. One day the Illinois Legislature passed a bill compelling teachers to instruct their pupils in morals, thirty minutes a week. Forthwith there was a panic. Ladies' hearts fluttered and men's lips dropped naughty words. Nobody in Illinois knew how to teach morals. Nobody? Just one. J. Howard Moore. He rose to the occasion, checked the panic and set the teachers up morally by "Ethics and Education." Illinois pedagogues, and indeed all that portion of the human race which tents on Western land should be grateful to him. For the book is quite the most wonderful issued in many a year. Within its gray covers is wisdom to console, and power to uplift the human race from the sodden earth to the clouds. The birds of the air and the beasts of the forest and jungle would even find solace in its pages. And all this is due to J. Howard Moore, unaided and unabettled. Let no one think that this is high praise. The catalogue of the topics treated is alone a cause for a psalm of thanksgiving. Evolution, phases of ethics,—such as socialism, eugenics and euthanasia,—education, pantheism and hence theodicy, are all taken up in turn and out of turn.

First of all, everybody and everything is out of joint with the times. Our "juristic institutions" are an abomination of desolation. Our political and industrial institutions are the inventions of wolves. Our system of education is stupid. It is pre-Darwinian. It is false all over. It assumes that the "human young" come into the world pure and spotless (sic). They don't. Man does not come from the skies. He comes from the jungle. He is not a child of the sun. He is the offspring of the ape. The human baby is simian all the way round, in structure, habit, speech. It is a quadruped. Its earliest locomotion is on all fours. At one stage of its development it had a tail much longer than its legs and provided with a regular set of muscles for wagging it (!). There is no difference between man and beast. They form one family. The same process which produced man also produced the cockle-bur, mosquito, the rattlesnake and the lizard. The theory that our body has been presented to us by the ape and the quadruped, still more remotely by the lizard and the fish, but that our psychology has been generated by us unaided by antecedent forms, or has been surreptitiously injected by some agent from outside the earth, is a theory no longer tenable. The human soul has ancestors just as the body has. Its ancestors look out through the eyes of quadrupeds and up from the waters where fishes swim. Hence men should venerate trees, should take off their hats in reverence whenever they go into a forest. For amongst the swaying branches was the cradle of human physiology and psychology. It was in the forest that man acquired hands and perpendicularity and distinctly human form. Children should be told all this. Why not? J. Howard Moore sees no objection to it. He would rather be an evolved monkey than a degraded god.

Ordinarily exhaustion would occur at this stage. The average author would lay down his pen, but J. Howard Moore rises to a sublime climax. "Give me the power to determine who shall take part in the production of new generations of men and in a few hundred years I will produce a race of gods." Mr. Roosevelt, however, must be ruled out. Otherwise J. Howard Moore will decline the office of manufacturer of gods. For the mighty hunter, he declares, has in his psychology, and rather prominently too, about all (sic) of the essential characteristics of a barbarian.

Thus do lizards and cockle-burs and gods and toads and monkeys and Roosevelt, and sheep and coyotes and seals and babies and trees and molars pass under the eye in such array that we are not sure where one begins and another ends. And we should not be sure of this. They are all one. J. Howard Moore says so. And in the saying thereof he introduces us to his god. We are all One. There are no "others." There is only One. That One is The Sentient World. The Self includes all that feels. "Others" so called, have come from the same great womb as we have. . . . Each of us is a cell in the gigantic organism of Life. The parts come and go, but the Great Being is immortal. The Law of the Larger Self means Universal Mutualism. . . . Here is a god that we can love and bow down to and worship,—a god, moreover, who will not pass away, nor turn to incense when put into the crucible of Science. . . . Here is a Gospel of a New Paradise. (The number of converts is not mentioned). There we have our god.

Our morality is found in "Utility" the supreme standard of right and wrong. Children should be taught that morality is merely a general name for those rules of association which men have found necessary to beings living in a state of mutualism. In very early times, before marriage had come into practice among men, the child took the name of the mother and belonged to the mother, the father being a wanderer and unknown. Man later usurped woman's place through his great physical strength, enslaving woman, causing the child to take his one name.

Lying, cheating, stealing, revenge, promiscuity, pugnacity and laziness were all honorable among primitive men, but they are an anachronism in these more mutualistic times.

Herein are science, ethics and religion crystalized for Illinois teachers and their pupils. And it is all done so scientifically, yet withal so tactfully, so delicately, that gentle souls are apt to be reduced to a swoon. Not often is it given to read that "the great judges of England cannot render a decision. . . ; unless they wear lowsy looking wigs." Nor do the elementary rules of grammar and metaphor often find more perfect illustration than: "A child is a tin-pail setting out under the drip." (Alas! why are we not told whether the result of the "setting" is a hen or a goose or whooping cough?) Lastly, there is no one so dull of instinct as not to appreciate that "Man has lost nothing by Evolution save his wind bags." In defiance of logic, we wonder if at least one man has not escaped such a loss.

And what shall we say to all this? Not another word. We fear to spoil the humor of it. We shall but sum the book up in one little verse:

"There was an ape in days that were earlier
Centuries passed and his hair grew curlier

Centuries more gave a thumb to his wrist
Then he became a man and a Positivist."

There it all is; science, ethics, religion, all. Is that all? That's all. Then, why make such a fuss about it? Because it is a type of the books that are now issued for teachers and children. And we wish to say to the authors, publishers, parents and teachers: "He that shall scandalize one of these little ones that believe in me, it were better for him that a millstone should be hanged about his neck, and that he should be drowned in the depths of the sea."

R. H. TIERNEY, S.J.

Two Views of Catholicism

There was an interesting discussion by the Hampden Association of Congregational Ministers at the Faith Church, Springfield, Mass., October 14, on the comparative strength and weaknesses of the Catholic and Protestant churches. The report on which we rely is given in the Springfield Republican for the following day. That the discussion was no impromptu affair, but the result of study and deliberation, is shown by the fact that the several participants read their papers before joining in the debate that followed. Two of the principals on that occasion represented pretty faithfully the divergent opinions regarding the Catholic Church, which we venture to say are of wide extent among Protestant ministers here in the States to-day.

Rev. Charles Wight, of the Second Congregational Church of Chicopee, spoke with enthusiasm of the work of the Catholic Church, and declared "in no uncertain terms," that Chicopee, without the Catholic Church, would present a spectacle to provoke the pity of God. The Church, he said, has the most wonderful organization of any religious institution, and is admirably fitted to cope with the problems of religion for the foreigners, of which Chicopee has so many. He said that the Protestant churches would be totally at sea among the alien population of Chicopee were it not for the Catholics. Rev. Mr. Wight also stated that the Catholic Church has some qualities which should never be overlooked in a comparison of churches. "Its faith is a true one, and as long as it retains its truth, Protestants should not grow excited about the spread of Catholicism in the United States. It is a Christian Church, and its powerful organization and smooth system of work present a solid front to the un-Christian forces—a solidity which the Protestants need more than any other one thing." Of course, there could be no discussion if all the assembled ministers were to say the same thing, and it would be too much to expect that such praise of the Catholic Church would pass without an attempt to point out the weakness of the Catholic Church system. So the Rev. Henry M. Dyckman boldly entered the lists and broke a lance in the cause of Protestantism, presenting his views as to the contributions of Protestantism towards the Christian faith and the order of the future. Protestantism, he affirmed, "is a protest against the tendency to smother individualism." The Catholic Church, he continued, "sacrifices the individual to the system, and although it may have a better organization and more silver and gold than the divided Protestants, yet it allowed its members to offer gifts instead of themselves. It does not demand the complete self-surrender which Christ wants from men." The Rev. Mr. Dyckman disavowed any intention of appearing to be uncharitable. "There are, of course," he hastened to say, "thousands of Catholics who are just as pure and sweet Christians as it is possible for a human being to be, but nevertheless the Church system allows compromise between men and their God. It takes men into the Church without changing them, whereas the Protestant Churches do change them. This complete surrender of men to God is the greatest contribution of the Protestant Churches to the future."

Here, then, we have two views of the Catholic Church, wholly divergent, if not diametrically opposite, entertained by two representative ministers of the same Protestant Church body. Both of these men we may readily admit are honest in their convictions and with the rare courage of these convictions are fearless in expressing them. Which is right, the Rev. Mr. Wight, or the Rev. Mr. Dyckman? The Rev. Mr. Wight judges by what he sees. He lives in a thriving industrial centre in New England where there is a large number of factory workers principally Poles and French-Canadians. Daily he beholds thousands of men and women sober, industrious, God-fearing, faithful to their religious obligations and observant of all the duties incumbent on good citizens. In this small community there are three Catholic churches, each with its parochial school, with an attendance of 1,500 children whose education is permeated and reinforced with the vital element of supernatural religion. The parents are good citizens to-day, the rising generation give strongest hope of developing into loyal and patriotic Americans. Zealous priests and self-sacrificing sisterhoods devote their lives to the task. The Rev. Mr. Wight has his eyes wide open and if he wears glasses they will help him to see better and do not color or distort his vision. The spectacle of thriving Chicopee is not unique in New England but may be witnessed in a hundred centres in the one time home of the Puritan as well as wherever throughout the length and breadth of the land, the Catholic Church forms a notable part of the community.

There is no evidence at hand regarding the particular district where the Rev. Mr. Dyckman comes from. He cannot be wholly ignorant of the religious and educational work of the Catholic Church. But there are those who have eyes and see not and it is regrettable that while there are many Wights in the land there are just as many and probably more represented by the Rev. Mr. Dyckman. The latter Reverend gentleman cannot rid himself of the bogey of Catholicism. If the Catholic is faithful to duty, he is a slave to the Church, if he is obedient and God-fearing he is crushed, if aliens are not only held in check but taught to become upright citizens, then we have only another example of "smothered individualism." Mr. Dyckman admits there "are thousands of Catholics who are just as pure and sweet Christians as it is possible for a human being to be." Why not admit that this is the work of the Church whose obedient children they are? By their fruits you shall know them. We do not judge a tree to be good by the occasional rotten apple that falls to the ground but if the fruit of a tree is consistently and uniformly good, then the tree must be good and if the fruit be the supernatural works of faith and life and charity, then the church is divine. We are sorry that the Rev. Mr. Dyckman does not allow facts to speak for him, but has recourse to what he imagines or what he has read of the Church in poisoned sources of information. "The Church system allows compromise between men and their God," he says. Where, when, how? Does the Catholic Church allow a man any compromise in the matter of swearing, stealing, or injuring his neighbor; does it allow any yielding to his passions or set any limit to the number or quality of his good acts? May he reject the truth or accept only what he thinks is true? And as to self-sacrifice. Is it true or false that the Church allows its members to offer gifts instead of themselves? As for silver and gold, seeing that the vast bulk of Catholics are poor, we fear the silver and gold are nearly all contributed by Protestants, but for personal self-sacrifice there is nothing to compare with the generosity of Catholics. Witness the more than 60,000 women in the United States alone, who, without any thought or expectation of reward in this life devote themselves body and soul to the sick, the homeless, the insane, the wayward and the outcasts of society and then say whether or no the Church allows its members to offer gifts instead of themselves.

Withal, judging from press reports, the discussion of the strength and weakness of the Catholic and Protestant Churches, which we have here commented upon, was carried on with remarkable calmness and forbearance. Not only was there an absence of all rancor but such good feeling as augurs a better understanding and a greater kindness for the future.

EDWARD SPILLANE, S.J.

A Catholic Social Guild for Women

The gratifying success of the exhibit of Catholic charities held in New York City last Spring, is not without significance. It was not merely a concrete record of what had been already accomplished; it was an earnest of a new spirit in Catholic social work, a spirit of more effective organization and of more active co-operation by the laity. Whatever foundation there may have been in the past, it would seem that there will be soon not even an apparent reason for the reproach so often leveled against American Catholics that they are indifferent to the need of mutual endeavor in social and charitable labor under the guidance of the Church. The awakening is evident in many parts of the country. As an example, less than two years ago a social guild of Catholic women was established in the city of Buffalo. In the short period of its existence it has met with remarkably gratifying success, which seems worthy of record.

The guild had its origin in the endeavor to supply the Italian parishes of Buffalo and vicinity with trained and devoted catechists. Contact with the children in the catechism classes soon revealed the fact that there were many other needs to be supplied, both corporal and spiritual, of the parents as well as of the children. To accomplish this work effectively, it was at once apparent that some permanent form of organization was imperative. Accordingly, with the consent and enthusiastic approval of the Right Reverend Charles H. Colton, D.D., Bishop of Buffalo, the organization was effected on October 8th, 1911, with the chancellor of the diocese, the Reverend T. J. Walsh, D.D., as Moderator. The Mount Carmel Guild was the name adopted for the organization with the motto, "Pro Fide et Patria." The social object, as defined in the constitutions, was "To better the spiritual, mental and physical condition of all who shall receive its varied ministrations, which shall be exercised specifically and principally upon and for the child; to foster the spirit of doing for others; and to promote cordial Catholic relationship in its membership and with individuals and societies engaged in charitable fields."

To accomplish the object of the Guild, the work was divided into various departments. These numbered seven at the end of the first year, two more being added in the course of the second. The activities of each department were directed by a chairman, and carried on by a committee of active members. Each active member of the Guild was expected to affiliate with one or more of these committees. There were associate members also, who helped financially. At present the committees are as follows: Catechetical, Social Inquiry, Literature, Sewing, Juvenile Reform, Material Transfer, Physical Relief, Day Nursery and Publicity. There is also a Fellowship Committee consisting of two members of each of the other committees. At the end of the first year there were 265 active and 80 associate members. These numbers had risen to 342 and 150 respectively at the end of the second. A notable feature of the active membership is that it is mainly made up of women occupied for the greater part of each week in various professions, particularly in teaching. The work accomplished represents, therefore, a vast amount of self-sacrifice, performed during hours of well-deserved leisure, often sadly needed for rest and recuperation.

As for the members engaged, the Catechetical department is the largest single activity of the Guild, one hundred teachers giving instruction in catechism to over 3,000 pupils in five parishes, four Italian and one Hungarian. Besides these hundred teachers, fifty-one other catechists are waiting for classes to be organized. This catechetical instruction has not been done at haphazard and without due preparation. From the inception of this department, a course of instruction in catechetical method has been given, with one lecture each week, by the Reverend E. F. Gibbons, Superintendent of Schools of the Buffalo diocese and an expert in catechetical work. During the past year 1,000 children were prepared for First Communion, classes in Bible History have been instituted for over 500 boys and girls approaching maturity, and a large number of boys approaching manhood have been brought back to the practice of their religion. In one Italian parish a singing class has been formed in order to assist the pastor in carrying out more worthily the liturgical functions. Nor has the work of these catechists been confined to the class room. Many visits have been made to the houses of the children in order to better their material condition, or perform any other office of charity that may be needed. The self-sacrifice entailed in all this work may, perhaps, best be gauged from the fact that the teachers give their services on three days a week, besides attending the weekly catechetical lecture.

The main work of the Social Inquiry committee up to the present has been the taking of a census of the Italian parishes of Buffalo. The census of one parish has been completed, and that of another is in active progress. A marked result of this work was the discovery of numerous Catholic families which had concealed either their presence or their Catholicity from the priests of the parish. Incidentally many opportunities were found to exercise the corporal works of mercy.

To the Juvenile Reform committee was committed the task of caring for the Catholic children brought before the Juvenile Court of Buffalo. Its success has been eminent. At each session of the court, which is held thrice weekly, two devoted members of this committee are present. Perhaps there is no better commentary on its success than the numerous demands made upon the committee by the clergy, school principals, teachers, parents, friends and neighbors of children in physical, moral or spiritual need. The presiding judge of the Juvenile Court has been most active in furthering this work, and has bestowed unstinted praise on the labors of this committee. Unlike many similar endeavors, its aim has been to preserve the home and better the home influence of the unfortunate children to whom it ministers, and its success in frustrating the proselytizing tendencies of some non-Catholic organizations has been not inconsiderable.

The limits of this article forbid more than a brief description of the activities of the other committees. The committee of Material Transfer collects and distributes old and cast-off wearing apparel of all kinds. It has its depot and distributing office with regular hours for distribution, which distribution it carries out also through the other committees, as they may discover and report needy cases. The committee of Physical Relief has an enviable record of success in securing employment, as well as dispensing medical and financial aid for hundreds of families. The Literature Committee collects and distributes good literature, subscribes to Catholic magazines and places them where most needed; has collected and sent two large boxes of books to a Jesuit Indian mission in the West; has prepared and circulated lists of Catholic books available in the local public library. It has published an excellent Catholic calendar, which will be annual, and is preparing to issue a cheap edition of Smarius' "Points of Controversy." It plans, further, to place select libraries of Catholic books in hospital wards, jails, etc., and other public institutions. The committee is, further, affiliated with the Catholic Truth Society of Brooklyn.

The Sewing Committee conducts three sewing schools for poor children, who number now over three hundred. One of the schools was established in a parish where a sewing school had been opened under Protestant auspices, to which Catholic immigrant children had been invited with distinct intent of proselytizing. The Day Nursery has been opened in a Polish district with a Polish Felician Sister and a matron in charge. It has been a success from its inception a year ago, and has cared for hundreds of children. A kindergarten is conducted at the nursery, as well as an employment bureau for the mothers, and a club for Polish girls. A temporary day nursery was successfully carried on during the last two canning seasons in a near-by canning district. During the past season there were four Sisters in charge. The Fellowship Committee pays regular visits to sick members, and performs for the Guild members all the delicate offices of sympathy and condolence that Catholic charity suggests on the occasion of personal or family affliction. Finally the Publicity Committee sees to it that modest but authentic reports of the activities of the Guild reach the daily and weekly press.

This all too brief synopsis of the work of the Mount Carmel Guild of Buffalo does scant justice to the enthusiasm that conceived the work and to the energy and self-sacrifice with which the conception has been translated into splendid results. Already the Guild has inspired emulation and an organization on the same plan has been formed in the near-by city of Rochester. Doubtless many other cities of the United States can boast of groups of women united in similar cooperative Catholic charity. To such this account of the Mount Carmel Guild may be an encouragement. To others it may prove to be not without inspiration. M. J. AHERN, S.J.

Anglican Bishops as Teachers

In the days when he was still one of the leading figures in the University of Oxford, Newman startled the Anglican bishops by appealing to them as "our Holy Fathers, the representatives of the Apostles, and the Angels of the Churches." Newman was then still under the illusion that the bishops were all this, though these eminent officials of the establishment did not take themselves so seriously. Later on as a Catholic he expressed the opinion that the best qualification for an Anglican prelate was to be a "moderate man," not given to committing himself to any very definite pronouncement on burning questions, and able to steer "a safe course between the Charybdis of Yea and the Scylla of Nay," when such questions were being agitated.

Many Anglican bishops are still men who adopt the "safe" and "moderate" policy. But occasionally one or other of the Episcopal bench speaks out plainly, and then the chances are that another of his brethren flatly contradicts him. A few years ago a puzzled Anglican clergyman wrote to a Church paper to tell of his troubles. He had been taught during his studies that a bishop in the government of his diocese had a special grace and guidance of the Holy Spirit, so in his first "cure of souls" he followed the general teaching he gathered from his bishop's utterances. But then he was transferred to another diocese and found that what his first bishop blessed the other banned, and he was faced by the dilemma that either they were guided by the Holy Spirit to utter contradictions, or were not guided at all. Apparently he solved the difficulty by deciding henceforth to be a guide to himself.

Just now it would be awkward for any logical-minded cleric or layman of the Anglican Establishment to change his domicile from London to Manchester, or vice versa. For the Bishops of London and Manchester have for once spoken out on the same question, and spoken plainly, one saying "Yea" and the other "Nay."

Dr. Winnington Ingram, of London, is a High Churchman. He believes he is a duly ordained priest and prelate of the Catholic Church, the successor not merely of Elizabeth's bishops of London, but of St. Mellitus, who was consecrated by St. Augustine and St. Erkenwald, the miracle worker of the seventh century, and as much a priest as they were. He argues that nothing particular happened at the Reformation, nothing to break the line of continuity between new and old. At the Church Congress at Southampton this week he preached a sermon advocating the invocation of the saints as a sound Catholic doctrine too long neglected by the Church of England. It was not "Romanist," he explained. The Eastern Church held it. Though the bishop calls himself a Catholic, he was a sound enough Protestant by an ignorant attack on the "abuses" of Catholic devotion to our Blessed Lady.

The Bishop of Manchester, Dr. Edmund Arbuthnott Knox, is a man of a different type. He is a low Churchman, "as Protestant as they make them." Dr. Ingram believes in clerical celibacy, Dr. Knox has been twice married, the second time when he was already a bishop. This is one typical point of difference. An Anglican bishop when he wants to make an important pronouncement writes to the Times. Dr. Knox has chosen a less important daily paper for a protest against the misleading utterances of his brother of London. He writes to the London Express of this morning a letter in which he says:

"The revival in the Church of England of invocation of the saints I should regard as a return to Paganism, from which source the Church adopted the practice with most disastrous results."

And he ends by saying:

"We are on dangerous ground when we undertake to canonize; while popular superstition finds in the practice its most congenial soil and invents saints who can aid us find pigs or heal warts, etc."

So one bishop says the doctrine of invocation is Christian and the other replies that it is paganism. And the two remain in brotherly communion as prelates of the same "branch of the Church Catholic." Anglicans are fond of appealing to the practice of the primitive Church. One can imagine what would have happened if two of the bishops of Asia or Italy or Gaul thus flatly contradicted each other, say in the fourth century. It is quite certain they would not have kept up the pretence of being brethren living in unity or met in synod, or at some great function. And yet at the opening session of the Church Congress the Bishop of Winchester, in his inaugural address, was eloquent on the "essential unity" of the Anglican Church.

Some idea of the ruthless character of the war in the Balkans can be had from a paper contributed to the Nineteenth Century for October by Captain A. H. Trapman, "an Englishman with the Greek army." He reports that "there is not a village to-day through which Bulgarians have passed that has not been looted, wholly or partially burnt, and dozens of inhabitants massacred—or worse. I estimate that during the past nine months the Bulgarians have done to death between 450,000 and 500,000 peaceable inhabitants, men, women and children, Turkish and Greek." Yet Christian Europe looked on unmoved while these atrocities were being committed.

BOSTON'S GREAT MISSIONARY CONGRESS

Last week, just as AMERICA was going to press, the memorable Second Missionary Congress began its sessions in Boston, under the auspices of His Eminence Cardinal O'Connell. At the pontifical Mass in the Cathedral, where the Papal Delegate Archbishop Bonzano offered the Holy Sacrifice, six archbishops, sixty bishops and two hundred priests were seated in the sanctuary, while four thousand people crowded into the Cathedral and twenty thousand waited outside unable to obtain admission. After a message from the Holy Father had been read, his Eminence the Cardinal thanked the assembled prelates and delegates for their attendance and explained with his usual eloquence the purpose of the Congress, which was in brief to fan into a still brighter flame the zeal of prelates, priests and people for the extension of the Kingdom of Christ. Calling attention to what had already been achieved by the Society for the Propagation of the Faith, he dwelt upon the urgent need of increasing its efficiency in our own and other lands, and pleaded for concentrated action especially in the Philippines. In the evening, Bishop Fallon, of London, Ont., enlarged upon the same theme.

Pontifical Mass inaugurated the proceedings of the following day, and then the first business session was begun. After an address by the Papal Delegate, Archbishop Quigley, of Chicago, explained in detail the object of the Congress. It was not for pomp or parade or ostentation, he reminded his hearers, but for the purpose of creating a wider and deeper and more enthusiastic cooperation in mission work. It was to assist, strengthen and expand the organizations already existing, as well as to advance the new, and for that end to establish a nation-wide union of the hierarchy, clergy and people in the interests of the cause. It was also to determine what instrumentalities were to be employed for the furtherance of this plan, and he suggested lectures, text-books and charts relative to missions in the parochial schools, as well as missionary periodicals and magazines in the various languages for our polyglot population. Finally, missionaries from foreign lands should be welcomed in the various churches to explain what they were doing, and a Supreme Missionary Bureau should be established, no matter where, to direct and guide similar but subsidiary organizations in different parts of the country, which, however, were to be safeguarded in their special activities.

Bishop Schrembs, of Toledo, followed with a paper on "The Spirit of the Congress," and in the afternoon there was an illustrated lecture in Horticultural Hall to explain the purpose of the famous chapel car which has attracted so much attention. A little later, in Symphony Hall, Dr. McGlinchey, of Boston, presented a statement of the splendid results achieved in Boston in the interest of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith, whose activities were fostered in the individual parishes of the diocese. He instanced many examples of almost heroic self-sacrifice by priests and people to help the efficiency of the Society which, he was happy to say, had, since its permanent establishment in Boston, fifteen years ago, received no less than $800,000 in contributions.

Of course, Rev. Dr. Kelly, who is the soul of the Extension Movement, also spoke, and was listened to with rapt attention as he dilated upon the great battle for God that is being fought to-day. Archbishop Blenk, of New Orleans, and Archbishop Pitaval, of Santa Fé, explained the needs of their respective dioceses, and Bishop Muldoon, of Rockford, Ill., read a paper that called for immediate attention to the Immigration Problem, whose solution is becoming every day more and more difficult.

In the evening a public reception was held by his Eminence the Cardinal at the Copley Plaza, where Mayor Fitzgerald extended the welcome of the city to the delegates, and rehearsed the story of the lives of the bishops of Boston from the time of Cheverus to that of the present distinguished incumbent.

Meantime many of the prelates and missionaries had been busy preaching in the various churches, and on Wednesday, when the business sessions of the Congress had been brought to a close, two mass meetings were held in Boston, and seven others in the suburbs and near-by cities. Cardinal O'Connell may well rejoice at the success of this great Missionary Congress which he inspired, and whose success his presidency ensured.

The Veuillot Centenary at Boynes

PARIS, October 7, 1913.

The celebration in honor of Louis Veuillot's Centenary began on Sunday, October 5th, by a fête at Boynes, the little village in the Diocese of Orleans, where the Catholic journalist was born just one hundred years ago. The celebrations that will take place in Paris next month will be more splendid and more solemn, but the meeting of last Sunday had a familiar touch that gave it a special charm. The surroundings of Boynes are peaceful; the autumn tints that colored the fields and vineyards added to the picturesqueness of the scene, the sun shone brightly and the dominant note of the fête was purely religious. At Boynes, Louis Veuillot was honored less as a writer and a controversialist than as a devoted son of the Church, and the echo of past quarrels died away on the threshold of the village sanctuary where he received holy baptism.

The celebrations began with a solemn high Mass, followed by a procession to the baptismal fonts. The church, a fine medieval building, was full to overflowing, and at least one-half of the assistants were men. Among those who came from Paris there were, besides the members of Veuillot's family, Mgr. Baudrillart, Rector of the Catholic University, and many leading Catholic journalists; the sermon was preached by a priest who is himself a native of Boynes.

After Mass came a banquet that was organized by a group of Catholic writers. Louis Veuillot's only surviving child, the widowed Madame Sierrou, was present with her son, together with the children of his brother Eugene, the companion of his long life of labor. It might be noticed that in the speeches that followed irritating or ticklish subjects were avoided; few men were so violently attacked during their lifetime as Louis Veuillot, but in the peaceful atmosphere of his native village, in the shadow of the old church where he was made a Christian, only the features of his career that appeal to all Catholics were touched upon; it is these that gave him a lasting place of honor among the soldiers of Christ. Later in the afternoon took place what was perhaps the most interesting incident of the day. Standing in front of the cottage where Veuillot was born, Père Janvier, the orator of Notre Dame, delivered a charming address full of tact, depth and feeling. He wore his white Dominican habit, which at Notre Dame he is obliged to conceal under the costume of a Canon of the Cathedral. Touching on Veuillot's naturally ardent and fearless character, he described him as a born soldier, "whose pen dipped in irony, in good sense, in truth, pursued poets, philosophers and artists whose work he judged harmful. . . . Indifferent when only his person was attacked, he was relentless when his Gospel, his faith and his Lord were insulted. . . . The field of battle was the real arena where his influence was exercised." Père Janvier recognized the fact that Veuillot occasionally "forgot the laws of charity," and that he may have been too much of a born fighter, but he added, "no one can accuse him of having drawn back, of having trembled, of having been lukewarm or shifty when truth and justice were threatened."

He paid homage to his filial submission to the Holy See; in this respect his obedience was unquestioning and absolute; he obeyed the Pope on matters of faith, as all

Catholics are bound to do, but even on other questions, where he was free to judge for himself, he loved, from a filial feeling, to follow the Pope's lead. "Without thinking it necessary to make use of all his methods," added Père Janvier, "we shall be happy if we carry as far as he did our zeal, our courage, our perseverance, and the love of pure truth."

It seemed to those present that the sight of the surroundings among which Louis Veuillot was born and bred helped to explain many of his characteristics, and in a certain measure to excuse some of his defects. He was a peasant born, hence his moral healthiness; his simplicity of heart, directness of purpose and utter absence of any morbid element. But his early training was a rough one, and this accounts for a certain want of polish and for an occasional coarseness in speech. He was a combination of delicate tenderness for those whom he loved, and of virulent detestation for those who, in his opinion, were the enemies of God and mankind. These opposite feelings he expressed in the forcible language of which he was a master; thus he could be, according to circumstances, exquisitely poetical and tender and violently abusive.

After Père Janvier's discourse all those present went to pray at the foot of a great Calvary that stands in the midst of a fertile plain, beyond the little village. To this Calvary is attached a touching incident that was told to the assembled crowd by the Curé of Boynes. When, in 1793, the Revolutionists of the country came to destroy an old wayside cross that stood on the same spot, they found themselves in presence of a sturdy peasant woman, armed with a hatchet, who in vigorous language, forbade them to come any nearer. This brave woman, by name Marianne Bourrassin, was Louis Veuillot's grandmother.

He certainly inherited something of her fearless spirit, and with other weapons he never ceased to defend the Cross.

Holland's Picturesque Festivities

The record of the Centennial festivities that have kept all Holland in a ferment of patriotic excitement during the past two months forms a luminous page in her history. They commemorate the restoration of National independence under the hereditary House of Orange-Nassau, when the Corsican domination was overthrown in November, 1813. Time, or rather the freedom that followed, did away with most of the rancorous party feeling which then prevailed, and a united people is now celebrating the first centenary of its independence under the benign rule of Her Gracious Majesty, Queen Wilhelmina.

The public festivities extended over the entire country. Scarcely a village or country town but tried to rival on a limited scale the more pretentious efforts of the larger cities. Historical parades, public concerts, fireworks, races and national sports were the rule everywhere. In as many as half a dozen great cities there were public exhibitions of various kinds; notable among them being the Ecclesiastical Art Exhibits at 's Hertogenbosch. It attracted thousands of visitors, chief among whom was Her Majesty. Her annual visit to Amsterdam had been arranged so as to coincide with the celebration at that place. As is always her custom in her daily drives through the city, she went to some of the poorer quarters and aroused unbounded enthusiasm among the swarming thousands living there.

One interesting and attractive feature of the celebration in the capital was the great shipping exhibit on the river banks of Het Y. Another was the reproduction of the old-time national costumes and dances which are still, to some extent, retained in various rural sections of the Netherlands. From many parts of Holland men and women had been brought together for the purpose of displaying their quaint, and in many instances, picturesque attire and of exemplifying the old-fashioned terpsichorean movements which have come down from past centuries. Conspicuous among these peasants was a group of fair-haired Frisian girls, wearing their handsome lace caps ruffled in the back with the highly burnished golden headplates underneath. This solid gold article of finery is very close-fitting and covers the sides and back of the head. Attached to it are richly bejeweled ornaments which project at the temples. In their silk skirts and smart-looking frocks these girls were the cynosure of every eye, and for all the world looked like so many live people who had stepped out of the canvas of some old Dutch master. When Queen Wilhelmina was a young girl she frequently appeared in public on her state visits to Friesland arrayed in this attire, and won the hearts of the people by this mark of patriotic sympathy.

The great historical procession and parade at The Hague formed the climax of these festivities. It was a bioscope of the successive periods in Holland's history from the time when Julius Cæsar and his Roman Legions tried to subjugate the unconquerable Batavi up to the stirring events of 1813. About two thousand persons, a very large number of them on horseback, participated in the pageant which took fully an hour to pass a given point. Tens of thousands of people were crowded along the line of march as the procession moved through the principal streets and squares of the city. The Queen, the Queen Mother and Prince Henry, seated in front of the Palace and in sociable contact with the people, were interested spectators and received the salutes of the passing parades, as well as the deafening acclaim of the multitude. The historical exactness of each succeeding group, floats and triumphal cars, all kept the crowds electrified.

A pleasing feature in this panoply of past wars and the procession of figures of the great men and women of history was the representation of an old-time Dutch country wedding. The traditional figures of Kloris and Roosje were the happy bride and groom. They were seated above the heads of the spectators in an old-fashioned high-wheeled chaise, drawn by a prancing horse. The animal's mane and tail were deftly braided and hung with gayly flowing ribbons. The harness was of dazzling brightness and the reins spotlessly white. Immediately in front of the vehicle marched the frolicking wedding guests, who flung in every direction among the crowd the bride's candy of sugar-coated nuts. The scene was an occasion of great merriment for all of the spectators, from royalty down to the humble classes. It brought the present in close touch with the past. In many of the coast towns the landing of the Prince of Orange (William I) on the beach at Scheveningen near The Hague after the battle of Leipsic was enacted. The entire celebration was everywhere a success, unmarred by any accidents, and showed that, despite our "commercial age," patriotism in Holland is as much alive as ever, and that Queen Wilhelmina is among the most respected of modern rulers, and is idolized by her people.

The Jews in Line

Scarcely a week slips by nowadays in which one interested in the question fails to come upon some striking testimony given in this or that section concerning the necessity and the value of religion in the education of children. Last week we had occasion to chronicle the sentiment of the great Protestant Episcopal gathering in New York; the week before in distant South Dakota the Baptists assembled in convention were electrified by an uncommonly vigorous appeal for the thoroughly Christian formation of children during their school days; and but the other day the Jewish Community in Philadelphia resolved to expand the facilities for religious education already controlled by them in order that more of their children may enjoy its benefit.

This Community is a body somewhat like our own Catholic Federation, except that it is a local not a national organization. It is made up of delegates representing the various Jewish societies in Philadelphia, and it meets annually to discuss questions relative to the faith of its members, with the purpose of bringing about concerted action among all the Jews of the city on matters in which they have a common interest. This year the assembly was held on October 19 and 212 delegates from 37 different organizations met in conference.

In discussing the educational situation among their people the fact was brought out that there are in the Quaker City more than 41,000 Jewish children of school age, and of these a little more than 10,000 are receiving a religious education at a cost to the religious body of $85,000 per year. An eloquent appeal was made to widen the opportunity heretofore provided in order that many more of their little ones may be equally favored, and a motion was passed establishing a regular board of education to have the entire matter in charge.

In New York, too, plans for the betterment of the Jewish religious schools were discussed, on October 22, at a meeting of the Religious School Union in connection with the Eastern Council of Reform Rabbis. Rabbi Grossman, chairman of the Union, said, in opening the meeting, that while the true bulwark of the nation, as far as the Jews were concerned, was not the temple of Judaism but rather the religious school, the influence of the religious school was not as potent or as vital as it should be. Another speaker, Rabbi Henry Berkowitz, contended that the new education which has developed with modern ideas of instruction had failed in the building of character. "The problem to-day," he said, "is to apply the new education to religious instruction. A better correlation between public education and religious education is needed. Never before was there a condition of affairs demanding the appropriation of every effort for religious culture."

We may be quite certain that the matter will not rest with mere eloquent speechmaking. The Jews among us are a people quick to combine in concerted and efficacious action once they are convinced that a suggestion made to them really touches the wellbeing of their race. Would that their example might influence to similar earnestness of active work the multitude of Christian folk who realize the gravity of the need of religious influence in fashioning men and women. There would speedily be an end of the foolish superstition of the age—our excessive and unfounded faith in the power of mere book learning. That the superstition has held Americans bound so long is inexplicable. Certainly one must be blind if he will not see that the more men are simply educated, the more keen-witted and successful they are in fraud, the more expert in taking advantage, the more powerful in oppression. None of the things which disturb and disgrace our land are due to lack of education. They are due to lack of character—and character building apart from the influence of religious training is an unthinkable thing.

A Timely Appeal

There was an appeal made at one of the Illinois State Charity conference mass-meetings in Rockford, on October 12, which might well be repeated and emphasized at similar gatherings in other States besides Illinois. Urging that "every encouragement and facility should be given the representatives of the Gospel in every State institution and also in general social work," Bishop Muldoon, the head of the Diocese of Rockford, advocated the erection of a separate building at every State institution to be used solely for religious purposes. In plain and simple speech he asked that the most important teacher for the weak and growing child, and the most helpful guide for those of mature years in need of reformation, the minister of religion, should be as fairly dealt with as is practically every other worker in such institutions. He claimed that he was not asking too much of the great State of Illinois when he urged there be provided for the moral teacher and his pupils a distinct, separate and decently furnished work-shop, a chapel, namely, dedicated to the service of religion and nothing else.

Bishop Muldoon, of course, had no intention of leading the State into the dreaded ways of sectarianism, he did not expect the State to compromise its liberty by directly teaching or directly favoring the teaching of religion; he pleaded merely that it show the same broad spirit of generous helpfulness towards those who represent the highest in the spiritual world, as it shows to those who care for the material and temporal interests of the unfortunates who find a home in State institutions.

After all, the State is a Christian State, the inmates of its public refuges and asylums and houses of detention are Christians, and, as the Rockford prelate well affirmed, the duty of the former and the right of the latter make it imperative to render Christianity honorable in its surroundings. Will not He, whom Christians seek to honor, judge us inconsiderate of His cause when His ministers are compelled to use at times the entertainment parlor, the clinic room, the general assembly hall, or some other apartment which speaks to the worshippers, perhaps of punishment or pleasure or of distasteful work?

A pointed example comes to us from the distant Philippines. Camp Stotesberg, in the Pampanga district, is situated in an isolated spot far from any centre populous enough to boast a Christian chapel. The only place available for religious services at the post itself is the regimental amusement hall and there the chaplain of the forces quartered in the camp is compelled to say his Mass and to preside at the various other religious functions he may be called upon to perform. Surely a great nation such as ours ought to be as considerate of the moral and religious welfare of the soldiers who uphold its prestige in those far away islands, as it is of the material comfort and needs of its defenders. And surely it will not be denied that a proper feature of that considerateness is a decent regard for the sacredness of the place in which these representatives of her greatness may gather to pay their duty's tribute of reverence and adoration to the great God of Nations. Bishop Muldoon's plea is a very timely one, and it is one which applies to the National Government as well as to the heads of our individual States. May it avail with those who rule us!

Cardinal O'Connell and the Philippines

The eloquent appeal made by his Eminence Cardinal O'Connell, at the Boston Missionary Congress, in behalf of the Filipino Catholics, should not pass unheeded. As he pointed out, American Protestants are pouring men and money into the Islands without stint, for the purpose of robbing the natives of their faith. Is the magnificent work, he asks, which was accomplished by the old Spanish missionaries in bringing those millions from savagery into the light of civilization and Christianity to be utterly lost by our supineness? Are we willing to face the fact which must ever redound to our confusion and disgrace, that if these Catholics are lost to the Church we and not they are responsible.

"If there be any large defection from the Church in the Philippines, if any considerable element of the rising generation learn through sectarian schools to despise the creed of their fathers, a just posterity will say that it was not so much that they abandoned the Church, as that the Catholics in the United States abandoned them."

This solemn admonition should be heeded immediately and effective measures should be taken without delay to stop the wholesale proselytism that is carried on in the Philippine Islands, whose people are overwhelmingly Catholic.

Dividing the Spoils

A strong element in the Episcopalian Convention, which was in session in New York, on October 23, proclaimed its belief in the unchangeableness of dogma by refusing to join in the favorite Protestant scheme of parcelling out missionary territory among the various sects, irrespective of belief.

The Rev. D. B. Talbot Rogers denounced the proposal as "contrary to the spirit of this Church. We are prostituting the Holy Faith," he added, "in thus saying that there may be one field where we may not go to teach and make converts for the Church." He was followed by Dr. Manning, who saw great danger in the proviso, for "it denied our right and position as an Apostolic Church."

On the other hand, a proposition was made to throw out St. Swithin from the Church Calendar, because he is not known, and to substitute St. Willibrord, who is better known. For the same reason, and not for his sanctity, St. Patrick was also proposed as a candidate for a niche in Episcopalian churches, as were George Washington and Samuel Seabury.

The whole press is amused at the generosity of these good men on the Heights. They would be very accommodating popes.

Home Rule and Tobacco

Ulster, or at least the northeastern portion of it comprized by Antrim, Derry and Down, is the chief argument against Home Rule, partly because it is strong on one religion and against another, and partly on the claim that, though small territorially, it is predominant financially and industrially and pays the major portion of Irish taxation. The fact that the only instances of religious intolerance come from districts where Orangeism is prevalent has put the religious plea out of court, but the financial argument has more semblance of strength. The following statement in the London Express has been widely quoted: "Belfast alone pays one-half of all Irish taxation, does 70 per cent. of all Irish export trade, and has one-half of all shipping trade from Ireland. The customs duties paid in Ireland in 1911-12 was: Ulster, £2,273,000, the rest of Ireland £914,000." Ergo, Belfast is as important as the rest of Ireland, and Ulster more than twice as important as the other three provinces.

The shipping figures, even if accurate, are of no value for the purpose. Similar calculations would prove Galveston, whose volume of exports and imports exceeds that of any port in the Union except New York, a more important city than Philadelphia, Boston or New Orleans, and yet it has but 50,000 people. But the figures for the custom duties are: Belfast, £2,047,435; all Ireland, £6,461,938, showing that 31 per cent. of all dutiable imports is paid at Belfast. This is much less than one-half, but Belfast does not pay it. Of all its dutiable imports, valued at £29,700,000, tea amounts to £10,497,000, and tobacco to £13,591,000, or five-sixths of the whole. Now the duty on tea, which is valued at eight pence a pound, is five pence, and the duty on tobacco, which is valued at nine pence, is three shillings and eight pence, or forty-four pence, that is, nearly 500 per cent. The result is that the revenue is enormous, and as this is collected at Belfast, that city gets the credit of it, whereas it merely distributes the article through the country to the consumers, who really pay the duties on it.

The manufacture of imported tobacco has made other cities famous. "Wild Woodbines" has brought the collected revenue of Bristol, a smaller city than Belfast, to £5,372,000, more than double that of the Ulster port, and just double the custom duties of all Scotland; and "Players' Navy Cut" has put Nottingham, a city of 260,000, almost on a level with Belfast; but these cities have not claimed thereby industrial or political predominance. In fact, the figures show that the trade of Ulster is somewhat less in proportion to its population than the rest of Ireland and the rateable property considerably less. Were Gallaher's great tobacco manufactory removed, or were its tobacco unsmoked, Belfast's taxable capacity, artificially swollen by the enormously high duties on tobacco, would be immediately reduced to normal. In other words, the argument of what Unionists call "Ulster" for special treatment, is based mainly on the heavy tax the English Government puts on tobacco. Should the Liberals make tobacco free, the Ulster position would be reduced to what it really is, a question of ascendancy, and Ireland would be free to resume a profitable industry.

More Social Courses

We have already called attention to the Loyola University Lectures on Social Philanthropy for social workers at Chicago. A similar course is conducted at Boston College by the Young Men's Catholic Association, under the special patronage of his Eminence Cardinal O'Connell, and the registration is expected to reach the one thousand mark. A regular school for Social Service workers, it is hoped, will be opened during the following year at the College, similar to the institutions at present conducted by Harvard and by Simmons College. The lecturers engaged for the course are almost all men personally active in the direction of public or private charities, probate courts, schools for the defective, State minor wards and similar institutions. The lectures are given in connection with the Boston College Evening Classes, in which more than twelve hundred pupils have been enrolled for the present year.

At New York likewise the School of Social Studies, under the auspices of the Laymen's League of Retreats, has auspiciously begun its third year with the enrollment of a hundred new students. Five distinct courses are promised. The formal lectures, followed by discussions, are given Monday evenings. The subjects treated by the lecturers, and kindred topics, are then taken up again in short talks by the students of the course on Wednesday evenings. Efficient public speakers upon the important issues of the day are thus to be trained, to offset the attacks of Socialism and to promote the cause of an intelligent Christian reform.

The social leaven is clearly at work within the Church. If we add to what has here been said, the pioneer efforts of the Central Verein, which have never abated, and the many other social courses, study classes and organizations which are everywhere developing among the Catholics of the United States, we have every reason to look forward hopefully to the future. The social teaching of the Catholic Church will not go unheeded.

The "Candid History" and "The Nation"

The New York Churchman, an Episcopalian review, said of Mr. Joseph McCabe's "Candid History of the Jesuits": "He approaches his subject hopelessly prejudiced, and his book is an attack rather than a history." The Boston Evening Transcript, no lover of things Catholic, finds that the "candor" of the author is "extreme and prejudiced" and that his "contradictions and often careless statements affect the validity of the historian's attitude." The New York Nation, however, considers the latest book of that fallen priest "not only a piece of genuine historical work, therefore necessarily 'candid,' but also one of an excellent order, judged by criterions of research, judgment and narrative skill." In a word, the volume is "a thorough piece of work," as was to be expected, of course, from a man of Mr. McCabe's antecedents, which "inspire us with confidence in his frankness and impartiality." Then, to justify this extravagant praise, the Nation devotes four columns of its issue of October 23 to a summary, with approving comments, of the "Candid History." The reviewer places himself unreservedly under his author's guidance, quotes or repeats anew, without examination, the stock charges and time-worn calumnies against the Society of Jesus with which the world has long been familiar. So we hear again, for example, that:

"They (the Jesuits) respected no privileges, were eager to control everything, and, to procure leadership in the Catholic ranks, stopped at nothing. Not only did they assiduously cultivate the friendship of wealthy and influential men and women, but they engaged in commercial undertakings on a large scale. They allowed able merchants, after joining the Society, to conceal their membership and continue in business. In South America their native converts, to the number of three hundred thousand, were gathered in well-ordered villages, and led out to labor in the fields or fight in the armies of the Society. These services the natives performed without other pay than that of lodging, clothing and food. The profits were gathered in by the Jesuits, and though the Fathers declared these to be inconsiderable or non-existent, the extreme solicitude with which they guarded their 'reductions,' as the villages were called, from all impartial investigation suggests the contrary," etc., etc.

Even the venerable spectre "the end justifies the means" solemnly stalks forth, while as choice tidbits of recondite information, the reader is told that the "Italian province" (whatever that is) numbers "more than a thousand members," that "the higher secular clergy are little less anxious than the Socialists and Free Masons to see" the Society "suppressed" again; and that "the Jesuits of Germany, England and the United States are a very different body from the Jesuits of Spain"—though whether worse or better we are not told—and that the "Society is hated by a very large proportion of the Catholic clergy and laity in every country."

We have no intention of answering here these absurd charges and manifest falsehoods. In our issue of June 28 and of July 19 we gave Mr. McCabe's "Candid History" all the space we thought the worthless book deserved. We now wish merely to express our amazement that a periodical of the Nation's literary excellence and high respectability should find room in its pages for an article worthy to appear only in a paper of the Menace's character. If those responsible for the appearance of the offensive and misleading review had but taken the trouble to peruse the admirable article on the Society of Jesus in the fourteenth volume of "The Catholic Encyclopedia," and there read, among other just observations, that "the enemies of the Church would never assail the Society at all, were it not that it is conspicuously popular with large classes of the Catholic community," we think the Nation would not have published, as it stands, that notice of Mr. McCabe's book. Whatever Catholic subscribers the Nation has, it apparently feels no great eagerness to keep, since that periodical has allowed an admirer of the "Candid History" and its author to fill four columns with mendacious attacks on an approved religious order of the Catholic Church. One word more: If the Nation's Catholic readers would mail to its editor, Mr. Paul Elmer More, Box 794, New York, a marked copy of this issue of AMERICA, together with a strong letter of protest, perhaps he would moderate in future the enthusiasm of his reviewers who admire to excess the authors of "candid" histories like Mr. McCabe's.

LITERATURE

History of the Discovery and Conquest of Costa Rica. By RICARDO FERNÁNDEZ GUARDIA. Translated by HARRY WESTON VAN DYKE. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Company. $3.00.

Like the splendid and scholarly introductions to the two monumental works: the "Jesuit Relations" and "The Philippine Islands," the preface of Mr. Van Dyke, though of course not so elaborate or extensive as the two referred to, ought to be perused and pondered by Americans and Englishmen all the world over. It will dissipate much of the misunderstanding and bigotry which is deep-seated in the Anglo-Saxon mind about Latin colonization, "whose most notable incidents are misunderstood and in most cases judged with prejudice and greatly distorted. Particularly is this true in English-speaking countries, where the fierce rivalry that for centuries existed between Spain and England, in politics, religion and commerce has left a deep impression. We North Americans get our conceptions of the conquering Spaniard from such works as Kingsley's 'Westward Ho!' and the tales of other English romancers, who glorify such arch-pirates as Drake, Raleigh, Hawkins, and picture the work of the Conquistadores as wholly one of blood, rapine and destruction, inspired by no purpose but the lust of gold. This is far from the truth."

Some of them, it is true, were monsters, but it is unfair to charge on all the misdeeds of a few. The translator tells us that he has read "hundreds of decrees issued by the Kings of Spain strictly forbidding, under pain of Our Royal displeasure, spoliation and inhumane treatment of the Indian. The moving impulse of the King was always the conversion of the Indian and his instruction in the Christian faith," and many examples are cited of Conquistadores whose lives were stainless and who were heroic in carrying out the royal orders. "In the two centuries of occupation," he says, "Spain settled and Christianized a world larger than Europe and built up a political structure far more admirably effective and enlightened than the early government maintained in India by the English. She created an empire capitated by the greatest cities in the world of their day. Mexico, Guatemala and Lima were each in their turn richer, more cultivated and greater commercially than any cities of their time in Europe."

The book is by a very distinguished writer, who has delved into the precious archives of Seville and was aided in his work by the present King of Spain, Don Alfonso XIII. Very valuable information is given of the character and condition of the aborigines, the accounts being taken from the writings of the first explorers, lay and clerical, showing that the Costa Ricans were very much superior to our North American Indians.

Columbus explored the coast in 1502, but kept the secret of its exact position on the map. The evidence of gold which he had seen among the natives led him to believe that he had reached the Aurea Chersonesus of the ancients. Balboa and Ponce de León appear shortly afterwards on the scene, and the story is brought up to the time when Spain lost its hold on the colony. Perhaps the defect of the book is that it deals with too many details, so that, although it is invaluable as a historical work for future reference, one is frequently bewildered by the accounts of expeditions against the Indians, the stories of domestic quarrels among the Spaniards themselves, the appointments of officials, etc., without at the same time receiving a clear idea of the actual results of the Spanish occupation on the country at large. Perhaps if the author had not adhered so closely to the text of the original documents, but told the story in his own words, the interest excited in the account would have been greater. Now that the Canal is bringing Central America in such prominence, books of this character will be of great value.

The Silence of Sebastian. By ANNA T. SADLER, Notre Dame, Indiana: The Ave Maria. $1.25.

Sebastian Wilmot, a prosperous young merchant of New York, unexpectedly learns of an early secret marriage of his dead father. This knowledge makes it impossible for the hero and his sister Margie to wed with honor their sweethearts. Until it is proved, as of course it is eventually, that old Mr. Wilmot's first wife died before he took another, Sebastian has enough trials and tribulations to make an interesting story. The wooing of the fair Dorothy and the futile machinations of Mrs. Alfred, who has little of Sebastian's gift of silence, are well handled, and the atmosphere of the tale is thoroughly Catholic. The story's plot, the solution of which becomes obvious too early in the story, requires that Alfred and his wife should be exceptionally foolish, and that Sebastian, in spite of his Catholic education, should be imperfectly acquainted with the nature of sacramental Confession, but such people exist, no doubt, in this wonderfully varied world of ours.

Spiritual Gleanings for Marian Sodalists. By MADAME CECILIA. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $1.00.

The author well describes this volume as a lineal successor of "Short Spiritual Readings" and "More Short Spiritual Readings for Mary's Children." Twenty chapters bear upon virtues taught in the Sermon on the Mount, and the remaining eighteen are on miscellaneous subjects. Catholic working girls should find the book particularly helpful, for Madame Cecilia has a good knowledge of their needs and difficulties. Her numerous texts, anecdotes and illustrations are deftly applied to practical life, and the spirit of the book is cheerful and heartening. For instance, those who lack "Courage to Begin Again" are given this advice:

"1. Do not be astonished—you are not surprised to see the sun rise daily). 2. Do not get angry with yourself. Be sorry for having grieved God. 3. Make your act of contrition at once—calmly and lovingly. 4. Think no more of your fault until your next confession. 5. Make some act of generosity as a token of your sorrow. 6. Thank God that you did not fall more deeply into sin. 7. Never remain in a sad, sulky mood, as this prepares the way for more grievous falls."

Pluie de Roses III, Carmel de Lisieux (Calvados), Paris: Libr. St. Paul.

Those who have been following the cause of "the Little Flower" will be glad to learn that another long list of favors, spiritual and temporal, has been granted at the intercession of Soeur Thérèse of Lisieux. Judging from results, one would say that her intercession at the throne of God is becoming more and more powerful. She has kept her promise supremely well. She said while she lived that she would make the roses fall in showers, and by the roses she meant God's beautiful gifts to man. Then she died in an ecstasy of love. Slowly at first and singly she gathered the flowers, and with God's gracious permission cast them to earth; later she did so more frequently and with increasing abundance. On the eleventh of December, of the year nineteen hundred and eleven, she renewed her promise—she had been dead more than ten years—but foretold still greater generosity: the roses were to fall no longer in showers, but in torrents. In life it had been her desire to spend her Heaven doing good upon earth. After her death God humored His little child, He granted her all that she asked. Her desire, like other desires, has grown with indulgence; her wish to do good on earth has become almost a passion; it would seem to know no bounds. And this may be judged from the fact that the shower has become a downpour: the roses have got almost beyond the counting.

The present volume, which will soon appear in an English form, contains a selection made from very many letters which report cures and other temporal and spiritual favors granted through the invocation of Sister Teresa between the first days of February, 1912, and the last days of December of the same year. There is no claim made for the letters beyond their face value. To some are attached medical certificates, to others attestations of witnesses, some have no proof of the facts alleged beyond the signature of the beneficiaries. The cures cover a very large number of the diseases known to the medical profession. Mothers will be glad to read that the health of little children seems to be an object of special solicitude. "Pluie de Roses," as well as all other literature connected with "the Little Flower," may be obtained from the Carmelites of Oak Lane, Philadelphia.

J. H. F.

Kirchliches Handbuch. Herausgegeben von H. A. KROSE, S.J. Vierter Band: 1912-1913. St. Louis: B. Herder. $1.65.

An excellent handbook of the Church in Germany is offered to all students of ecclesiastical questions in this biennial publication. After picturing the actual organization of the Church in general, with its existing curia, hierarchy, orders and diplomatic relations, the volume presents a detailed inventory of all that can be of ecclesiastical interest in Germany itself. First is given a synopsis of all the important papal documents, followed by the civil legislation and court decisions touching upon ecclesiastical matters. The general position of the Church in Germany is then indicated, and a wealth of statistics regarding schools, missions and organizations of every kind is gathered together by the various editors. All, in brief, that is needed to form an accurate conception of the Church's activities and position in Germany is carefully collated here for handy reference.

The Catholic Church the True Church of the Bible. By Very Rev. C. J. O'CONNELL. St. Louis. B. Herder. $1.25.

Priests, Sisters and laymen who have occasion to deal with inquiring Protestants find very useful books which show "Bible Christians" how singularly Scriptural after all the tenets of Catholicism are. Such a work has here been prepared by Dean O'Connell of Bardstown, Kentucky. After showing that the Church has always been the only effective defender and consistent preserver of the Sacred Scriptures, the author proceeds to explain the position these hold in the Catholic system, and then shows in some two dozen chapters what a strong basis the Church's main dogmas have in Holy Writ. The Primacy, Purgatory, the Sacraments, the Veneration of the Blessed Virgin, etc., are proved from the Bible, more conclusively, of course, in some instances than in others. Groping Protestants, who cannot at first be induced to accept the Catholic Church as the divinely appointed and infallible guide of mankind, will find the book helpful, and imperfectly instructed Catholics can read it with profit.

Eucharist and Penance in the First Six Centuries of the Church. By GERHARD RAUSCHEN. Ph.D., S.T.D. Translated from the second German edition. St. Louis: B. Herder. $1.25 net.

This is an historical study of the subjects mentioned in the title. The author has great confidence in himself, approving or condemning ex cathedra the opinions of his opponents. But as these, no doubt, treat him in the same way, we must pass over his breaches of the amenities, as merely the custom of the historical school. We may say the same of his appeal to Tertullian's "Nihil veritas erubescit nisi solummodo abscondi" and to Leo XIII making that maxim his own in his letter on Historical Studies. The writers of his school have a way of regarding their views as absolutely true, and of using the authority of the great Pontiff to impose them. We think there is room for distinction.

The reading of such works as this always leaves us more convinced than ever that we know very little indeed of the life and practice of the early Church, and that, consequently, we are not in a position to reach the exact meaning of the texts from the Fathers disputed over so furiously by the historical school, by mere critical methods. These must have been clear enough to those to whom they were addressed. If critics could put themselves in the position of such, they would understand them too. But they cannot, and there is little profit in trying to determine their meaning according to one's own ideas. Hence we dissent absolutely from the maxim quoted by the author from another, that dogmatic theology must bow to historical facts. If the facts be really facts we deny the supposition that there can be any discord between the two that will call for bowing. This is not the same as to say that a dogmatic theologian may not have to modify an opinion in view of established facts. A theological opinion and dogmatic theology are not quite the same thing. But if the facts are merely the historical theologian's way of interpreting texts, then we hold that he has to guide himself by dogmatic theology if he wishes to avoid grave errors, instead of calling upon it to submit to his dictation.

Nevertheless, for those who enjoy the disputes of critics, this book will prove interesting. Those who give dogmatic theology its due place will find it useful. We do not agree with the author in everything; but we must pay him this tribute, that he is to be numbered among the more conservative of the historical school, and not among the radicals. We may add one remark. An interpretation of St. Augustine that involves him in perpetual self-contradiction can hardly be said to have really grasped his thought.

H. W.

Mr. Cosmo Hamilton is the author of "A Plea for the Younger Generation," which the author explains as "an intimate talk on the vital question of telling sex-truths to boys and girls from a human and utterly unscientific point of view." We have not seen the brochure, which is published at 2s. 6d. by Chutto & Windus, of London, but the following comment on this "terse and earnest appeal" in the Catholic Times of London prompts the belief that it would be profitable reading for those who look to lessons in sex-hygiene as a panacea for widespread immorality. Mr. Hamilton "pours fine scorn on the Eugenists of England and the societies of 'Sanitary and Moral Prophylaxis' in the States, and begs the faddists to 'become old-fashioned enough to permit their charges to have the benefit of that divine inspiration which made it possible for their forefathers to build up this great country. . . . Then he cries: 'Put God back into your schools, I beseech you, you scientists and teachers and professors, and when you teach boys and girls the facts you hide behind the high-sounding names Sex-Hygiene and Moral Prophylaxis, begin with the story of the Christ Baby and end with the description of the weeping Mother at the foot of the Cross. Don't teach sex-hygiene by drawing analogies between human nature and that of the animals, and thus send boys and girls loose upon the world to imitate the animals if they choose.' But it is to parents especially he addresses himself, urging upon them the necessity and the duty of instructing their own children in their own way, warning them betimes of the dangers in their path, and holding up before them a high ideal of purity and of cleanliness. Mr. Hamilton knows nothing, of course, of the efficacy of the Sacraments, but we are with him all the way as far as he goes. Religion and home—these are the only influences capable of saving the rising generation from the widespread moral and physical degeneration which he and all good men deplore."

The reviewer had been reading in the magazines and papers so many enthusiastic tributes to John Masfield's poetry, that when "Salt Water Ballads" came (Macmillan, $1.00), the book was opened with considerable curiosity. The volume is a republished collection of the metrical effusions of the author's boyhood and youth and is dedicated, among others, to

"The sailor, the stoker of steamers, the man with the clout,

The chantyman bent at the halliards putting a tune to the shout,

The drowsy man at the wheel and the tired lookout."

As such humble readers cannot be very critical, they will doubtless enjoy the all too faithful descriptions the author gives of Jack Tar's habits, troubles and aspirations, afloat and ashore, but the predominance in these "Ballads" of coarse and brutal lines over those of power and beauty is altogether too marked for the taste of a mere "liter'y" landsman.

"J. M. Sailer" is another addition to the Leaders of the People series of the Volksverein. Dr. Wilhelm Kosch presents in outline a picture of the man who exercised so extraordinary an influence upon his time as orator, educator and writer. Most remarkable was the personal power he possessed over men who themselves were to play an important part in the history of Catholic Germany. The book will be of special value to Catholic educators. Price, 60 pf.

Benziger's "Marien Kalender" has again appeared, with its popular stories and accounts of current events and the usual abundance of pictures. (Price, twenty cents.) The same firm publishes likewise the "Einsiedler Kalender" (fifteen cents) and the corresponding French, Italian and Spanish editions of this annual (each twenty cents). While these four calendars are similar in plan, they differ almost entirely in their literary matter and even in their illustrations. Each is adapted to the nationality for which it is written. Finally there is Benziger's "Catholic Home Annual" (twenty-five cents), whose characteristics are sufficiently familiar to our readers.

"The Education of Catholic Girls," that excellent pedagogical work by mother Janet Erskine Stuart, Superior General of the Religious of the Sacred Heart, has been translated into Italian. "L'Educazione delle Gioviette Cattoliche" is the book's new title, and for its frontispiece there is a fac-simile of a letter of commendation from the Holy Father. The work, which was highly praised in our issue of September 30, 1911, will now be widely read, we hope, in Italy. F. Pustet is the publisher.

"The Spare Room" is a light story about a newly-wedded couple who go to Capri for their honeymoon, rent there a little villa that has but one "spare room" and then, just out of politeness, invite half a dozen friends or relatives to look in on them. But all the invitations are promptly accepted, the guests arrive simultaneously, and the trouble begins. There are some cleverly written letters in the book, its situations are funny enough and the dialogue is bright, but scant respect for "the cloth" is shown in the author's portrait of Mr. Pott's, the vicar. Houghton, Mifflin Co. $1.00.

Father Joseph J. Baiert has out a revised edition of his "Holy Sacrifice of the Mass Explained in the Form of Questions and Answers." The little book should give, both to school children and their elders, a good grasp of the significance of the prayers and ceremonies used in the Mass. It also aims to teach the intelligent use of the missal—an excellent object. Published by the author, St. Bernard's Seminary, Rochester, N. Y. 50 cents. —From the Sunday Visitor Press, Huntington, Ind., comes the Rev. John F. Noll's "Father Smith Instructs Jackson," a closely printed book of 128 pages which is sold at "the ridiculously low price of $7.00 per 100 copies." Mr. Jackson, a light-seeker, is taken through the entire catechism by a priest, but finds out all by himself many consoling truths about the Church. Good for convert classes. Ten cents a copy.—The Catholic Advance of Wichita, Kansas, has made a pamphlet ($2.00 a hundred) of Archbishop Ireland's reasons "Why Men Should Go to Church." His Grace proves admirably that "Godliness is profitable to all things, having promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come."

It was, of course, to be expected that some enterprising publisher would prepare before long a volume of "Little Hours" from the new breviary. F. Pustet is first in the field with a "Diurnale Parvum sive Epitome ex Horis Diurnis Breviarii Romani a SS. D. N. Pio PP. X Reformati." It is not so complete as the old "Horæ" was, for it cannot be used on the Sundays and Ferias of Advent and of the period between Septuagesima and Easter, or on the September Ember Days or on Vigils. But for all other days of the Church's year the priest who has finished Matins will find everything else compactly arranged in this little volume, and the prayers and commemorations most frequently used are very conveniently placed at the beginning of the book. As this "Diurnale" is only half an inch thick, it would seem that the "Little Hours" of those omitted days could easily have been added without increasing much the size of the book. $1.25.

We are credibly informed by Mr. Preuss' Fortnightly Review that "a Catholic editor who started about twenty years ago with only fifty-five cents is now worth $10,000." But to keep young college graduates who read the foregoing from rushing, in consequence, pell mell into Catholic journalism, the writer hastens to explain that that editor's "accumulation of wealth is owing to his frugality, good habits, strict attention to business, and the fact that an uncle died and left him $9,999." So it would seem that the stored up wealth he had acquired purely and simply as an editor came, at the end of twenty years, to the modest sum of forty-five cents. Not minus forty-five cents, be it observed, but plus. O fortunate senex! For surely there is not a single Catholic editor in this broad land who would not begin with a grateful, joyous heart his twenty-first year at the desk, if, with no outstanding debts, he could then hear merrily jingling in his pocket forty-five cents clear gain.

The "zoological dances" now so lamentably common are considered by the editor of the Ladies' Home Journal "absolutely inexcusable of introduction into a company having any regard for the right relation of things. But women," he well observes, "in their denunciation of these modern dances, must not forget that they are very largely at fault for the popularity of the dances. It takes two persons to dance, and the man is always the seeker. Men have no desire to dance these vulgar dances by themselves; and if the woman absolutely refused to be the partner of any man who sought her in one of these dances they would quickly go into that oblivion where they should be."

Of course. Women, and among them, unhappily, numerous Catholics, are chiefly responsible for the vogue these dances have, just as it is women, for the most part, who are said to throng the theatres where shameless plays are produced. If these women would only be content to rule the world through the strong influence for good they can exercise over their husbands, brothers, sons and admirers, how simple would be the solution of our so-called "problems!"

To show the absurdity of pronouncing Latin like English Dr. Robert Bridges in his recent "Tract on the present State of English Pronunciation" tells this story about the Cowley Fathers. A young high-bred novice had fled from the luxuries of the world and was spending his first night on the straw mattress in his allotted cell. Being awaked at cockcrow by a mild voice crying Dominus tecum, he replied, "Thank you, thank you! will you kindly set it down outside." It would seem that in England a "bowl of tea" at cockcrow is not an anachronism.

"The Saints" is the sub-title of the Third Series of "Short Sermons" that the Rev. E. P. Hickey, O.S.B., has written and that Benziger Bros. publish ($1.25). The fifty-two discourses the volume contains are offered by the author to priests who may wish to refresh their memory of "Saints whom they have known and loved for years" and to "inmates of convents and the devout laity" as a book of spiritual reading. A good sketch of the life of each Saint is given and his or her characteristic virtue is held up for imitation.

That the arm of the Lord is not shortened, and that His wonders are worked in the present as in the past, is the argument of the volume "Pater Paul von Moll, Ein Wundertäter des XIX Jahrhunderts." Countless incidents are gathered together from the life of this Benedictine abbot, born at Moll, in the province of Antwerp, January 15, 1824, testifying to a life in which the miraculous, if we may be permitted to use that term, was almost the ordinary event. He went about, like his divine Lord, doing good to others, and the means by which his marvelous cures were wrought and wonderful temporal as well as spiritual benefits conferred was usually the application, in some way or other, of a medal of Saint Benedict. If a few of the stories may strike the reader as somewhat curious, the general impression will be one of reverence. The work was originally written in the Flemish, then translated into French, and now into German. It may be ordered directly from the translator and editor of the German version, Camille Delaux, New Milton, W. Va., or from Louis Stenger, Bolchen i. Lothringen. Price, 50 cents.

THE DRAMA

Shakespeare and Canon Hannay

Mr. Benson's refusal to play in New York has of course provoked some editorial comments, some wrathful, others regretful, others even pouting, and some others again protesting that in any case Benson counted for very little in his own country; for, in London, not a single Shakespearian play was produced last season, and things were only a little better in the provincial towns. It is not the first time, however, that a prophet is without honor in his own country. But the fault is not with the prophet; the country must take the reproach. In any case he is sure to be honored elsewhere. Hence it is not surprising that a wave of enthusiasm for the great dramatist is sweeping over Germany. In Berlin, last year, eight theatres had twenty-five Shakespearian plays, and sometimes as many as five or six houses were offering them simultaneously and successfully on successive evenings, while in the country at large sixty-six different companies were playing twenty-five different dramas of Shakespeare, and there were 1,104 performances of "The Merchant of Venice" alone. It might be suggested that as England and America have imported much bad stuff called philosophy from Germany, it is in order now to repair some of the evil by at least learning to be decent in dramatic appreciation.

We are even doing worse than merely ignoring Shakespeare. We are ridiculing him. Thus the perpetually offensive Bernard Shaw expresses himself as dissatisfied with the infatuation of Antony for Cleopatra, and substitutes a ridiculous Cæsar in his place. The purpose of the play, we are informed, is to prove that Circe, the enchantress, does not change heroes into swine but the reverse. Of course this is abnormally wrong, for though love may make a hero of a man, the carnalism symbolized by Circe will never effect such a transformation, and Shaw is very well aware of it.

In one of the acts of this travesty Cæsar appears at a lighthouse while Cleopatra is under guard in Alexandria. To escape to her hero she wraps herself in a rug and has herself conveyed in a boat to the lighthouse. During the conversation news arrives, possibly by wireless, of the outbreak of a war. Cæsar leaps into the sea, and Cleopatra is flung after him, whereupon he carries her on his back to shore. The grossness of it all reminds one of the Scriptural animals leaping into the sea when the evil spirit obsessed them.

That Shaw should conceive such a monstrosity is in the natural order of things, but that Sir Forbes-Robertson should lend himself to reproduce it on the stage is discouraging. Perhaps that was the price he had to pay for being tolerated in decent drama, and it may be that Benson feared a similar penalty, and hence kept away from the metropolis.

It is all the more to be regretted because the critics have been unstinted in their praise of Forbes-Robertson as a Shakespearian actor. One declared him to be "the most exquisitely sensitive and satisfying Hamlet of modern times." "His departure is to be regretted," we are told, "because since the death of the greatest of our own Hamlets—Edwin Booth—the genius capable of interpreting the poet's creations has not yet appeared among American actors, nor is there any probability that he will appear." Brought up in the atmosphere of grossness and vulgarity that envelops the American stage, how can any of the actors of the present day hope to achieve greatness?

From present appearances not even the Church is going to lift us out of our despair, even though the press announces that no less a personage than "the Rev. James Hannay, Canon of St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin, whose 'General John Regan' was one of the hits of the last London theatrical season, has come to America to superintend rehearsals of his play, which the Lieblers are to produce at the Hudson on November 10. Canon Hannay said that he believed he was the only Anglican clergyman who is also a playwright."

In addition, he said he is a Nationalist and a believer in Home Rule. However, he had his doubts as to whether the present bill would become a law.

"My play deals with the upper and middle class Irish life, rather than the life of the peasantry, which differentiates it from the work of the dramatists with the National Irish Theatre," said Canon Hannay. "I am, however, deeply in sympathy with the Irish Theatre."

It is, of course, not news to some that St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin, in spite of its name, is not a Catholic church, and that the Canon is not a Catholic priest but a Protestant parson, with hopes but doubts about Home Rule, and in avowed sympathy with the unsavory Irish Theatre of Yeats and Synge notoriety, which makes us shudder. Nor does the information given by our English correspondent, in his letter on "Catholicism and the London Stage" help our peace of soul. For he writes that "Charles Hawtrey has withdrawn from the Apollo 'General John Regan,' the work of an Irish Protestant clergyman, Canon Hannay, who has written successful novels under his nom de guerre of 'George A. Birmingham.' 'General Regan' contains one of the worst travesties of a Catholic priest that has ever disgraced the prejudiced pen of a Protestant partisan."

If this judgment be correct, we trust that the Canon's advisers may induce him to modify his text. American audiences may not be as patient as those in Great Britain and Ireland. In any case it is a long cry from "Lear" and "Hamlet" and "Macbeth" to "General Regan," and from Shakespeare to Bernard Shaw and Canon Hannay.

EDUCATION

A Baptist Plea for Religious Training in Schools—Third Annual Report of Parish Schools of the Newark Diocese

Once upon a time, if one may use the consecrated formula proper rather to a story teller, the Catholic publicist was practically the sole upholder of religious training, of direct and immediate religious instruction in the school. He made no exception in his plea for this; in the kindergarten, in the elementary and grade school, in the high school and college and university, the education which forms character and produces sound principles of life was alike to be insisted upon; the dominant aim of the teacher throughout the years devoted to the training of the child and youth and man was to be ever the same—to send his pupils to the work of life girded for that work by faith in God, faith in men, and faith in the possibility of making this world over into Christ's kingdom. For years the protest of the Catholic publicist was, however, almost the voice of one crying in the wilderness. The inordinate fear of "sectarianism," of Church domination in the State, ruled the vast body of denominational Christians among us, and they seemed content to hand over the holy trust of the formation of their little ones to a system whose educational processes were built upon the superstition of the age, an excessive and unfounded faith in the power of mere book learning to educate the future citizens of the land.

Happily that day is fast passing. Last week AMERICA was glad to note the splendid ideal that marked the utterances of the chief speakers in the session of the Convention, here in New York, of the Protestant Episcopal body devoted to education, and it gave cordial assent to the claim put forward by George Wharton Pepper, lay delegate from Philadelphia, "that to maintain its high place this nation must give to its youth that sort of training which will fit it for the places which it must fill in the days to come, and it must of necessity be trained along the lines of Christianity, the basis of all true life."

This week AMERICA is able to quote another testimony to the passing of the day of the foolish fear of "sectarianism" in education. From far off Sioux Falls, in South Dakota, the testimony comes; and one is almost startled to recognize the strength of the plea advanced by a Baptist gathering in the far western city for thorough religious training in our schools. The Baptists, it need not be remarked, have been for years among the most ardent advocates of the common schools and of their rigid exclusion of religious instruction from study courses.

On October 10, in the City Temple, of Sioux Falls, the Baptist Church of South Dakota held the educational session of its annual convention. The report of the Church's activity in education was prepared and read by Dr. E. F. Jorden, President of Sioux Falls College, an institution supported by the Baptists of that Commonwealth. The document, which press reports inform us was received with enthusiasm, is a singularly able defence of the need of religious training in every aspect of the formative process of the child. Dr. Jorden introduced his paper by assuring his hearers that "there never was a time when it more behooved men to view things in the large, to weigh facts carefully, and to speak with great circumspection." Like Mr. Pepper in the Protestant Episcopal Convention, he is no believer in the theory that religious education is one department of education at large and more or less supplementary to secular education. He believes, rather, "that there is just education, and that if you neglect the religious side of it, you not only dwarf religion but make a mess of the whole business." "The greatest need of this hour and of all future hours," wrote Dr. Jorden, "is Christian character. In a democracy there is imperative need of education, and the State does well to furnish it; but there is tenfold more need of character than of education." To illustrate what he means by character Dr. Jorden quotes Prof. Eucken, a German philosopher who is by no means an orthodox Christian, and yet who holds that the Christianity of the future, "while yielding to the legitimate demands of the age, and grappling sympathetically and fearlessly with its problems and entanglements, must stand above the time and make relentless war upon its superficial, petty and unspiritual tendencies, its empty, godless culture, its brutalizing comfort and ease, its unscrupulous and heartless civilization."

In the face of this relentless war, the Western Baptist representative continues, "one of the most dangerous facts in our democracy and one of the most disgraceful facts in our Christianity is the lack of adequate Christian training for our youth." Such training, he contends, is no longer secured in the home—the family altar is broken down; it is not secured in the Sunday school—children no longer go to Sunday school unless they want to; it is not received from the pulpit—few of our youth go to church to hear preaching; it is not imparted in high schools and state universities—from these the Bible is cast out, religious teaching is proscribed, teachers' hands are tied, and many influences which undermine character are creeping in. "While our country is well equipped with strictly educational facilities and is daily becoming better equipped, we face a crisis in character-training, and that too in the presence of an awakening social conscience, and before the rising tide of commercial, civil and political reform. And that training is taken from the habits and atmosphere of a school, not from the school textbooks." It were difficult for the most ardent Catholic to state the case for the need of religious training in stronger terms. Nor is Dr. Jorden a whit less emphatic in proclaiming his idea of the kind of Christian school that will satisfy the need he so graphically describes.

"A Christian school," he says, "is one in which every member of the faculty is a Christian, not merely a nominal Christian but a live Christian, a Christian whose soul is a flaming fire, whose touch upon young life is inspirational of the highest ideals, whose day is begun in prayer. No other kind of person has any place in the faculty of a Christian school.

"A Christian school is one whose atmosphere is all a tingle with a joyous, virile Christianity, a Christianity which appeals to young men and women, commands their respect, fascinates them with high conceptions of life, and sends them into society enamored of service to their fellows.

Such preparation for life does not come from text books. It comes from teachers who walk with God, who believe in the redeeming Christ, who have ventured their own lives in the service of the Master, and have dedicated their work to the reconstruction of society after the mind of God.

"Our Christian schools must be, not less Christian, but more Christian. They are in competition with other schools for students, and the tendency for years, especially in our larger Christian schools, has been to minimize Christianity—to minimize the requirements for Christianity in the faculty, to minimize Christian discipline and Christian standards of conduct among students, to minimize the distinctively Christian atmosphere of the institution, to minimize character requirements for graduation. On account of competition for students the tendency has been to make our Christian schools like other schools, except possibly that the majorities of board and faculty must be nominal Christians.

"Better to send a hundred men into the world's work thoroughly trained as Christians than a thousand, however well schooled, with simply secular ideals. The moment our Christian schools become like other schools, that moment they cease to have warrant for existence, that moment they fail to have just claim upon Christian money. Their warrant for existence and their claim for Christian money is that they are character builders, that they send youth forth to life's work with the vision of God, with faith in the conquering Christ, and aflame with zeal for the transformation of men and institutions into the kingdom of the Master."

Evidently Dr. Jorden is not in accord with the distinguished members of the governing bodies of the many one-time religious schools and colleges who, to gain a share of the Pittsburgh Iron Master's endowment fund, have "minimized" the Christian character of the institutions they direct until neither shred nor shadow of the old Christian influence remains.

One other note is sounded in this remarkable paper that rings in fine accord with a sentiment most Catholics cherish. "Attention has been called of late," says Dr. Jorden, "to the neglect of Christian students in State universities, and some have thought that by guild houses and student pastors the same ends could be accomplished that are achieved by Christian schools. I have nothing to say against these endeavors. I believe in them. But, as effective working institutions, I do not think they are in the same category with Christian schools at all. Our problem is not one of herding a few students to any particular church.

Ours is the task of kindling the souls of the young until they are ablaze with love and with zeal, and consecrated to the ends upon which God is at work among men—all backed up by the sweet memories of college days, by reverence for teachers who inspired them, and by the power of that dominant Christian spirit which characterized the student body which they loved."

Through the courtesy of Rev. John A. Dillon, Superintendent of Catholic Schools of Newark, N. J., AMERICA has received a copy of the Third Annual Report of the parish schools in that diocese. The document offers excellent evidence of the zeal and energy of the Reverend Superintendent and his co-workers of the teaching staff in the schools in extending and strengthening the diocesan school system. Father Dillon's own paper on the right idea in Christian teaching is a contribution to our literature on Catholic school methods which deserves wide circulution. He attacks boldly and well what he very justly terms the "unwarranted distinction widely accepted to-day between teaching and training." Rejecting the tendency to emphasize a theoretical teaching method to such an extent that, unconsciously, too little heed is given to principles of training, he would have teachers "realize that the most important aim of their work is not merely success in technical studies, but to form the pupil to habits that are honest, not dishonest; thorough, not slipshod; generous, not mean; refined, not vulgar—in a word, to form an enduring Christian character."

In a brief review of the work accomplished since the publication of the last annual report, Father Dillon shows the year just past to have been one of marked progress, not only in larger attendance, increase in the number of schools and school buildings, but also in the efficiency of the teaching and thoroughness of results obtained. There are now in the diocese 119 schools; at the beginning of the year there was an attendance of 53,754, the boys numbering 26,194 and the girls 27,560; the total registration at the end of the year was 53,530, made up of 26,057 boys and 27,473 girls; the total enrollment was 56,976; the average daily attendance was 49,981 and the number of teachers was 1,075.

SOCIOLOGY

A Catholic Work of Charity

Social action to-day is scientific. That is to say it is organized and administered according to notions too often hastily conceived, and quite untested, of some one who arrogates to himself or to herself the name of "an authority." In fact we are in some danger of being suffocated by the multitude of those who, if they do not usurp that name and its office, are granted it under a very cloudy title. The consequence is that a great deal of energy is wasted, not a few people make a very comfortable living out of the administration of charities, fads are taken up only to be dropped when they cease to interest, the public is harassed by all sorts of restrictions and threatened with others actually subversive of personal liberty. The "authorities," playing perhaps upon their assumed designation, take upon themselves real social authority, and presume to dictate to their fellow-citizens in a way that is subversive of all social order. The other day we received a circular signed by a lady we never heard of before, telling us that a certain Sunday had been set aside for a certain object and demanding that sermons be preached relative to the object in all churches. She did not tell who had set the Sunday aside, and so we judge that she had done so herself, taking into her hands the functions of ecclesiastical authority.

Public charity is a part of social action. As a matter of pure fact public charity is somewhat of a usurpation. It follows the decay of the religious spirit. When this flourished in every rank and class public charity as it exists to-day was unknown. One may say that in the present state of society it has become a necessity. This may be so; but it is not necessary that its self-constituted overseers should interfere with the works of those in whom the religious aspect survives. Much better would it be to foster this spirit everywhere that it may have its necessary outcome in works of charity. What it can accomplish we may see from an example of a social work utterly unscientific, working without noise, without display, yet working efficaciously because it is animated with the Spirit of God.

In 1827 a French woman, mother of five children, fell ill in Turin on her way from Milan to Lyons. Her husband ran to the nearest church for aid, where he fell into the hands of Canon Cottolengo. This good priest did everything for the afflicted family with Christian generosity, and then and there conceived the idea of founding a home for the distressed. He rented some rooms, in which he carried on the work, and four years later founded the "Little House of Divine Providence, under the auspices of St. Vincent de Paul." He called it the "Little House" to distinguish it from the Great House of God's Providence, the whole family of mankind. He added "of Divine Providence" to show that for its support and development he depended, not on organization in our modern sense, but on God's unfailing goodness. He put it under the patronage of St. Vincent de Paul, as the true, loving father of the poor. Over the gate he wrote: "Charitas Christi urget nos," that all its benefactors might know that supernatural charity should be their motive. It had no revenues, but was supported by the alms God sent from day to day. If it received a legacy there were always debts to be paid, for the tradesmen of Turin have never feared to give credit to a house that made God their debtor. The "Little House" exists to-day in a vast collection of buildings covering five acres, housing thirty-four communities to serve its inmates, who number about seven thousand souls. It includes sixteen different works. These include three large hospitals for every kind of disease, served by Vincentian Brothers and Sisters, and a staff of forty physicians, who give their services because the charity of Christ urges them; homes for deaf and dumb and blind, for orphans, and for abandoned and vagrant children, for deformed, epileptic and feeble-minded, a refuge for penitent women, cloistered religious, men and women, whose business is to pray for sinners, and a seminary for young men without the means to make their studies for the priesthood.

As we said, the establishment depends absolutely on God's providence. It receives no subsidy from the city or from the State. On the contrary, the present Government does not blush to tax it. On the flour alone it consumes it pays internal revenue amounting to nearly $4,000 a year. Had we the space we might enumerate case after case of the miraculous interposition of Divine Providence in its behalf, for though often in distress the "Little House" has never failed, but exists to-day a monument to God's goodness and to the supernatural wisdom of those who cast all their care on Him, who careth for us. We do not suppose that our modern social workers who work without God will learn a lesson from the Little House of Divine Providence of Turin. But we do think that Catholics might study it and make it the model of works of charity conceived in the true Christian spirit of simple faith and fervent prayer. H. W.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

In the Catholic Times of London, September 26, a letter written by A. Christich (B. A. London), imparts useful information on the relations existing between Rome and the Servian Government. The communication reads as follows:

With reference to your note in the issue of September 12 on Serbia and the Catholic Church, allow me as a Servian and a Catholic, and as one familiar with conditions in the country, to assure you that it is national susceptibility and not religious intolerance that has hitherto been the obstacle to the establishment of a Catholic bishopric in Belgrade. Some years ago a Catholic bishop was appointed to Belgrade in virtue of an agreement between the Holy See and an Austrian Primate. The titular on arriving in the Servian capital was received unofficially, but with every mark of friendliness, by the Servian Government, and was informed that his nomination could not be accepted, for under no circumstances could a Servian see be subject to Austrian jurisdiction. The Bishop himself, an ardent Slav patriot as well as a fervent Catholic, realized the position so well that he at once relinquished his claim and promised the Servian Prime Minister that he would do his utmost to bring about direct relations between Serbia and the Vatican. A step in this connection has been that the present Catholic parish priest in Belgrade is directly appointed by the Propaganda in Rome, but as he is at the same time chaplain to the Austrian Legation, though highly respected for himself, he is not looked on by Servians as an independent factor. Both the Metropolitan and several prelates of the Servian State Church, as well as notable laymen among our separated brethren, have told me that they are in no way opposed to the establishment of the Catholic Church in Servia provided that its ministers were allowed to be Servian in sentiment and Servian subjects. A near relative of my own some years ago very nearly succeeded in bringing about an understanding between the Vatican and the Servian Government, but was foiled at the last moment by the preponderance of Austrian influence. Two weeks ago the Servian Minister of Public Worship informed me that now that peace was established negotiations with Rome would be his first concern. In the light of the difficult past we must therefore suspend our judgment, putting always the cause of the Church in the first place, as apart from the political power of any Catholic empire.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

The following is the text of the letter which the Sacred Congregation of the Holy Office has sent to the bishops of the Catholic world regarding mixed marriages:

"This Supreme Congregation of the Holy Office is greatly interested to obtain sure information concerning the mixed marriages which have been celebrated or attempted during the last ten years. It entrusts therefore to the care and zeal of your Lordship the task of answering as completely and as quickly as possible, the following questions:

"1. How many Catholics, non-Catholics, and non-baptized persons were there in your diocese ten years ago, and how many are there to-day?

"2. About how many mixed marriages have been concluded or attempted in each of these ten years, with dispensation from the impediment of disparity of worship, with dispensation from mixed religion, without any dispensation, before a heretical minister, and before the civil authority?

"3. Have the prescribed guarantees been omitted or refused, and in how many cases?

"4. In the other cases what have been the results of these guarantees, especially those that all the children are to be brought up in the Catholic religion, and that the parties are not to go before a heretical minister either before or after marriage?

"5. Finally, what rites, especially since the promulgation of the decree 'Ne Temere,' what solemnities are employed in the celebration of these marriages? Are they celebrated in the church, announced by the ringing of bells, does the priest wear his sacerdotal insignia, is the organ played, is the ring blessed, is a marriage address delivered, etc., or not?

"To the answers please be good enough to add your opinion on the question. In your diocese are there special circumstances which render it advisable for the future to favor or to oppose mixed marriages."

It has been announced that Rev. John M. Harty, D.D., of St. Patrick's College, Maynooth, has been appointed by the Holy Father to the Archbishopric of Cashel, which was made vacant by the recent resignation of Most Reverend Archbishop Feenelly. Born in the diocese of Cashel forty-six years ago, and educated at St. Patrick's College, Thurles, at Maynooth, and at the Gregorian University, Rome, Dr. Harty became Professor of Dogmatic Theology in Maynooth in 1894, within a year after his ordination. He received the chair of Moral Theology in 1904, and of Canon Law in 1909, and meanwhile wrote much on a great variety of ecclesiastical subjects in the Irish Ecclesiastical Record, and in the Irish Theological Quarterly, of which he has been editor since its foundation in 1906. His appointment to the archiepiscopal see of his native diocese creates no surprise, as apart from his great attainments and distinguished character, he was held in the highest esteem by clergy and laity alike.

The appearance of two Catholic Indians in full costume lent a pleasing touch of color to the Boston Missionary Congress, and the address of Chief White Hawk in his native language, interpreted by Father Westropp, S.J., an active Indian missionary, brought home to the delegates the position and needs of our Catholic Indians, which were further expounded by Father Hughes of the Indian Bureau. Another incident brought the Indian Missions into prominence. Bishop O'Reilly of Baker City, while explaining the wants of his great diocese, told of an Indian Missionary of fifty years standing, who still exhorts them and hears their confessions in eight Indian dialects, though now 87 years of age. "He is here," he said, "though in his humility hiding away as usual," and he sent men through the hall to search for Father Cataldo, S.J., late Superior of the Rocky Mountain Mission. When the aged, though lithe and active figure appeared on the platform there was great applause, and all knelt as he said the Our Father in Indian.

OBITUARY

The Right Rev. William John Kenny, Bishop of St. Augustine, Fla., died on October 24, at Baltimore of diabetes. Bishop Kenny was born in Delhi, N. Y., on October 9, 1853, and was graduated from St. Bonaventure's College, at Allegany, N. Y. He was ordained in St. Augustine, Fla., on January 15, 1879, and was subsequently pastor of churches in Jacksonville and Palatka, Fla. On May 18, 1902, he was consecrated Bishop of St. Augustine, having served as vicar-general 1889-1901 and administrator, 1901-1902.

Reverend Edward J. Gleeson, S.J., died in St. Ignatius College, Chicago, October 22, after a lingering illness which for more than a year had incapacitated him. He was born in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, on December 7, 1851, and in his early years was a student in the St. Gall's Academy dear to many an old-timer of that city. He completed his college studies at St. Louis University, entering thence the Jesuit Novitiate at Florissant, Mo., on July 25, 1871. Father Gleeson's entire active life was given to college work, partly in an administrative capacity, but chiefly in the class room and in the lecture hall. He was a popular speaker and his style in the exposition of ethical and philosophical subjects was signally clear and attractive. He labored at different times in the Jesuit colleges in St. Louis, St. Mary's, Kansas, Detroit and Chicago, and was for a time President of the St. Louis University. In this capacity Father Gleeson had the distinguished honor of inaugurating the house of theology and philosophy which since the early '90's has been the central seminary of the Jesuit body in the country.

The death is announced, from typhoid fever, in Ceylon, of the Rev. Henry D'Arras, S.J., who was to have been preconized Bishop of Trincomalee, Ceylon, at the October Consistory. His death came as a great surprise, especially as many friends in Europe expected his return shortly for episcopal consecration. Henry D'Arras was the only son of Monsieur Lambert Louis D'Arras, a Private Chamberlain to His Holiness Pius IX. His mother was Louise, daughter of Sir Edmund Hungerford, second Baronet. Père D'Arras was at one time rector of the College of Notre Dame, Boulogne; for the last few years he had labored in Ceylon, and there was every hope that his services as bishop would have greatly benefited the flourishing Church in that island.

CHRONICLE

Policy Toward Latin America.—President Wilson, in an address at Mobile, Ala., indicated the course the Administration would follow in its dealings with the Latin-American Republics. He declared with emphasis that the United States would not wage a war of conquest, nor ever again seek to obtain an additional foot of territory. The President stated that through motives of "morality and not expediency," the United States desired to keep the Southern Republics to an "emancipation from the subordination which has been inevitable to foreign enterprise." At the same time he indicated that it was the purpose of the United States to play a dominant part in the future of the Latin-American Republics, not through any idea of "material interest," but through a love of the principle of constitutional liberty.

Powers Ready to Cooperate.—At the request of the United States, England, France and Germany have agreed to take no action in Mexico until they hear further from Washington, which will occur, it is understood, in a few days, when President Wilson will make formal announcement of the future policy of the United States. Thus European impatience over the course followed by the Washington Administration has been allayed for the time being. It is believed that President Wilson will have a difficult task offering a program short of intervention that will satisfy the other Governments, inasmuch as their official representatives in Mexico already have expressed forcibly their belief that intervention is not only desirable, but inevitable. At any rate the impression prevails that Europe has forced the hand of the United States and made it incumbent on President Wilson to announce some plan which offers fair promise of practical achievement. The sending of warships to Mexico by Germany and the attitude of Great Britain are regarded as having been contributory causes in the President's decision to ask the Powers to defer action in Mexico until they should hear from him. Germany has followed up the despatch of a cruiser to Vera Cruz by ordering a cruiser from the far East to the west coast of Mexico.—Rear Admiral Fletcher, commanding the American ships off Vera Cruz, reported to the Navy Department that General Felix Diaz, with José Bonales Sandoval and Cecilio Ocon, had been granted asylum aboard the battleship Louisiana, and asked for instructions. He received orders to put General Diaz and his companions on the first steamer leaving Vera Cruz for Cuba, or the United States, as they may prefer. The Army and Navy are reported ready for immediate action.

Express Companies Yield.—The new zone system of interstate express rates framed by the Interstate Commerce Commission will go into effect on December 1. The Commission received a communication from Walker D. Hines, representing the Adams, American, Southern, United, and Wells, Fargo Express Companies, in which he says: "The express companies have given the fullest consideration to the system of express rates framed and issued by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and, although they have grave apprehension as to the outcome, they have concluded to put that system in force, hoping to receive the cooperation of the Interstate Commerce Commissioners, the State Commissioners and the public." The Northern and Great Northern Express Companies also sent notice that they would obey the Commission's order.

Mexico.—The first returns of the balloting on October 26 indicated that not enough votes had been cast to comply with the constitutional requirements, and that "no election" would be declared. The more recent reports from Mexico tend to show, however, that the vote was much larger than had been supposed, and that Huerta and Blanquet are well in the lead. An announcement was made by the Mexican Minister for Foreign Affairs that if General Huerta should be shown to have received the most votes he would retire in favor of General Blanquet, his running mate, who would take the oath of office as Vice-President and immediately assume the functions of the Presidential office. President Huerta will probably take command of the army as soon as the result of the election is determined.

Canada.—The election in South Bruce, Ontario, adds to the blow given the Government in East Middlesex. In the latter constituency the Conservative majority was reduced by nearly one-half; in South Bruce the Conservative majority of 103 has been changed into Liberal majority of 125.—The Duke of Connaught has returned to complete his term.—The Newfoundland elections have given a decisive victory to the Government. The issue was alleged extravagance, especially in railway expenditure.—Mr. E. E. Prince, of the Department of Fisheries, is in Washington, trying to procure the execution of regulations already approved in theory, for the protection of the salmon fisheries in the Strait of Fuca and the Gulf of Georgia, between the State of Washington and British Columbia. The failure of a proper proportion of the fish to reach the Fraser River during the season just closed, "a fourth year big run," not only worked great injury to British Columbia packers, but also brought about a shortage of eggs for the hatcheries, most of which are in that province, the result of which will be apparent during the coming years.—Sir Richard McBride, attending the Premiers' conference in Ottawa, has spoken very clearly on two burning questions. He grows more and more insistent on the obligation of the Dominions to share in the military and naval burden of the Empire, and more and more determined that the natives of the Indian Empire, though subjects of the King, soldiers of the King, wearing the King's decorations for service in his wars, must not enter British Columbia, which is a white man's country. We suspect that in the last analysis the two views will turn out to be contradictory. If one bears the burdens of the Empire, he is necessarily a world-wide subject of the Empire, and has a right to live in any part of it.

Great Britain.—Arthur Newton, the attorney who was suspended for a year in punishment of his unprofessional conduct as attorney for the murderer, Crippen, has been convicted of swindling and sentenced to three years penal servitude. He appealed, but the result was a confirmation of the sentence, which the court would have liked to increase.—Some time ago a well-known priest, Canon Cafferata, was the object of atrocious calumnies circulated in anonymous letters. It took more than a year to discover the author, a certain Annie Tugwell, who had the audacity to charge the Canon's housekeeper with the crime and bring her twice before the courts. Mrs. Tugwell was convicted and went to prison for a year. Some extreme Protestants looked on her as a martyr. They have the satisfaction now of seeing her convicted again of the same crime, her victim this time being a lawyer, not a Catholic priest.—There are three elections pending. At Reading a successor to Sir Rufus Isaacs must be chosen; in Linlithgowshire a successor to Mr. Ure, and in the Keighley Division, Yorkshire, the new Solicitor-General has to seek reelection. They may be looked on as typical seats; and the Unionists have an excellent opportunity to test the strength of the Government in the country.—When Sir Rufus Isaacs was being sworn in, a barrister in his robes objected to the Lord Chancellor's panegyric on behalf of the profession and, and cried out: "speak for yourself, Lord Haldane." He was "hustled out of court" by the barristers in his neighborhood.—It is the custom when any great calamity befalls, for the Lord Mayor of London to open a subscription list for the sufferers at the Mansion House. One is now open for the relatives of the victims of the late colliery explosion in Wales; and it has drawn public attention to the fact that there have been, exclusive of it, 32 such colliery funds subscribed to since 1862, the total sum subscribed being £862,548. Of these funds several show large balances, and it is proposed to introduce a bill into Parliament to amalgamate these into a permanent fund to provide relief in such cases.

Ireland.—Mr. Churchill had explained that he meant by his Ulster proposal that the Government will consider any solution "compatible with the fundamental principle of an Irish Parliament and a Government responsible to it, and not destructive to the unity of Ireland," when Mr. Asquith finally settled the exclusion proposal, October 25. "Nothing is to be done," he said, "that may interfere with the setting up in Dublin of a subordinate Irish legislature with an executive responsible to it, or which may erect a permanent or insuperable barrier to Irish unity. That is the root principle of the Home Rule Bill, from which we will not depart." He welcomed a settlement by consent, but "a conference of party leaders without more or less an agreement as to a basis and a defined limit would be abortive and leave matters worse than it found them." Sir E. Carson's comments were mild, showing a conciliatory tendency, and it seems now that a Conference may be held on the basis of strengthening the finances of the Bill and increasing the representation of the three or four Protestant counties, and enlarging their local government powers. Meanwhile the Presbyterian Synod, following the example of the Protestant assemblies, has sent an appeal to the British non-conformists to save them from papistical destruction, and the Ulster Liberal Association, a Protestant body, issued a counter pronouncement, declaring that Protestants are safer in Ireland than elsewhere and Home Rule will be a blessing to all.—James Larkin, the fomenter of strikes and riots in Dublin, was sentenced to seven months' imprisonment for inciting to destruction of property, physical assaults, and seditious libels. Mrs. Rand, an American, and Mrs. Montefiore, a London Jewess, were tried for kidnapping Irish children and attempting to take them to England. It was proved that they and their agents had carried off several boys and girls under false pretences and without their parent's consent. Further trial was postponed for a month, and as their attempt has failed, and now an influential Jewish society has interested itself in the case, it is thought the Government will let the matter drop. The Dublin priests who foiled the efforts of those persons to deport Catholic children to English Socialist homes, and rescued fifty from their hands, were Fathers McNevin, Landers, Gaynor, Flavin, Fleming, and T. F. Ryan. The incident has had a marked influence in making possible the conciliatory settlement of the strike proposed by Archbishop Walsh. In an address delivered before the All-Ireland Industrial Conference at Limerick, Bishop O'Dwyer said it was pitiable that in a country of little capital and nascent industries, trade and commerce should be paralyzed by senseless strikes fomented from England, in the interest of its own trades unions and manufacturers.

Rome.—Professor Bent, who is carrying out excavations in the ruins on the Palatine Hill, has located the Imperial Palace of Nero and Caligula—Caius Cæsar—and also that of Domitian, of a slightly later period, the foundation of the imperial throne being uncovered. The excavators have come upon seven houses of the republican epoch, a complicated network of pipes and drains and several circular rooms cut in the tufa stone and lined with plaster to protect from dampness.—The death of Mgr. Montagnini is very much regretted at the Vatican and elsewhere. He was present at the coronation of King Edward, and had taken the place of Mgr. Lorenzelli in Paris, after the rupture of France with the Pope, but was expelled by Clemenceau, and after occupying a post in the office of the Papal Secretary of State, was made Apostolic Delegate to Colombia.—It is announced that as soon as the Right Rev. Abbot Gasquet, O.S.B., President of the Commission for the Revision of the Vulgate, returns from the United States, the seat of the Commission will be transferred from the International College of S. Anselmo on the Aventine Hill to a more central part of Rome, viz., the Abbey of S. Callisto, in Trastevere.—The Servian Chargé d'Affaires at the Quirinal, says that his Government intends to come to an agreement with the Holy See with regard to Catholic matters in the Servian dominions. A Servian Catholic has been appointed to draft a Concordat and to form a Commission which will be sent to Rome to submit the plan to the Pope. Whether this is devised for the good of Servian Catholics, or as an offset to Austria, is not yet ascertained.—The procedure of canonization and beatification, we are informed, is to be made more rigorous. One measure is that the title "venerable," not only does not imply any right to a cultus or to public panegyrics, but the term is not to be used until the publication of a decree pronouncing the heroic virtue or the martyrdom of the servant of God. Even that is not to be considered as permitting veneration, panegyrics or religious services, though the collect pro gratiarum actione may be added in the Mass. Stringent rules are also laid down with regard to the collection and examination of evidence. Thus the Ordinaries, under the penalty of nullity of the Acts, are to collect and examine documents against, as well as for, the canonization.—The Gregorian University has a new Rector in the person of Father Caterini, S.J., who replaces Father Mandato, S.J., the latter's health having given out.

France.—Although coeducation in communes of more than 500 inhabitants was forbidden by law as long ago as October 30, 1886, nevertheless such schools are very common on account of the apathy of those most concerned. Parents could easily put an end to them if they bestirred themselves. The people of Vitry have determined to do so. A coeducational school was organized two months ago; protests were made and it is to be abolished.—The agitation about the loss of the French protectorate in the Orient continues and appeals come from most unexpected sources to renew negotiations with the Holy See. Simultaneously attention is called to the slender hold it has on the Mediterranean and the growing power in that sea of Germany and Italy.—The defence of the "Lay School," the Government's euphemism for anti-Christian education, is to be maintained, although between 40,000 and 50,000 Catholic schools have been so far suppressed and heavy penalties inflicted on parents for withdrawing their children from such schools. This educational war is to continue, yet 22 per cent. of the annual army recruits are found to be illiterate.—The low birth rate which is such a cause of worry for the Government is laid at the door of the Socialists. The deficit in the Basin of the Garonne for 1912 is 8,165, which is equivalent to the wiping out of a small town. In eight departments of that region death overtakes birth. There are five other sections in the south and four in the Rhone valley where the same conditions prevail, as well as in the Seine-et-Marne and the Seine-et-Oise, while Paris itself has only 2,000 births to the good. Only Brittany is on the right side. Of its five departments, not only is there no falling off, but there was a gain last year of 17,000. The evil is most apparent where Socialism dominates.—It has been announced that the Government will ask for a loan of $260,000,000 to cover military expenses.

Spain.—Maura is reported to have told the King that he was unwilling to take the part of Premier without constitutional support. The new Prime Minister Dato who is a Conservative, but, it is said, with Liberal tendencies, proclaims that he is in favor of friendly relations with France and the United States, but he is unwilling to discuss the Mexican situation. One of his first cares, he declared, would be to appoint a Minister of Labor in the Cabinet which is made up of every faction of the Conservative party. Meantime, to still further complicate the political problem, a Catholic party is announced, of which Maura is to be the leader.—Although Cardinal Aguirre, the Primate of Spain, had the official right to be buried with the military honors of a Captain-General he insisted upon having his obsequies carried out with the simple ceremonies of the Franciscans to whom he belonged. He was buried in a pine coffin and left no property, but a pectoral cross and some books. All the civic and religious functionaries of the city attended the funeral.

Portugal.—The most recent accounts from Lisbon relate that the politicians of the country comprise Syndicalists, Monarchists, Evolutionists and Opportunists, who are watching each other and preparing for an upheaval, though exteriorly all is quiet. Costa, the Premier, who is the real ruler, is cordially hated by his old enemies and former friends. His treatment of the Church is that of a bitter persecutor, and his management of public affairs has raised the price of living and increased the taxes. Whole families are leaving the country secretly to escape the emigration tax, and those who remain are ready for a revolution.

Germany.—The question of succession to the Brunswick throne has been definitely settled by the unanimous vote of the Bundesrath. The statement officially issued in this connection by Prussia declares that the conditions of a virtual state of war between the Guelphs and Prussians, which had hitherto made the accession of the Brunswick throne impossible for the Cumberlands, no longer exists. It furthermore expresses the conviction of the Federated States, that the sovereignty of Prince Ernst August is in full accord with the principles of Federation agreements and the Constitution of the Empire. The German press finds fault with the document, and in particular because no measures are taken to restrain the Guelph party. The Centrist organ alone greets it with unstinted praise, and proclaims it to be "a final victory over the 'principle of legitimacy,' trodden under foot by Bismarck."—An important step in the question of German sovereignty has likewise been taken in the Bavarian House of Representatives. The resolution to change paragraph 21 of the Constitution to the effect that Prince Regent Ludwig may be enabled to ascend the Wittelsbach throne in place of the insane King Otto, has been accepted by an overwhelming majority. Baron von Hertling introduced the motion by declaring that a mon-archic State, in which the King is for a long time mentally incapacitated, must be considered abnormal, and that the present position of Bavaria, together with the insistence of popular sentiment makes it imperative that a King capable of performing his royal duties should be placed at the head of the Government. All parties, with the exception of the Socialists, expressed themselves in favor of the constitutional change by a majority of 122 against 27 votes.—A great victory has been won in Baden by the Centrists and Conservatives against the united Socialist and Liberal parties in the elections for the Second Chamber. Only four more places must be won by the Centre in the coming second elections to achieve an absolute majority in conjunction with the Conservatives. No doubt is entertained that the defeat of the Reds and Liberals will be complete.—A satisfactory explanation is given of the explosion of the Zeppelin dirigible, "L. 2," which resulted in the loss of its entire crew of twenty-eight officers and men. A new kind of wind shield had been used for the first time to protect the crew. An unforeseen partial vacuum, created behind this new device, caused the gas escaping from beneath the aluminum structure of the dirigible to be sucked into the gondola, where it was ignited by a spark from the motor. Deeply touched by the confidence placed in him in spite of this disaster, the ancient Count Zeppelin recently sent the following despatch to the Congress of Aviators at Leipzig: "If God will grant me a few more years of strength, the trust which has been placed in me will not be put to shame."

Austria-Hungary.—In its inquiry into the emigration question the Budget Committee has issued a resolution approving the intention of the Government to make the North Atlantic traffic of Austria independent of the North Atlantic shipping pool. Emigrants are thus to be protected against monopolistic exploitation. Great crowds are at present gathered together in the harbor cities, unable to leave because of the official closing of various shipping bureaus. The number of those who have escaped from possible military service is estimated at 200,000.—The resolutions asking for an army increase have been placed before the Representatives in the Reichsrath. The contingent of recruits is to be augmented by 31,300 men. It is claimed that the sudden military summoning of citizens during the recent crisis has reacted disastrously upon industrial and financial conditions, and that a larger standing army will make such summons unnecessary. National disagreements may be strongly accentuated in the coming discussions.

China.—By means of the "political railways" Russia and Japan purpose constructing, those Powers will effect, it is said, a "pacific penetration" of China to within 120 miles of Peking. According to the New York Herald this move should be regarded by the United States with great concern.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

The Episcopal General Convention

The meeting of the General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church is always interesting. It is the supreme authority of that denomination, it is made up of bishops, ministers and laymen from all parts of the country; and so one expects to find in it the true spirit of Episcopalianism. There have been more striking conventions than the one just closed in New York; but even this could not lose the essential interest coming from the reasons we have mentioned.

The Episcopalian spirit, that which animates it as a sect, is an abnormal interest in the mere externals of Christianity, joined with practical agnosticism regarding essentials. One may deny absolutely any objective presence of our Lord in the Holy Eucharist, and declare the Catholic doctrine a blasphemous fable. So do Calvinists and Zwinglians; and so did the Church of England in its beginnings, under the influence of its Calvinistic and Zwinglian fathers. This was a sad position for any Christian to take; yet in one way it is better than the modern Protestant Episcopalian position. It was at least positive, it recognized that the Mass was something, a something that mattered a great deal. Now, Protestant Episcopalianism has grown ashamed of its originators and of their teaching; and so the Mass has become nothing. It is the matter, not of Christian dogma, but of personal view. One may hold transubstantiation, consubstantiation, impanation, any opinion at all down to the most defiant real absence, but he is not by reason of his opinion in the matter either a better Episcopalian, or a worse. The holder of the transubstantiation view will grasp the hand of the holder of the real absence view and communicate with him in the Lord's Supper. Its all a matter of view, and the low view has rights as good as those of the high. It is becoming much the same with the Incarnation. Episcopalians, as a rule, have always been more or less touched with Nestorianism. Now things are growing worse. Nestorianism, Arianism, Semi-arianism and the Catholic doctrine are mere views. No one is to be chastised for his heresy, unless it be grossly offensive.

A burning question, exemplifying perfectly the Episcopalian agnosticism is that of the name of the Church. Is it the Catholic Church, or is it one of the sects of the Reformation? Tell me that there is no such thing as the Catholic Church, as I conceive it, and that there is no such thing as a sect; though I will pity the fate that makes you heir of those who dragged Christianity down so low, I will understand your indifference to the question so much to the front during the convention. But to say the Catholic Church is a reality and Protestantism is the denial of all that reality; and then to say that it is practically immaterial whether the Episcopal Church be called Protestant or Catholic, is explicable only on the grounds that the whole business has no real objective value, but is a mere matter of view. Those who call themselves Catholic would like to work the term somehow or other into the name of their denomination. But it is not of vital importance. They will wait until they have a majority in the convention; and, in the meantime, will not only submit to be called Protestant, but also will consent to communicate with those who are Protestants by persuasion. It is not a matter of life or death, of the true faith, or of its denial, of believing our Lord, or of giving Him the lie. No, only a matter of resolutions, of voting, of majority, bare or two-thirds, of constitutional amendment. The Protestant wing is more sincere. It recognizes the meaning of the change proposed and refuses to be robbed of the name it has received as an inheritance from its fathers.

Marriage came up in the convention in a rather contradictory way. One resolution urged that the rights of Americans and Protestant Episcopalians had been trampled on by the late marriage legislation of the Holy See. It did not explain how. It did not tell us that an American, inasmuch as he is an American, and a Protestant Episcopalian, inasmuch as he is a Protestant Episcopalian, have the inherent right to marry Catholics, nor that even, had they such a right, they would have the right to marry Catholics in their own way. Indeed, such argumentation would defeat itself; for there is no reason why the Catholic should not have the same rights in the matter, and so an impasse would result. Hence, the resolution asked the convention to affirm "that the marriage tie should not be dealt with otherwise than the Holy Scriptures and the laws of the land, based thereon, allow." The resolution is, of course, vague. It may mean that the marriage laws of the States of the Union are based on Holy Scripture. But we think not even a Protestant Episcopalian would be so foolhardy as to commit himself to that. It therefore reserves to the Protestant Episcopalian sect the right to judge those laws, to select for approval those it holds to be based on Holy Scripture, and to reprobate those which have no scriptural foundation. In a word, it claims for Protestant Episcopalians the right to legislate concerning marriage they will not grant the Catholic Church: it goes beyond any claim of the Catholic Church, since it requires the State to recognize its authority in the matter. Another resolution demanded an ecclesiastical law requiring ministers to refuse to marry couples who do not produce physicians' certificates that they are free from any disease that renders marriage inadvisable. Perhaps some deputies voted for both these resolutions; we are sure that many were quite capable of doing so. It rests with such to show the scriptural foundation for the forbidding of marriage to those whose union is "unadvisable," and the exaltation of the physician to such high functions in the matter.

Characteristic of the convention was its eagerness to make friends with the Jews. On Good Friday the Catholic Church has a special prayer for the Jews. It makes this prayer because our Lord Jesus Christ prayed specially on the Cross for His Jewish persecutors. He pleaded for their pardon because of their ignorance. The Church prays God in the spirit, almost in the words of St. Paul, to remove the evil from their hearts, that they may know Jesus Christ, the true Light enlightening their blindness. The founders of the Church of England, when they cut themselves off from the Catholic Church carried with them this, among other Catholic practices; and the Protestant Episcopalians in establishing their denomination left it in the Book of Common Prayer. The House of Deputies was tired of the practice. It seemed to have no concept of the attitude of the Church towards the Jews, how it holds that these still retain, as by a single thread, the birthright of their fathers, and looks forward to the day when all Israel shall be saved. Anyhow, such high considerations seem to have had no place in the discussion of a resolution calling for the abandonment of the practice as offensive to Jewish susceptibilities. The resolutions passed the House of Deputies, which had its reward in the good humored persiflage of a Jewish correspondent of one of the New York papers, who declared that so far were Jews from feeling hurt in the matter, that they were quite unaware that they had been the object of Christian prayers. The Deputies would have been wiser had they left untouched this time-honored practice of Christian charity. Another resolution called on the authorities of the Russian-Greek Church to denounce the accusations of ritual murder brought against the Jews from time to time. Such a demand is not likely to conciliate those to whom it is addressed. They will say, we suspect, that such accusations are the proper object of judicial investigations, that they have no reason to doubt the fairness of the Russian courts with all the evidence before them, but that they have every reason to consider impertinent the demand of the Protestant Episcopal Convention resting upon no evidence, but only upon the partisan reports of the daily press. Under the circumstances suspension of judgment would have been a more reasonable course.

A touch of comedy was introduced into the closing days of the convention. At the Church of England Congress, held lately at Southampton, the Bishop of London preached a sermon, in which he asked for a revival in a modified way of the Catholic practice of prayer to the saints. Everybody knows that Dr. Winnington Ingram is an erratic character. His learning is no more than a smattering; but he has the gift of captivating his hearers. In making his demand he took, of course, the opportunity of speaking disrespectfully of the Mother of God, and of railing at the Catholic Church, its teaching and practice. In fact, he seemed to wish not so much for the privilege of invoking the saints as such, as of invoking some of his particular friends, leaders in the High Church movement, that is to say, the privilege of canonizing such as he thought worthy of the distinction. He has his admirers in the Protestant Episcopal Church; so it is not surprising that in the convention he had his imitators, who wanted to enlarge the calendar by admitting not only such as St. Patrick, but also such as Bishop Seabury, George Washington, John Wesley and Bishop Hobart. A fundamental maxim in philosophy is: Prius est esse quam operari. One must be in heaven before he can intercede for us, and unless one can intercede there is no use in praying to him. We do not wish to make invidious distinctions, so we ask concerning all suggested, what guarantee can the Protestant Episcopal Church give that they are in heaven? Canonization, whatever way one takes it, whether by the modern way of judicial investigation and a Papal Bull, or by the way of cultus immemorialis, or the more ancient way still of general acceptance, supposes infallibility and miracles, while the Protestant Episcopal Church is certain that it is not infallible and pretends to no miracles. Moreover, what is the condition of the dead in Christ? Are they in heaven, or are they somewhere else awaiting the general resurrection? This also has a good deal to do with the worship of the saints; and it is a point on which there is a wonderful diversity of opinion among Protestant Episcopalians.

HENRY WOODS, S.J.

The "Jesuit Relations"

The death of Mr. Reuben Gold Thwaites whose chief claim to distinction consists in his having been the editor of the monumental work known as the new "Jesuit Relations" will be deeply regretted in the literary world of Europe and America. Though identified with the West he was in reality a New Englander. He was born in Dorchester, Mass., in 1853, and started on his literary career with the slender outfit of only a common-school education, though when he was about twenty-one he made certain post-graduate studies in Yale. After that we hear of him in Wisconsin, where he became Secretary and Superintendent of the State Historical Society and publisher of the "Wisconsin Collections." For ten years he was editor of the Wisconsin State Journal, and put in print the "Original Journals of Lewis and Clark," "Down Historic Waterways," "The Colonies 1492-1750," and "On the Storied Ohio."

In an appreciative notice of the life and labors of Thwaites, the New York Evening Post of October 23 says that although "his many publications, his zeal as a collector, and his influence upon historical scholarship at the University of Wisconsin have been a leavening force long and widely acknowledged," yet "his chief fame rests upon his resurrection of the Jesuit Relations—a resurrection as striking as the more recent discovery, in southern Illinois, of the Kaskaskia Records—and upon his careful edition of them in seventy-three volumes."

In spite of the punctuation of this passage we make bold to say with all due respect for the usually careful writers of the Evening Post, that the average reader would at first glance gather from the announcement that the "Kaskaskia Records," like the "Jesuit Relations" also consist of seventy-three volumes, especially as "the resurrection" of both is considered equally "striking." As a matter of fact, however, the "Kaskaskia Records" which were published in 1909, consist as far as the officials of the New York Public Library know, of a single volume which, when compared with the "Relations" is comparatively of no importance historically or otherwise. Nor is it true as the writer says further on that "more than to any man since Parkman, credit is due to Thwaites for the upbuilding of the romantic and colorful history of the Old Northwest."

Undue praise, we think, is here given to Parkman's work as against that of Thwaites. The two authors are not in the same class. Parkman did indeed write "colorful and romantic history"—the color at times being exaggerated and false, and with all his enthusiasm for the heroes he was portraying, giving evidence at times of a bitter religious bias; whereas, Thwaites was mainly a collector of documents which he laboriously dug out of hidden and forgotten archives at great expense, and with absolute disregard of the obstacles that confronted him. He kept his own individuality in the background, and permitted the actions of the men who figured in his pages to speak for themselves instead of injecting into them his own personal appreciations of methods and motives. It is true that Parkman is thanked by the editors of the three volume Quebec edition of the "Relations," but we have it on the best authority that he was supplied most generously with material for his books by the famous Father Martin, S.J., the founder of St. Mary's College of Montreal, who was not only an editor of manuscripts but an explorer of the old mission sites of which he has left many valuable aquarelles which were lately published by Father Arthur Jones, S.J., in his learned work on the Huron Missions. It was Father Martin also, who trained Gilmory Shea in research work when Shea was a Jesuit scholastic. Nor should credit be denied to Dr. E. B. O'Callaghan, the editor of the "Documentary History of New York," which opened a mine of valuable material for future historians.

The origin of the "Relations" was very simple. According to the rule of the Society of Jesus, accounts of what was being done at the various mission posts had to be sent as often as possible to the chief Superior who in those days lived in Quebec. Those letters or "relations," as they were called, had often to be written in the woods or in canoes, or in Indian camps and were then confided to a brother missionary who was starting on the trail for Quebec or oftener to a trapper or a trusty Indian. They were collated at Quebec and put in order for the printer in France. The editors who were responsible for the form in which they ultimately appeared were Fathers Le Jeune who came to America in 1632; Vimont, who was Superior in 1639; Jerome Lalemant, who filled that post in 1645; and later on, Paul Ragueneau, Le Mercier, De Quen and Claude Dablon.

These letters were published annually in France for a period of about forty years, from 1632 to 1673, and besides being a source of religious edification for the people at large, were of great scientific value because of the geographical and ethnological information they contained. Technically, this edition was known as the Cramoisy.

In 1672 for some cryptic reason Cardinal Altieri who was then a dominant influence in Rome forbade the publication of any missionary letters no matter from what part of the world they came. Thwaites suggested that Frontenac who hated the Jesuits had something to do with it. The order so incensed Louis XIV that there was for a time imminent danger of a quarrel with the Holy See, but the Jesuits of France tranquilized the angry monarch, and he at last with great reluctance submitted to the suspension of the publication. Of course the missionaries continued to send letters as usual to their Superiors, but these missives were stored away in the archives at Paris and elsewhere, and no one outside of the Jesuits themselves knew what they contained. The unwisdom of the prohibition was immediately apparent, for it was just after 1673 that Marquette's account of his discovery of the Mississippi arrived in France. But it could not be made public. It was only subsequently when England claimed the western country that the account of Marquette's exploration was given to the world and the controversy was settled.

The Quebec edition of 1858 was brought out under the auspices of the Canadian Government, and such scrupulous regard was had for the text that even the errors of the old editions were reproduced. The three volumes, however, comprise only the letters of the period between 1632 and 1673 besides Biard's account of his adventures in Port Royal and Mount Desert, as well as Charles Lalemant's story of his two shipwrecks on the coast, and his account of the establishment of the Jesuit residence in Quebec after Champlain returned to Canada.

The merit of Thwaites' work consists in this, that he added to this history of forty years, all the other documents he could find in Europe and America relative to the missions bringing the narrative up almost to the time of the suppression of the Society. Including the two precious volumes of indexes it runs through seventy-three large octavo volumes. It is true that the set should so to say, be cut in half, for the letters appear in the original language in which they were written, namely, in French, while on the opposite page appears the translation. But though duplicating the story and doubling the size of the work the arrangement is of great value for the historian, for he can see at a glance whether any liberties have been taken with the original text, or any oversight committed. In the matter of literary history he has also before him an excellent specimen of the French of Louis XIV, for although these narratives are for the most part simple and straightforward, they reveal at times an exquisite literary taste. As Thwaites says, the writers were "men of trained intellect who were acute observers and practiced in the art of keeping records of their experiences. They performed a great service to mankind in publishing their annals which are for historian, geographer and ethnologist among our first and best authorities."

The notes which Thwaites has added to each volume are of inestimable value. They fix the actual places where the events occurred; they furnish us with brief sketches of the people, great and small, savage and civilized, who are mentioned in the narrative; they give us the history of the various tribes; explain the meaning of Indian terms, customs and religious ceremonies, describe the vegetation, animal life, mines, etc., of the various regions, so that every step is flooded with information about the aborigines and their surroundings, and we are brought into intimate contact with trappers and traders, and ecclesiastics and soldiers and publicans, and we even follow the Indians who were brought over the seas to be shown to the wondering people of the Old World.

It will be interesting for many of our readers to know that among those to whom Thwaites expresses his gratitude for help in this part of his stupendous work, the first place is given to the Reverend Arthur E. Jones, S.J., so long identified with Fordham and now archivist of St. Mary's College, Montreal. "From the very first," says Thwaites, "he opened his heart to this enterprise, and has not only given us carte blanche to ransack his priceless stores, but has contributed invaluable suggestions and data almost without number."

Of course even this vast collection of material does not comprise all the "Relations" that were written. Many fell into the hands of the Indians and were destroyed; others disappeared in the various suppressions of the Society in Europe. Perhaps at some future day they may be discovered and will shed more light on the interesting story, as happened for instance with what is called the "Journal des Jésuites," the Superior's diary of the Residence at Quebec. It was found in the lumber room of the Governor General's House. The story of Father Laure is another example. It was rescued from a heap of waste paper that was about to be thrown into the furnace.

It must, however, be borne in mind that these seventy-three volumes are not for general reading, for it would be impossible to sustain a dilettante interest in the endless tangle of letters and reports that crowd and often overlap each other in this stupendous collection. Only the skilled historian can follow the trail through this forest. For him its value is priceless, for he has at hand, the most reliable documents that could be written about the history of this country. They have already formed the basis of many contributions to literature. Incidentally they enshrine in the national annals of Canada and the United States the unusually heroic figures of the men who first preached the Gospel of Christ in this part of the world. Q.

The New "Standard"*

Dr. Johnson in the preface to his Dictionary, first published in 1755, expresses the opinion that "no dictionary of a living language ever can be perfect, since while it is hastening to publication, some words are budding and some are falling away." Of the high merit of that work which remained the standard English Dictionary for a century there can be no doubt. "Looking to its clearness of definition, its general solidity, honesty, insight, and successful method, it may be called the best of all Dictionaries," said Carlyle. Here and there the definitions betray the personal feelings of the author, which Lord Brougham may have had in mind when he said that "the book becomes almost as entertaining to read as useful to consult." For example, "Excise," is explained in keeping with the Tory hatred of Walpole, as "a hateful tax levied upon commodities, and adjudged, not by the common judges of property, but wretches hired by those to whom excise is paid." Oats he defined, "A grain which in England is generally given to horses, but in Scotland supports the people." And with genuine humor he describes lexicographer as "a writer of dictionaries, a harmless drudge, that busies himself in tracing the original, and detailing the signification of words." It would be manifestly unfair, however, to judge of the merit of Dr. Johnson's valuable lexicon either by these examples or by that well-known definition he gives of net-work: Anything reticulated or decussated, at equal distances, with interstices between the intersections.

In spite of the admission in the preface that a living language is perpetually changing, Johnson made little account of living authors, holding that the English language had reached almost its full development in the days of Shakespeare, Hooker, Bacon and Spencer, and thought it useless to go further back than Sidney.

Archbishop Trench in 1857 was the first to enter an effective protest against the assumption which had long prevailed, especially in Italy and in France, that the chief duty of the lexicographer was to register only those words which are or at some period of the language have been "good" from a literary point of view. A dictionary he claimed should be "an inventory of the language; much more, but this primarily." Johnson had never a thought of making his work historical. Yet no part of his dictionary is more valuable than the quotations from standard authors with which he illustrated the definitions. This feature was more fully developed by Dr. Charles Richardson whose dictionary published in 1835-1836 is still a most valuable collection of literary illustrations. Johnson usually gave only the author's name, satisfied himself with one or two authorities and often quoted from memory and not always with accuracy.

Trench's idea that the general dictionary of a language should embrace all the words—current or obsolete—of that language with all their meanings and uses, but should not attempt to be except secondarily or indirectly a guide to "good" usage, was taken hold of by the Philological Society half a century ago and has reached its realization in the monumental work, the "Oxford New English Dictionary," now happily nearing its completion. How far such a work lies beyond the powers of any one man even though he be a Johnson, may be seen from Dr. Murray's announcement when the first volume appeared in 1888, that his corps of readers had increased to 1,300 and that 3,500,000 quotations, taken from the writings of more than 5,000 authors had been amassed. Such a work as the "Oxford Dictionary" is indispensable for one who is in quest of the history of a word and of its various changes and uses from the earliest period down to the present day. For the ordinary, common, everyday use of the layman it is not directly serviceable, and its price makes it for most persons prohibitive.

Fortunately there is one dictionary which has been just published whose vocabulary is complete, whose definitions are in character and form efficient, telling by explicit statement what words mean, with illustrative quotations and distinctions of synonyms that satisfy the inquirer and withal contains an amount of collateral information that makes the work encyclopedic. This is the "New Standard Dictionary of the English Language," which has been in preparation, under the direction of Dr. Isaac K. Funk as Editor-in-Chief, since 1909. The original edition issued by the present publishers under the title of "A Standard Dictionary of the English Language" has been improved and developed to such an extent that it deserves the name of a new creation. It is not as comprehensive in vocabulary as the "Oxford Dictionary" for certain current words in the earlier period of the history of the language are omitted because by the modern standard of use, they are no longer approved. This is in keeping with its scope, namely, to set down all the live words of the English language in the standard speech and literature of the day, not, however, to the exclusion of terms that are commonly used, dialectically or otherwise, by large numbers of people in different parts of the English speaking world.

It is indeed a far cry from Dr. Johnson who protested that he had written the English Dictionary "with little assistance from the learned," to the latest New Standard with its 380 editors and specialists, many of them having an international reputation. The difference between the two productions may serve to measure the great advancement in general education throughout the English speaking world, as well as the marvelous growth of that world itself, and the results which even in the compilation of a word-book the cooperation of the learned may effect.

The real merits of a reference book containing 3,000 closely printed pages are not to be decided or appreciated by a cursory inspection, but such examination as we have been able to make of the "New Standard" satisfies us that there has been a strenuous endeavor to gather from every field of scholarship, art, science, religion, history, exploration, commerce, industry or invention new matter of real value and utility.

The information indirectly given in connection with the meaning and usage of terms is one of the most commendable features of the Dictionary. Turning to the word Protestant, we find under it the compound term Protestant Episcopal Church with the entire history of that organization given in a nutshell.

"Protestant Episcopal Church, the Anglican Church in the United States, representing and descending from that branch of the Church of England founded in the American colonies during the seventeenth century. It received its name at a meeting of Maryland clergymen in 1780. Its clergy were all derived from England until the establishment of the episcopate in the person of Samuel Seabury, who was consecrated by the Scottish bishops at Aberdeen, November 14, 1784. When Bishop Seabury took his seat in the General Convention of 1789, the union of the Episcopal churches in the United States was completed. . . . Its doctrines are contained in the Thirty-eight Articles, and it holds to the historic episcopate, locally adapted to the people's needs. It now has (1912) 103 Bishops, including missionary jurisdictions, 5,600 ministers and about 963,000 members in the United States."

Again the noun Protestant is defined 1. A member of one of those bodies of Christians that adhere to Protestantism, as opposed to Roman Catholicism; in general a Christian who denies the authority of the Pope and holds to the right of private judgment in matters of religion; any Christian not a Roman Catholic, an Old Catholic, or a member of one of the Eastern churches. Then there is added the following note giving the history of its use: The term was first applied to those princes and other adherents of Luther who, at the second council of Spire, April 19, 1529, protested against the decree of the majority representing the Roman Catholic States of Europe, which decree involved a virtual submission of the Reformers to the authority of the Roman Catholic Church. It is now generally applied to and accepted by all Western Christians who are not Roman Catholics, though it is disclaimed by some High-church Anglicans.

The term "Protestant," chosen almost at hap-hazard, well illustrates the process of enlargement which the standard has undergone in the new and completed edition. The name Protestant Episcopal Church and the entire historical comment appear here for the first time.

On the same page our eye happens to fall on the word Prothonotary. The lay and the ecclesiastical uses are there set forth. The ecclesiastical use as defined is: "One of the twelve ecclesiasticals at Rome who keep the registry of important pontifical proceedings. Other distinguished ecclesiastics have received the title and some of the privileges of the acting prothonotaries." The statement that the number of the Prothonotaries at Rome is twelve is slightly inaccurate. There are several classes of prothonotaries and of these the prothonotaries Apostolic constitute the first, the others are either Supranumerarii (outside the number) or honorary, a long list of whom is given in the "Gerarchia Cattolica." The original "College of the Seven Notaries" was indeed increased to twelve by Sixtus V. But Pius IX in 1853 limited their number to seven, and Pius X in 1905 in exactly defining their position sets down the same number. The error is probably due to an inaccuracy in the "Catholic Dictionary" (1884) of Addis and Arnold.

Of course for absolute accuracy on Catholic terms and usages, recourse should now be had to "The Catholic Encyclopedia," but for general and secular information such as can be expected of a first-class dictionary for general use the "New Standard" seems to omit nothing that can be desired. The volume at hand is from the regular $30.00 full Morocco edition. There is also a two volume edition. But full details of price and a descriptive analysis of contents may be had from the publisher.

EDWARD SPILLANE, S.J.

A Protestant Peril

The Lake District of Northern England has been celebrated widely by the school of poetry known by that name, and its mild beauties, as sung by Wordsworth, leave the impression of quiet content and all pervading peace. But, alas! the Wordsworthian calm exists no more. A terrible invasion has destroyed the tranquilizing force of nature's charms and transformed the whole neighborhood into a stormy counterpart of the foaming cataract of angry waters that Southey tells us "fall down at Ladore." This awesome event is the opening of a convent school of higher education at a place called Ulverston, and the fact that the Sisters come from France grievously aggravates the peril. The local Anglican rector, alive to the dangers of the situation, has written to the English Church Magazine in the hope of averting the calamity. It is an instructive document. He has "nothing but respect and love for Roman Catholics as individuals" and "the local priest is a personal friend" but "the System is unscriptural, fundamentally unsound," and as "this convent school is ultimately intended for the influencing of Protestant children towards the creed of Rome" he feels bound "to give a clear note of warning to those who may be in peril."

The note, if not clear, is long and somewhat loud. He does not deny "the cheapness and worth of the secular education given by the Nuns" nor the merit of "those who are exiles for conscience sake," nor "the outward charm, culture, quietness and gentleness of those devout ladies," nor that "their promises not to interfere with a child's home religion" are "given in good faith"; but as they are "whole-hearted servants and active missionaries of Rome" and "feel that there is but one Church on earth and that all outside her are left to the uncovenanted mercies of God" they cannot keep their promises; and, besides, "the ATMOSPHERE of the Convent School with its emblems, dresses, etc.," will powerfully supplement "the religious bias of the teachers" in turning the pupil's mind "to an alien faith and practice."

An impassioned appeal follows in the name of "your civil and religious liberties, domestic peace, etc.," but otherwise the document is a restrained and moderate statement of the arguments that ministers urge on Protestant parents against sending their children to Catholic schools. And it is also true, except in regard to Catholic teachers violating their promises. In this he forgets that the Catholic church is the protagonist of parental rights in the religious education of children and she will not receive minors into her fold without their parents' authorization. Moreover, in case of abuse the remedy is in the parents' hands, the immediate withdrawal of the children. But why should the minister have to make such appeal? Protestant and secular schools, the complainant tells us, are plentiful in Ulverston. Then why should Protestant parents send their children to the Sisters? Evidently because they cannot find in their own schools "the charm, gentleness and culture of those refined ladies," and also for the additional reason he urges to the contrary, that "a singular individual attention is given to pupils in these establishments."

They want to have their children taught well the things they should know and kept free from the burden of things they should not know, and they wish to have them trained in modesty and true culture by ladies whose example enforces their teachings. As to whether their daughters in later life will adopt the creed and practice from which the unique excellence of their teachers flows, they can plead the religious liberty which ministers preach in the abstract but seldom act upon in the concrete. "By their fruits you shall know them," is the powerful argument that draws non-Catholics to Catholic schools, and to the Catholic Church, and had the minister such an argument to advance for his own schools and his own church, he would have no occasion for his note of warning. Such incidents may well excite Catholics to further appreciation of their schools.

Oriental Imagery

Oratory is rarely history, especially when touched by the heat of the exuberant East. Thus, the Rt. Rev. Samuel Fallows, D.D., Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Chicago, told the Mohonk Conference, on October 23, that "much had been done for the Filipinos proper by the Roman Catholic and Protestant Churches, but that the Rt. Reverend Charles H. Brent, the Protestant Episcopal Bishop of the Archipelago, had alone concentrated his labors on the moral and spiritual uplift of the pagans and Moros."

The Filipinos proper are the Catholics. The Moros and pagans, we presume, are not properly Filipinos. It is true that Bishop Brent has labored much with the first class in making them lose their Catholic faith by "hospitals, trade-schools, bookkeeping, surveying, telegraphy and the English language," all of which have been used as means to seduce these proper Filipinos from the Church that lifted their ancestors out of the most degraded savagery and made of them the clever, the highly educated and the only Christian people of the Orient. If Bishop Fallows and Bishop Brent, and their associates and supporters and admirers, will take the word of one who knows, they have not made these Filipinos better Christians by inducing them to abandon their religion. You generally find a big sinner in an apostate Catholic.

With regard to the zeal of Bishop Brent in having "alone concentrated his labors upon the moral and spiritual uplift of the Moros and pagans," we anxiously inquire how Bishop Brent could continue to "concentrate his labors" on the distant missions, when he was so busy in Manila, and how Bishop Fallows, "who spent some time in the Islands," could have failed to learn that, whereas Bishop Brent sent two missionaries to the Moros, there are actually in the Province of Mindanao, where the Moros mostly congregate, a Catholic bishop, namely, the Rt. Reverend Michael J. O'Doherty, D.D., with 72 priests, 38 lay-brothers, 11 convents, 50 Sisters and a Catholic population of 300,000. It must have made Bishop Brent uncomfortable to be told that "he alone was concentrating his labors" on these so-called Filipinos, and must have recalled Dooley's skit on the hero of San Juan Hill, entitled "How I Fought the Spaniards, or Alone in Cuba."

Incidentally it would be interesting to know if there is any family connection between Bishop Fallows and Mr. Edward H. Fallows, President of the American Philippine Company, a corporation "organized for the purpose of investigating opportunities for investment in the Philippine Islands and the Orient"?

The Financial News of England volunteers the information that one of the leaders of the Workingmen's Unions has just realized by speculation the neat little sum $120,000. Having reliable information about coming strikes he sold out the stock of the industries that were threatened and had only to buy them back again when he knew that the strikes were to be called off. Whether the profit went into his own pocket or that of the Union is not said.

CORRESPONDENCE

A Mission to London's Non-Catholics

LONDON, Oct. 23, 1913.

One of the most remarkable and successful missions to non-Catholics ever preached in London has just concluded at the beautiful Church of St. Mary's, Clapham Common, headquarters of the Redemptorist Fathers.

So extraordinary has been its appeal that it was extended and continued on several subsequent days in the local Guild hall, where the outstanding problem has been that of packing into a comparatively confined area the many hundreds of non-Catholics of every denomination who literally clamored for admission. From the Nonconformist conscience to the foolishly rabid Agnostic, from the Protestant "Church of England" Adventist to the open-minded seeker after a new sensation—to your thinking—every differing type of the non- and "anti"-Catholic has been represented in these great overflow audiences.

The missionary was the well-known Father George Nicholson, C.S.S.R., who, by the way, has an equally well-known and popular brother in the Society of Jesus. Father Nicholson is gifted with a noble presence and a matchless eloquence, linked to something approaching a genius for that rare capacity of presenting to other than Catholic audiences the greatest truths of our Faith in the simplest and withal in the most eloquent terms of literary and polished English. Moreover, he had the good sense to group the essential points of his course of lectures under a few simple but very striking headings, such as "The Catholic Church—Christ's Kingdom on Earth," "May a Man Believe What He Likes?" "The Rule of Faith, the Church or the Bible," "Must a Man Tell His Sins to the Priest?" "Is Christ Really Present in the Holy Communion?" "Is There a Hell, and Who Goes There?" "Mary the Mother of God, and England Her Dowry," etc. At the close of every discourse the missionary invited questions and nothing could speak more eloquently for the extraordinary interest aroused than the number and diversity of the queries that he found himself confronted with night after night.

"The flood of questions has been such," said Father Nicholson to the present writer, "that I have been receiving them by post, by hand, by district messenger, and when I adopted the plan of dealing with questions at the close of my lectures, it has frequently taken me a couple of hours to answer them very briefly. Sometimes the queries have come from clergymen of the Church of England, and occasionally—when dealing with such a special subject as the Confessional—they have not been framed in the very choicest spirit or language. But I am bound to say I have had little to complain of on this score, and generally speaking the questions put to me have been not merely fairly and adequately framed, but animated by a genuine desire to get at the Truth and by a real reverence for the subject.

"Immediate results? We are sure of at least fifty converts as the outcome of this one fortnight's Mission to South London, in addition to the great numbers of people who are so much interested that they desire to be further instructed."

At the very outset of this Mission, Father Nicholson fell foul of the Globe newspaper. (The Globe is the oldest-established of our London evening papers, conservative in politics and ultra-Church of England in its ideals.) It had remarked, with a preceptible sneer, that "we [i. e., the Globe] imagine that Cardinal Vaughan would have called himself a Catholic first and an Englishman afterwards," or words to that effect. "Now surely to God," said Father Nicholson, commenting on these words from the pulpit, "the Cardinal would have called himself a Catholic first and an Englishman a very long way afterwards!" The Globe returned to the subject next day, devoting about half a column of its space to the missionary's spirited criticism and to vitriolic comment thereon. But this by the way.

In a brief printed appeal to non-Catholics in South London, Father Nicholson said: "The claim that the Catholic Church makes, of being the ONE divinely-appointed teacher of God's truths to men, must arrest the attention of every true believer in Christ Jesus, and must challenge a candid and impartial enquiry. There are in England to-day vast numbers of earnest men and women who, through no fault of their own, have an absolutely erroneous idea of the Catholic Church, her doctrines and her practices. It is surely no cause of offence, if I ask you to come to the course of lectures here announced, and to give a fair hearing to Catholic truth explained and upheld from a Catholic standpoint." The result of this manly, simple-worded appeal has, as we have just seen, exceeded all expectations.

Father Nicholson is himself as yet a stranger to the United States, but he told me that he hopes not always to be so. Moreover, he has been associated a great deal in missions and propagandist work with one whose name is almost a household word in certain Catholic centres in America—Father Herbert Vaughan. With the latter he has made two of these prolonged and far-reaching "motor-van missions" that have proved so strikingly successful in the United Kingdom, and would have rejoined him in the autumn of this year for a further campaign of the kind, but for the fact that he approached him too late in the day. It is not only natural, but inevitable, that a missionary of George Nicholson's zeal, eloquence and devotion should be greatly in demand, and as a matter of fact he is "booked up," so to speak, for missions all over the country far into next year. These are at places as widely apart as Pontypool in Wales, Salford Cathedral, Teddington, the far north of Scotland, etc. "Father George" has been conducting or assisting at missions for upwards of twenty-two years. In that period he has covered many thousands of miles in England, Scotland, Wales and Ireland, and he mentioned to me that not the least memorable sight he has seen was the recent one—at Limerick, I think he said—of two thousand men, mostly belonging to the laboring classes, receiving the Sacrament in one communion. It is experiences such as these that encourage the wearied missionary to persevere.

He has himself enjoyed the satisfaction of having brought many converts into the Church by reason of his gifts of eloquence and personal magnetism. He has also an abiding sense of humor, and you might have heard an occasional irrepressible burst of laughter from the congregations during the recent course. Nor does this sense of humor owe anything to the inborn wit of the Green Isle, for Father Nicholson belongs, I believe, to a very old English family. He told me, incidentally, that he once saw himself described in a provincial newspaper as "a good mixer." At first he puzzled over this quaint description not a little, until at last he gathered from the context that it was evidently intended to compliment him upon his facility for "mixing"—i. e., making friends—with all the sorts and conditions of men, women, and children who came to hear him preach!

I have strayed ever so slightly from the track of this memorable autumn mission to non-Catholics in South London in 1913. At one of these lectures, in a very restricted area, there were no fewer than five hundred non-Catholic visitors alone, and a noteworthy feature was the splendid way in which the congregations doubled and trebled themselves on each successive night of the Mission. "We have had literally every shade of thought represented here at St. Mary's," he said, "Atheists, Agnostics, Free-thinkers, Wesleyans, Methodists, Baptists, Anabaptists, Unitarians, Plymouth Brothers. All were equally reverent, all equally delighted and interested in what they heard—in fine, as truly magnificent an audience as mortal missionary could desire. In all modesty I must think that the result is a triumph for Catholicism in England's great nation-city, at a time when all other creeds seem confused by some sort of philosophic doubt or other."

This event happily but unexpectedly synchronized with the "jubilee" of the famous Redemptorist headquarters in which it took place, whilst Father Nicholson's crowning triumph of oratory was on the night of Rosary Sunday, which also happens to be the festival of the dedication of St. Mary's at Clapham. Redemptorist missionaries in this country are very frequently credited with going to the extreme of "anathema" in preaching the pains and penalties attaching to such as fall easily into sin and temptation. With this particular and exceptional missionary force it is far otherwise. Father Nicholson is an incorrigible optimist, and it is his wonderful capacity for preaching and teaching "sweetness and light" that has rendered this Mission such a striking success.

He told me of an incident in which Father Herbert Vaughan figured once while en voyage to the United States. An argument of a religious character took place between him and an Anglican clergyman who happened to be a fellow-passenger. Later on, the captain of the steamship joined Father Vaughan in a stroll on deck. "By jove!" quoth the captain, "but you had by far the best of that argument, Sir!" "Thank you very much," said Father Vaughan, "but may I ask what your religious views happen to be, Captain?" "Oh, as to that," airily replied the other, "my own view is that all so-called creeds are nonsense, you know!" But our missionary added, by way of comment, that in his own experience of seafaring men, those who go down to the sea in ships, be they Catholic or otherwise, are frequently men of Godfearing and really noble aspirations and endowment.

PERCY CROSS STANDING.

Ceylon University College and Sodalities

The English Crown Colony of Ceylon is passing through a very critical stage of educational experience, and Catholics, quite naturally, are anxious about its issue. Until now there were in the island only secondary colleges preparing candidates for the junior and senior Cambridge examinations. Those students who wished to obtain a higher education had to go to England or to one of the Indian universities. This arrangement was not satisfactory. With an excellent harbor, one of the very best in the East, and the consequent facilities for commerce and intercourse with the West, the little island has in recent years made rapid strides in civilization and social progress. To meet the needs of the times a university, or at least a University College, is an urgent necessity, and the latter has been granted by the Home authorities, with a brief interval for public discussion before the final settlement is arrived at. Now, the predominant feature of the proposed college is, that the Government will have complete monopoly of it, and no private institution of an equal grade can be affiliated to it. This attitude on the part of the Government is being vigorously opposed in pamphlets and public lectures by the Catholic Press, led by the Messenger of Colombo, and by eminent Catholic educationalists.

The Rev. Father Martin, O.M.I., B.A. (Cantab), has distinguished himself as the chief champion of the Catholic cause. As soon as the proposal of the Government was made public, Father Martin, in a series of brilliant "letters" to the Catholic Messenger of Ceylon, sounded a note of alarm, and directed the attention of Catholics to the seriousness of the situation. He made it clear that Catholics could not conscientiously accept a system of higher education monopolized by a godless State institution. The constant and universal teaching and practice of the Church, and the very nature of education itself, were appealed to as first principles on which the Catholics are to form their conscience in the matter. Monopolization of higher education by the Government was, moreover, weighed in the balance of justice and wisdom, and was found wanting and self-condemned. It was against justice, because Catholics, who form an important part of the tax-paying population of Ceylon, have a rightful claim for a proportionate share of higher education, in a form acceptable to them in a moral and religious point of view; against wisdom, because an educational system informed and permeated by the wholesome influence of religion is a valuable contribution to the civic and moral rectitude of the citizens. This has lately been admitted by a great Protestant authority. "The Catholic schools (in Ceylon)," he said, "are far superior to the public schools, because they teach the young the principles of honor, morals and industry. . . . Our brethren of the Catholic Church can teach us valuable lessons on this subject. They have clearly recognized the importance of a right atmosphere in education."

To bring home these arguments to the Catholics of Colombo, Father Martin summarized the contents of the "letters" in a vigorous lecture, at which the entire Catholic élite of the metropolis was present. The earnestness of the speaker, his ringing eloquence and the momentous character of the subject all combined, held the audience spell-bound for over an hour. That evening the Catholic public fully realized that an uncompromising opposition to State monopoly was their sacred duty. Father Martin's arguments were so telling and persuasive that even the non-Catholic public were compelled to admit the reasonableness of the Catholic claim. Already the press in Ceylon, with few exceptions, has declared in favor of Catholics. The Times of Ceylon, in particular (which is the organ of the British settlers in the islands, and an active supporter of the Government), although it opposed the Catholic demand at first, has lately been obliged to yield ground by the following confession: "It is obviously not for us either to teach Rome that it is wrong, or to dictate to Catholic parents what their attitude should be. We can only express regret at the deadlock which is thus arrived at." The Catholics are still in the thick of the fight, and it is too soon to anticipate its final issue. Yet if public opinion counts for anything the Government will have to modify its scheme in such a way as to admit the affiliation of at least one Catholic College to the new University College.

Besides being the year in which this great educational struggle was inaugurated, 1913 will be a memorable one in the annals of the Catholic Former Pupils' Association of St. Joseph's College, Trichinopoly. It witnessed the celebration of three events closely bound up with the advancement of Catholicism in South India, viz., the Diamond Jubilee of the Sodality of the Immaculate Conception; the Silver Jubilee of the Association itself, and the Golden Jubilee of the religious life of its Founder, the Rev. Fr. Herandeau, S.J., at present Procurator of the Toulouse Province.

The celebration of the triple Jubilee was fitly preceded by the annual Retreat, in which eighty-two former pupils participated. The general meeting was attended by more than two hundred from all parts of the Presidency, besides the professors and Catholic undergraduates of the college. The Holy Father, through the Cardinal Secretary, sent a message of congratulations, with a special Apostolic blessing for the members of the Association and the Sodality.

This Sodality was erected in the college as early as 1852. It was the first Sodality ever erected under the invocation of the Immaculate Conception. In the sixteenth century there were sodalities at Cochin (Malabar), and at Goa, established by the Jesuit missionaries, but both of them, unhappily, shared the vicissitudes of the Society and ceased to exist, with the suppression of the same in the eighteenth century. Hence the Sodality at Trichinopoly is now the oldest in South India, if not in the whole of India. The spiritual good done by it is incalculable. Hundreds of educated Catholics, living for the most part in a pagan atmosphere, have kept up their faith, and have been, besides, active apostles of it, thanks to the influence and guidance of this single institution. Nay, more. It has also been the fruitful mother of a number of societies and organizations, which still continue to receive inspiration and vitality from it. Per ea crescunt per quæ sunt. In short, its progress was in accordance with the needs of the times. Five and twenty years ago, with a view to foster a greater sense of brotherhood among educated Catholics, a Former Pupils' Association was established. Again, some nine years ago, the Sodality was the effective means of promoting frequent and daily Communion, both among the students of the college and their elder brethren in the world. It is indeed a heavenly sight at which angels rejoice to behold the majority of the six hundred Catholic boarders approaching the Eucharistic Table every day. With frequent and daily Communion a series of important organizations soon started into being. The Morning Star, the organ of the Sodality of Our Lady for South India, the Catholic Truth Association, which enables the Catholic undergraduates to become acquainted with the historical and dogmatic sides of our holy religion; the Voluntary Catechists' Association, which so ably seconds the efforts of the hard-worked missionaries; the League of Charity, with seven sections, into which the members of the Sodality have been drafted; and the Apostleship of the Press, are the most important. The Sodality, which has gathered round it such an excellent group of Catholic activities, has not only justified its existence, but has established its claim to be considered an essential factor of Catholic progress in India.

The Former Pupils' Association, which celebrated its Silver Jubilee this year, can boast of achievements proper to itself, although in most matters, it is, as it were, the executive organ of the Sodality. Its chief work during the last five lustres has been the organizing of Retreats for its members, and the inculcation of sound Catholic principles, to be lived up to in social, political and professional departments. About the success of the Retreat movement in South India, the present writer has more than once informed the readers of AMERICA. This Association also furnishes the largest and the most active contingent of members to the South Indian Catholic Association. Through the cooperation of both important political privileges have accrued to the Catholic community. It was on their representation that the Madras Government granted a Catholic representative in the Presidency Legislative Council.

The Jewish Protest

The "Ritual Murder Trial" which is now engaging the attention of the world is based on an accusation that has been reiterated century after century by the enemies of the Jewish race. In brief it consists in this, that they, or at least some of their sects, employ Christian blood in certain religious ceremonies, and for that purpose the crime of murder in a hideous form is committed.

Such is the statement of the "Jewish Encyclopedia" which adds that "this blood accusation dates from the beginning of the thirteenth century." The writer probably means, however, that its connection with Good Friday dates from that period; for in the beginning of the article entitled "Blood Accusation" we are told that their great historian Josephus assails Apion the Alexandrian grammarian for accusing the Jews to the Roman Emperor Caligula of "annually fattening a Greek in the temple, killing him, offering his body as a sacrifice, eating his internal organs and swearing an oath against all the Greeks." This of course antedated the thirteenth century, and the Emperor Caligula's record in history is that of a relentless persecutor of the early Christians.

Again we are told by the same writer that "the first case in which the Jews were actually accused of killing a Christian child for ritual purposes was that of St. William of Norwich in 1144." That event also preceded "the middle of the thirteenth century." On that occasion, we are told, "none of the Jews were tried or punished for the alleged crime."

In 1235 occurred the famous "Fulda Case" which was brought to a satisfactory conclusion by a conference of many scholars and distinguished Jewish converts to Christianity. Their report on the testimony was referred to the Emperor Frederic II who issued an imperial decree which declared that "with the general consent of the reigning princes he exonerated the Jews of the district from the grave crime with which they had been charged, and declared the remainder of the Jews free from all suspicion."

Nevertheless similar accusations continued to multiply and an appeal was made to Pope Innocent IV, who not only issued two Bulls declaring the Jews innocent of such crimes, but repeated the commands of several of his predecessors who defended and protected the race. It is on this account that Innocent IV has been always held in grateful memory by the Jewish people. Nor was he alone in this respect. Similar pronouncements were made by Gregory X, Martin V, Paul III and Clement XIV, and as the Encyclopedia states "many Popes have either directly or indirectly condemned the Blood Accusation and no Pope has ever sanctioned it." Such has always been the spirit of the Catholic Church, and it might be added that in the case of little St. Hugh of Lincoln who is the most famous of these alleged murder victims, it was the Franciscan friars whose intercession with Henry III saved a great number of Jews from execution.

It is no wonder that the Papal Secretary of State, Cardinal Merry del Val indignantly denounces as baseless and wicked the charge that Pope Innocent IV had not only not condemned but actually approved those trials. His Eminence called to the attention of Lord Rothschild, who had written to him on the subject, that other Popes had likewise condemned them. In the same sense Cardinals Bourne, Gibbons and Farley and other distinguished prelates, have voiced the sentiment of the Church in this matter.

We have dwelt upon the history of this accusation to emphasize the fact that such atrocious charges are not Christian in their origin. Pagan history and literature make this sufficiently clear. Nor has Russia anything to do with Catholicity. The priests and monks and bishops mentioned in the press reports of the proceedings at Kieff are not Catholic priests and monks and bishops, and the Russian Government has been as relentless and remorseless in its persecution of Catholics as she has of the Jews.

We admire and applaud the united and public action of the Jews in denouncing the attempt to fasten the ignominy of the Beiliss trial on their race and religion, but at the same time we cannot but wonder at the apathy and unconcern of Catholics who hear more infamous charges against their own Church and its practices, and who do nothing but moan and lament. The public spirit and unity of the Jews should teach us a lesson. We need it sorely.

An Absurdity—and Worse

To what absurdities the obstinate sticking to a false position must lead, the following quotation from a Protestant Episcopal periodical shows plainly:

"The loyal remnant of Caldey Benedictine monks have now found a permanent home at Pershore Abbey, in Worcestershire. Pershore was given by its loyal lay owner to the Caldey community while it was still in communion with the See of Canterbury, but has now been taken away from that community and given to the monks who have remained faithful to their holy mother the Church in this country. The donor rightly considered that the seceding monks had forfeited all right to the gift, and represent only a schismatic Benedictinism."

To call Benedictines in communion with the Holy See, schismatic, is ridiculous. Still more so is the implication that there is any possible home for Benedictines in the Church of England. But the paragraph is worse than absurd. It is scandalously ungrateful. As we pointed out some weeks ago, Pershore had been given absolutely to the Caldey monks. These, more anxious for the eternal welfare of their brethren according to the flesh than for the assertion of their own rights, listened to the querulous Lord Halifax, and consented to return it to its donor, should he wish to get it back. He did so wish, and the monks surrendered the place; but they had not "forfeited all right to the gift." The "loyal remnant" is at Pershore solely through the unworldly generosity of the Caldey Benedictines. How long they will remain there is another question. This, however, is certain. They will not remain there as Benedictines, even in the figurative sense in which the term has hitherto been applied to them.

But Episcopalians can descend to lower depths. A Boston minister who writes over the signature, "Presbyter Ignotus," has the following:

"I am glad to learn that Pershore Abbey is not among the stolen goods. One of the oldest Benedictine foundations in England, it had been given to Caldey; but the donor has succeeded in reclaiming it, and has put it at the disposal of the loyal members of the Caldey Community."

"The donor has succeeded in reclaiming stolen goods!" A New York paper, apropos of the Convention quoted an English opinion that the Protestant Episcopalian clergyman is usually a gentleman. The restrictive "usually" means a great deal.

A Lay-Apostolate in Cincinnati

Nineteen months ago AMERICA expressed its opinion regarding the need the Church has to-day of efficient Catholic laymen to second or inspire the initiative of the clergy. We said then that the troubles that beset the Church to-day are due not so much to the malice of her foes as to the apathy of her friends. We claimed that genuinely representative Catholics are not sufficiently conspicuous in our civil and commercial life, in the trades and in the professions. More men are needed, we said, of high principles, lofty ideals and wide education. The Church can take little pride surely in owning as her sons politicians who never receive the sacraments; labor leaders who are advocates of violent and even anarchical methods of reform; social climbers who contract Protestant marriages; professional men who send their boys to non-Catholic colleges; or officials, whose public utterances are often wanting in good taste as in Catholic loyalty.

The Church needs zealous and faithful sons who are neither deaf nor indifferent to her pleadings when she urges them to be men who can and will help her to face and solve the problems she now has to meet. Her bishops, priests and religious men and women cannot unaided do all that Her Sovereign Lord's holy cause prompts her to undertake to-day. The cooperation and assistance of a devout, efficient, thoroughly Catholic-principled laity are necessary, who will think little of giving time and money and, above all, personal service to the promotion of the social activities she deems it well to further.

We call attention to AMERICA's message to the laity then proclaimed because of a practical exemplification of its spirit which just the other day was brought to our notice. It is contained in the program of a lay-apostolate recently introduced in the parish of St. Xavier, Cincinnati, Ohio, and is thus described in the November issue of the Monthly Calendar published for the information of that congregation:

"Upon the suggestion and practical initiative of Rev. M. J. Ryan, S.J.," of the St. Xavier's parochial staff, "a committee of eighteen was recently appointed representing the Married and Young Men's Sodalities, and the St. Vincent de Paul Society. Its aim will be in general to assist the pastors in their work of ministering to the spiritual and even temporal needs of the parish.

"The territory within the parish lines will be divided into eighteen sections, to be assigned respectively to each member of this committee. The captain of each district will sub-divide his section and appoint lieutenants whose duty it will be to work out the details of any project that may be outlined by the pastors. In general the work of the captains and lieutenants will be to keep the pastors in touch with conditions in their several districts. They will verify the new census of the parish when completed, and maintain a card index record of persons living in the parish as well as of those who move into or out of it.

"Each sub-division being thus supervised, its vigilant captain and lieutenant will be alert for cases that may require the spiritual ministration of the priest, or temporal relief in bodily necessities. They will promptly report and act upon all cases of poverty or destitution, or of neglected children by reason of intemperate parents, or other causes, in a word, they will endeavor to anticipate the pastors' work by earnest and cordial cooperation with them in so far as lay activity will permit.

"It is hoped that by systematic and organized effort on the part of this committee the foundation of a lay apostolate may be established, by which a vast amount of good can be effected throughout the parish, which left to the pastors single-handed would be almost impossible of accomplishment."

It is a most praiseworthy movement and admirably practical in its details. Had we such a committee in all of the large parishes of this country, made up of upright, energetic and truly Catholic members eager to cooperate with their pastors, we should speedily put an end to a condition of affairs in which the Church's progress is often hindered and her work left undone owing largely to the lack of a zealous and efficient body of laymen.

"Professor Bernhardt"

May a Catholic, whose end is near, be lawfully kept in ignorance of his condition in order that he may have a more "peaceful" death? Has the doctor any right to prevent the priest from giving the last Sacraments to a dying person? "Certainly not!" will be the orthodox reader's prompt answer. The hour of his death is absolutely the most important in a man's life. For his everlasting weal or woe depends altogether on the state in which his soul is as it leaves the body. Then the physician of the body must yield his place in due season to the physician of the soul.

These are not the views, however, of Arthur Schnitzler, a German playwright, whose "latest and most original drama," "Professor Bernhardt," was forbidden to be presented in Austria on account of the uproar it was sure to cause, for the incident on which the play turns is said to have actually happened in Vienna. The drama has been produced, however, in Berlin, and a San Francisco house has recently published a translation of the text. Professor Bernhardt, the hero of the drama, is a skilful Jewish doctor, who is the head and president of the Elizabethinum, the best hospital in Vienna. One of his patients is a Catholic girl who is dying as a result of her sinful excesses. So the nurse summons Father Franz Reder, "Priest at the Church of the Holy Florian," as the incompetent translator calls him, to confer the "last ointment." But when the priest appears, Professor Bernhardt forbids him to go near the patient. For she "has no idea," he says, "that she is going to die; she expects anything else rather than this visit. . . . I believe, Your Reverence, that it would be wrong to awaken her from this last dream. . . . If it is not in my power to save my patient, it is at least my duty to let her die happily. . . . As her physician, to whom the happiness of the patient is confided to the last minute, I must forbid your entering that room."

But while the priest, who seems fonder of talking than of acting, bandies words with the conscientious doctor, the patient dies unshriven.

Professor Bernhardt's troubles now begin. The Catholic directors of the hospital demand an immediate investigation. The Jewish physician is brought to trial, witnesses attest that he not only forbade the priest to enter the dying patient's room, but they falsely assert that he actually pushed Father Reder away and dealt him a blow. So Professor Bernhardt is deprived of his post and sent to prison for two months, just for doing "his duty as a physician." During the trial the priest testified that he believed the doctor's behavior toward him "was not prompted by hostile feelings towards the Catholic Church, and after the verdict visits Professor Bernhardt on purpose, to say: "I feel myself prompted to admit that in this special case—understand, Professor, in this special case—you acted correctly in your capacity as a physician, and that you only obeyed your duty, as I did mine." Strange language, certainly, even from a priest whom Professor Bernhardt calls "one of the most liberal of his cloth." For no physician, whatever his own religious opinions may be, should keep dying patients from being attended in good season by the clergy they themselves, their relatives, or their friends choose to summon. In so doing he goes outside his province, invades his patients' rights of conscience, and imperils their soul's salvation.

The sympathies of Arthur Schnitzler, the writer of the drama, are clearly with his hero. But "Professor Bernhardt," after all, is only a play. In certain Austrian circles a man like Bernhardt would, perhaps, be regarded as a martyr of duty, but in this country he would be generally considered just a stubborn fool. For even our non-Catholic physicians have borne frequent testimony to the remedial value of the priest's ministrations and seldom have we heard of a doctor's hindering in any way the seasonable conferring of the last Sacraments. This, of course, is only as it should be. But the presentation and publication of dramas like "Professor Bernhardt" tend to raise doubts in the public mind as to the physician's duty of giving precedence at a death-bed to the clergyman.

A Long Service

Brooklyn will celebrate in a worthy way the fortieth anniversary of the appointment of Mr. Thomas W. Hynes to the presidency of its Particular Council of St. Vincent de Paul, an office which he has constantly and devotedly administered during these many years. Rarely is a position of trust confided to one man for so long a period, rarely likewise are men able or willing to sacrifice so large a portion of their lives to the routine work of a function which means no recompense, no publicity or honor, but only an incessant service of their neighbor. Yet its reward, we may add, is all the greater in that it comes from His hands alone who has promised that whatever we do to the least of his poor and little ones we do it unto Him.

It is in accordance with this spirit that the meeting is to be conducted, presided over by Bishop McDonnell of Brooklyn, at which addresses will be made by leading men of the organization, including the president of the Superior Council of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul, Hon. Thomas M. Mulry. The object is not so much the honor of an individual as the good of the Society.

itself and to enlist in its cause the energy of the young men of our day. What better ideals can we place before them in an age of self-indulgence than the example of self-sacrifice in the service of God and our neighbor which inspired the life of Ozanam. Others, who can devote themselves to such service, may be prompted to offer the least they can give, their financial support. If therefore, such public attention is given by Catholics to a humble life spent for the love of God in the service of humanity, it is only in order that it may be set on high as a beacon light to others for the glory of God alone. "So let your light shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father Who is in heaven."

The Ethics of War

There is a deal of sound sense in a paper on "War" which Bernard Iddings Bell contributes to the November Atlantic. "Once upon a time," he first observes, "actions were said to be good or evil according as they helped or hindered the good of men and the glory of God. Nowadays impersonal things are said to be in themselves good or bad, no matter how they may be used." For instance the wide acceptance in our time of the fallacy that "dancing in itself must be utterly good" has led to "revivals of the most degenerating dances the world has ever seen." But the writer entertains the hope that "at some time men may come to the conclusion that dancing is neither good nor bad, being a non-personal and therefore a non-moral thing, but that the use of it may be either good or bad. This profound discovery will be simply a return to a point of view everywhere accepted in the despised Middle Ages."

Then coming to the real subject of his article Mr. Bell gives expression to such admirable opinions as these:

"This idea that all war is bad is due to the fact that men have lost their belief in principles, ideals, mad dreams, impossible hopes, as the most real things in life; while they have retained their belief in the very great reality and importance of material welfare. A religion is apt to be an unreal thing to most of us. But getting hurt or killed is still a very real thing to all of us. That a man should be killed in a war is plainly deplorable even to a man who has no dreams at all; but that it is glorious for a man to get killed for a cause which possesses him, is something which no puny materialist can ever understand. The difference between a murder and a martyrdom is comprehensible only to people with souls. In the back of its mind our age has a generally unavowed but nevertheless real sympathy for Christ upon the Cross, just because He was killed. We pity Him Crucified; our fathers adored Him."

The morality of a struggle, the writer reminds us, altogether depends on the motive of that struggle. The Mexican War for example we could well spare, but the Civil War we could hardly do without.

"Wars for territory or markets or that sort of thing, these are evil. Wars for religions, wars for theories, wars for mad dreams, these are right. What if in them men are killed and injured, wives left widows, children made fatherless? These things are not always unmixed disasters. Is not the heritage left a child by him who has lost his life for a noble cause of more value than either the caresses or the material wealth that the father might otherwise have given it? Is not the widow of a martyred hero made rich in the knowledge that she helped to make that hero? . . . There are things worse than death and better than life, and in our hearts, if not in our minds, we know it."

In the pacifist movement which is now being so actively propagated, there is much that all good men will heartily endorse. Mr. Bell's paper, however, is a good corrective for the unsound and fanatical views held by some of the movement promoters.

The cause of woman suffrage will not be promoted in this country by one of the methods Mrs. Pankhurst has adopted for propagating her doctrines and filling her purse. For no sooner was she admitted into the country than she had young girls selling the Suffragette, an imported paper in which Mr. Anthony Comstock found "pronounceably objectionable matter"; so the police stopped the sale of the paper, but not before numberless copies had been sold. The demand for the Suffragette was of course very great as soon as the nature of the contents became known. Those selling the paper were not arrested, but as the law inflicts a fine of $5,000 and five years' imprisonment, it is said, on those convicted of bringing immoral literature into the country, the situation could easily be made very uncomfortable for Mrs. Pankhurst.

A correspondent sends us a clipping from the New York Evening Sun of September 10 on the "Miracles of Lourdes" and asks dubitatively: "Is AMERICA afraid to notice this?"

In the first place if the inquiry means: "Is AMERICA afraid to defend the doctrines and practices of the Church?" the obvious answer is: AMERICA is not afraid to notice this, even, or rather especially, if it appears in the New York Evening Sun which is an honest and upright paper and on the most friendly terms with AMERICA. It does not resent criticism, but invites it and even revels in it; nor does it object to be taken to task for what is amiss in its utterances and to make amends.

Secondly, we frankly confess to a natural dislike "to notice" on November 10, an article which was written on September 10, especially as we have already done so in our issue of October 4, editorially and historically.

Evidently our correspondent does not read AMERICA carefully, if at all. But why should this communication be anonymous?

At a meeting in a Western city convened to protest against the "Ritual Murder Trial" now going on in Russia one of the very reverend gentlemen who addressed the audience said that a friend of his "a thinker and a philosopher" and of the cloth, objected to the definition: "Man is a rational animal." He thought "the more proper definition is that man is an animal capable of becoming rational."

Of course the speaker knew that such an utterance is philosophically and theologically vicious. He probably recalled it to emphasize his thought that one must be a creature without a soul, not to be filled with indignation at the attempt to fasten a stigma of infamy on an entire race.

LITERATURE

The City and the World and Other Stories. By FRANCIS CLEMENT KELLEY. Chicago: Extension Magazine. $1.50.

Dr. Kelley has gathered into this volume fourteen tales that originally appeared for the most part in Extension, the well-known missionary periodical of which he is the zealous editor. The lamented "Vicar-General" who was confronted at God's judgment seat by "the red men, the brown men, the yellow men and the black men" he should have helped to evangelize, and "The Resurrection of Alta," where one priest sowed in tears that another might reap in joy, are excellent stories, the best in the book; while "The Autobiography of a Dollar" and "The Unbroken Seal" are on more conventional lines. The author publishes the stories in permanent form in order that "what he considers the greatest cause in the world may win a few new friends." The appearance of the volume would be improved by the absence of several of the pictures, and its sale by halving the price. $1.50 is too much to ask for a story-book of only 155 pages.

Some Letters of William Vaughn Moody. Edited with an Introduction by DANIEL GREGORY MASON. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Co. $1.50.

Lovers of good literature will enjoy these letters. "He liberates the imagination with his prose," wrote one of Moody's friends, "as effectually as he does with his poetry. And then, besides, there is the luminous personality which emerges from every folded sheet, looking out with large veiled eyes." Most readers of this book will find those observations just. William Vaughn Moody, it may be well to explain, was an Indiana poet who died three years ago and left behind him many proofs that he really possessed the faculty divine. The letters in this volume were written chiefly to Daniel Gregory Mason, Mary L. Mason, Robert Morss Lovett and Josephine Preston Peabody, friends who were so dear to Moody that he called them "the principal thing," for "without them, or at least without the sense of them in the background," life, he said, would be but a Vale of Tears. The poet was poor and had to support himself by teaching. He did his work faithfully, though he found it intellectual drudgery. He was always longing for vacation that he might have leisure to compose poetry. "April is only eighty-eight lectures, forty committee meetings, and several thousand themes away," he writes hopefully. And again, "My heart leaps up when I behold a calendar on the sly." But he sadly declares, in another letter: "Fourteen consecutive months of hack teaching have left me in a state of spiritual beggary I never dreamed of. . . . The spirit of selection, the zest of appropriation is gone out of me."

Moody was a stern critic of his own verses. "I think you are not tolerant enough," he writes to defend this rigor, "of the instinct for conquest in language, the attempt to push out its boundaries, to win for it continually some new swift-ness, some rare compression, to distil from it a more opaline drop." "He loved to take pains," Mr. Mason bears testimony. "I especially remember the trick he had, in his rough drafts, of making endless substitutions of words, choosing first one and then another, striking out each in turn, and surmounting it with the next, until some of his lines looked like the pediments of ruined temples, with columns of words rising at irregular intervals to unequal heights."

Moody's literary modesty was refreshing. When R. W. Gilder was about to publish some verses in praise of "A New Poet, W. V. M.," Moody begged him to leave off the initials. "I have not yet reached a point," he explained, "in the practice of our divine art which entitles me to this sort of public recognition from a man like you." Nor was there anything mercenary about him. When his play, "The Great Divide," proved a success Moody was offered $50,000 if he would put the drama into the form of a novel. He refused, saying that "the turning of a play into a novel or vice versa was a confounding of two essentially diverse types of art, and therefore a violation of a basic artistic principle." Such loyalty to literary ideals is far from common in our drossy age. But William Vaughn Moody had the soul of a poet.

Anthony Comstock, Fighter. By CHARLES GALLAUDET TRUMBULL. New York: Fleming H. Revell Co. $1.25.

It must be rather wearing on the modesty of Mr. Comstock, who is still exceedingly alive, to read this biography, for all his virtues, as Mr. Trumbull sees them, smack of the heroic and human weaknesses has he none. But the book is an interesting story of all the good this sincere and fearless man has done during the past forty years by preventing the spread of immoral pictures and books and by bringing to justice corruptors of the young. Some idea of the noble work Mr. Comstock has accomplished since he has been Special Agent of the New York Society for the Suppression of Vice may be gathered from the following figures which his biographer furnishes: "He has destroyed something over fifty tons of vile books; 28,425 pounds of stereotype plates for printing such books; 3,984,063 obscene pictures; 16,000 negatives for printing such pictures; 3,646 persons have been arrested, and of these 2,682 have been convicted or pleaded guilty, and 2,180 have been sentenced." Owing to Mr. Comstock's unceasing vigilance, numberless children in our land have doubtless been safeguarded from moral degradation. This thought, we are told, is now the greatest comfort of his seventieth year, as indeed it may well be.

Watersprings. By ARTHUR CHRISTOPHER BENSON. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.50.

Many of those who read the literary output of this member of the industrious Benson family, whether the book is one of his numerous volumes of essays or, as here, a novel, must be tired, if they would only confess it, of his "wonderfully perfect style." The hack-reviewer, when writing a notice of this author's work, protests, of course, in words like these, that: "It is impossible in the short space at my disposal to do justice to this fascinating and stimulating book. . . . Once one has taken it up it is exceedingly difficult to lay it down. It cuts through shams and deep into the flesh of humanity. It has the stuff of life in it. And it possesses that rare thing, that elusive quality, charm." But do not even the warm admirers of Arthur C. Benson really grow a little sleepy after they have read several "characteristic" chapters written in the following style?

"The road entered a green valley among the downs. To the left, an outstanding bluff was crowned with the steep turfed bastions of an ancient fort, and as they went in among the hills, the slopes grew steeper, rich with hanging woods and copses," etc., etc. Or this: "When the thin bell died down, and the footsteps passed softly by, and the organ uttered its melodious voice as the white-robed procession moved slowly in, Howard could see," etc. Almost every noun, it will be observed, has its qualifying adjective and words full of liquids abound. Such passages can be found on almost every page of his books. Whatever else Arthur C. Benson's style may be, strong and virile it certainly is not.

"Watersprings" is the story of Howard Kenedy, a Cambridge Don, who successfully woos a maiden half his age, the sister of one of his pupils. Mr. Kenedy also has a rich aunt, who is to leave him her property, and with whom he agrees meanwhile that "ecclesiastical religion" is the bane of true Christianity. There are good chapters in the book about university life, but the average reader's interest will often flag before the 369, and last page of the novel is reached. W. D.

De Curia Romana Juxta Reformationem a Pio X Sapientissime Inductam. Auctore FELIX M. CAPPELLO. Volumina Duo. Neo-Eboraci: F. Pustet. $3.50.

In the course of this work the term Roman Curia is taken in its ordinary meaning to designate that body or collection of persons, such as cardinals, prelates, etc., who from the place of residence of the Roman Pontiff assist him in the administration of the Universal Church. The author takes into consideration all the reforms that the reigning Pope has introduced into the Roman Curia by his two constitutions, Sapienti Consilio of June 29, 1908, and Vacante Sede Apostolica of December 25, 1904. The former deals with the prerogatives of the Roman Curia during the life of the Roman Pontiff (sede plena), the latter defines its prerogatives while the Roman See is vacant (sede vacante). Accordingly, the work is divided into two volumes.

In the first, after a short introduction bearing on the College of Cardinals, who are the chief officials of the Roman Curia, the author gives a general idea of the Roman Congregations and furnishes several practical points concerning the method to be followed in having recourse to the Roman officials, such as the language to be used, the form in which petitions and letters should be drawn up, the addresses of the various offices. Having given these points of general information, the author treats separately of all the organs of the Roman Curia, whether they be Congregations, Tribunals or Offices properly so called. Each article opens with a brief history of the department of which it treats, together with an explanation of its object; a clear exposition of its competency and constitution follows; then a series of questions is discussed, the object of which is either to elucidate some point of canon law that one must have in mind in dealing with that department or to explain more fully its competency and powers. The article closes with a set of formulas for practical use. An appendix of cases on the competency of the Roman Congregations and Tribunals closes this first volume which cannot fail to prove of incalculable service to bishops and priests who by reason of their office, or owing to other circumstances, are obliged to deal with the Roman Curia.

The second volume has two parts. In the first, after having summed up the teaching of theologians on the dogmatic questions touching vacancies of the Holy See, such as that of resignation, deposition or doubtful election, the author gives a clear idea of the power of cardinals and other Roman officials while the See is vacant, always contrasting the new with the old law and thus setting forth whatever changes have been wisely introduced by the present Pontiff. The second part is devoted entirely to the exposition of the laws governing the election of the Pope. Here again the author begins with stating the teaching of theologians and canonists on the law of succession, after which he gives a brief historical review of elections of Popes in the past; explains fully the present discipline on this point, with a special chapter on the "Exclusiva" or "Veto" from its first origin to its legal abolition by the present Pontiff, and ends with an exposition of the acts and ceremonies that follow the election.

Besides commending the order and clearness of Father Cappello's work, we must especially praise the extensive bibliography with which he supplies the reader before each treatise. We would mention in particular the bibliography on the following subjects: The Church and Its Authority (I, 1); The Roman Pontiff (I, 13); Approval and Promulgation of the Acts of the Roman Congregations (I, 53); The Holy Office (I, 57); Whether the Roman Pontiff can Elect His Successor (II, 185); The Origin of the "Veto" (II, 491). The Man with the Iron Hand. By JOHN CARL PARISH. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Company. $1.25.

The title of this book is not figurative. The hand was really of iron and belonged to Tonty, the devoted friend of the adventurous but unfortunate La Salle. He had lost his hand of flesh in battle in Europe, but its metal substitute often did fearful execution upon the heads of troublesome Indians.

The story is, in great part at least, of absorbing interest, for although the many battles of unknown Indian tribes cause the readers' attention to flag at times, yet the narrative becomes very dramatic when the notable men of that period cross its pages. Their meeting place is chiefly on the rock of Kaskaskia, where La Salle had established the famous fort that was to dominate the whole Mississippi Valley. There comes Hennepin with his haughty swagger,—evidently the writer cares little for him, and rightly so. Allouez is there also but so nervously afraid of seeing La Salle face to face that he decamps at the first announcement of La Salle's arrival; a picture we think that is scarcely in keeping with the character of the valiant Allouez. He had many reasons for not meeting La Salle but they were not prompted by fear. La Salle's brother the Abbé Cavalier wanders up from the Gulf and hurries off to Canada saying not a word of the horrible tragedy which had occurred. Why he held his peace is a mystery. In brief the narrative is a continually moving panorama filled with great personages and events. The chapter that tells the story of La Salle's wanderings in his search for the mouth of the Mississippi which he unaccountably missed by 400 miles,—showing what an unscientific explorer he was,—followed soon after by his brutal murder at the hands of his own men whom he never could control, is well worth reading. If the other volumes of the series equal the story of "The Man with the Iron Hand," they are sure to be welcomed.

We have received from Benziger Bros. some specimens of their new "Standard Fifty Cent Library." The half a hundred volumes listed include religious works like Cochem's "Life of Christ," and Tesnière's "Adoration of the Blessed Sacrament," and such Catholic novels as "Dion and the Sibyls," and "The Heiress of Cronenstein." But "Agatha's Hard Saying," which is also in the collection, was called by AMERICA's reviewer "a total abstinence story for non-Catholics, as all the characters are Protestants and none but natural motives are appealed to." The books are well made up.

"Modern American Speeches" is the title of a text-book issued by Longmans, Green & Co., and edited with notes and biographical introductions by L. W. Boardman, A.M. The speeches are, "True Americanism," by Carl Schurz; "The New South," by Henry Grady; "America's Love of Peace," by John Hay; and "The Pan-American Spirit," by Elihu Root. They are well chosen, particularly the first three, and the selections from Schurz and Grady bid fair to remain classics in American literature. The notes are pertinent and the biographies, though more eulogistic than the facts always warrant, are pithy and informative. The story that the British Premier, influenced by Hay, told the Continental ministers, that he would join in a demonstration off Cuba not with them but with the United States, is founded on gossip, not history. But the book is a useful addition to our text-books, and the price, 60 cents, is moderate.

"Lincoln and Slavery," by Albert E. Pillsbury (Houghton Mifflin Co.) is an admirable study in 100 pages of the gradual evolution of Lincoln's views on the slavery question, and its relation to what was to him a larger question, the maintenance of the Union of the United States. Mr. Pillsbury traces Lincoln's utterances, acts and policies for two decades with the purpose of showing that the abolition of slavery outweighed in his mind the saving of the Union. In this we think he is wrong and at variance with Lincoln's own utterances, but he wrenches no text, cites his hero appositely, and gives incidentally, an admirable picture of his character, and a good outline of the period. The price, 75 cents, would be deemed excessive south of the Mason-Dixon line.

Francis Jenkins Olcott has selected and arranged a volume of "Story-Telling Poems" for children to hear or to read themselves. Under such headings as "Deeds of Right and Wrong," "Jolly Rhymes and Poems," "Sacred Stories and Legends," etc., the compiler gathers a quantity of narrative poems that are likely to interest children. As the selections are grouped so that they can be used with ease in the class rooms of grades one to eight, many are of no greater literary value than Watts's "'Tis the Voice of the Sluggard," but great care has been taken to make the anthology unobjectionable on moral or religious grounds. The Catholic teacher will find it useful. The indexes are excellent. Houghton, Mifflin Co. $1.25.

From England comes the news that a canny poultry farmer of Orpington has wonderfully increased his hens' egg-producing capacity simply by fitting out the hen house with electric lights. He discovered, it seems, that the main reason why fewer eggs are laid in winter than in summer is because the former season's days are so short. As the common, necessary hen is a joyful lover of light, she is busiest when the sunshine hours are longest. So what did this resourceful poultry-man do but make summer perpetual in his hennery. By a clever arrangement and regulation of electric lights he produces an early sunrise and a late sunset for his hens the whole winter through, and this increases their annual output of eggs, it is reported, 30 or 40 per cent. Whether this extraordinary industry of the fowls is properly rewarded, or whether it brings old age on them prematurely, we are not informed. However, the whole matter might well be examined by the labor unions, or by the Orpington S. P. C. A., if one there is, or the affair might even be made the subject of a parliamentary investigation, if it comes to that. But let us hope it need not come to that.

That literary Protestants, Modernists, and Atheists, would kindly let St. Francis of Assisi alone and cease giving us their fantastic and distorted "portraits" of him, should be the fervent prayer of all his clients. The latest injury done the Poverello is at the hands of J. A. Peladan, whose "St. Francis of Assisi, a Play in Five Acts," Harold John Massingham has translated and adapted. Some idea of the drama's character may be had from the first act, when St. Francis and St. Clare are represented as ardent lovers; from the third act, when Clare, his sweetheart still, takes the veil just to be near him; and from the last act, when St. Francis dies in her arms. The author's portrayal of the two Saints is as gross as it is unhistorical. There are beautiful pages in the book, and the translation has been well done, but the play is full of passages that would be very offensive to Catholics. The life of St. Francis of Assisi is rich in dramatic material, but no one can handle it properly except a gifted Catholic author. There are some typographical errors in this book, e. g., ecco for ecce.

"When alienists view with unconcealed alarm the deterioration of the secular magazine," writes Father Finn in the St. Xavier Calendar for November, "when they tell us that the danger to our present generation of boys and girls is a horrible danger, when they show that the matter and manner of the Cosmopolitan and its like pollute morals at their source, it is time for us Catholics to ask ourselves what we are to do in the face of this prospective calamity. The answer, in the light of our surroundings, would seem to be obvious. First: We must banish from our homes the prurient and pagan magazines. Second: We must exercise more care in admitting certain Sunday papers. Third: We must supply the places of these banished magazines with first-class Catholic periodicals." As suitable for that purpose he recommends the well-known Catholic magazines published in this country, observing in the course of his comments:

"To readers of taste and intelligence, AMERICA appeals strongly. It may be said that all the leading Catholics of the United States are its readers." It were false modesty in us to demur to this.

Father Robert Kane, S.J., preaching in London, said of Canon Sheehan, that when his great fame brought him money from the publishers it disappeared in charity of which no one knew from what hand it came. He had arranged that the profits from his books should be sent to his bishop to be distributed amongst the poor. "Canon Sheehan," he added, "accomplished a work like which there was nothing either in this century or the last. He had transformed the ideal of literature, and shown that fiction can be pure and noble, innocent and reverent, and without one idea unworthy of an angel or of a child. He had given to the world the true ideal of the Irish priest, so human and simple, yet withal vested with the great powers which marked him as the anointed of Christ."

THE DRAMA

Interest in theatres has flagged for a brief spell because the public were watching with amazement, and amusement, and disgust, the political drama that was being enacted. Now that the thumbs have been reversed and the slain carried out on their inglorious shields, the people who are always eager for thrills will turn again to the baser spectacles at the footlights. Meantime, preparations have been feverishly going on for these performances, and in one of them our friend Canon Hannay figures. Thus we are told that "to insure the local color for the last act of the production of 'General John Regan,' which the Liebler Company will make at the Hudson Theatre on November 10, the stage director was obliged to spend the day at Ellis Island.

"The result was that they secured forty Irish men, women and children who had come to the promised land with no idea of finding their fortunes on the Great White Way. None of these people have ever been in the United States before and none of them have ever been on the stage."

This is deplorable. It is bad enough for a clergyman of the disestablished Church of Ireland to be employing his talents in the Great White Way, but it is an outrage to take innocent young girls and women and boys who were never before out of their native villages and who were brought up in purity and piety and fling them into intimate association with certain men and women who tread the stage on Broadway and elsewhere. We trust that the Commissioner of Emigration or the priests and agents who watch over the helpless emigrants have prevented this slaughter of the innocents. It is singular that the clerical playwright, himself, did not protest.

On the other hand, it is gratifying to hear that the movement for clean plays is making at least some progress. Thus it was announced that Jane Cowl and John Barrymore were to appear in "The Guilty Man," that atrocious sociological drama which has been already presented under the auspices of the Medical Review of Reviews and which was so severely dealt with that it had to be recast, and carefully expurgated. As some people have a singular conception of what "expurgation" implies, it was heard with regret that distinguished actors, such as those named above, were to give it their support. Hence it was a great relief to hear a few days later that both John Barrymore and Miss Cowl had withdrawn from the cast. On the same day notice was given that "Tangled Lives," which was to have been produced at the Park Theatre was "called off," because, in the opinion of Mr. Frazee, and no doubt of many others, the piece would offend public decency. Following the announcement the entire company, numbering twenty-five, was disbanded.

The indignation of actors themselves, especially if they are anyway prominent, makes it sufficiently clear that they have the situation in their hands if they wish to make use of the opportunity of keeping their self respect and not allowing their profession to be a synonym of depravity. Perhaps that is the import of what occurred in Paris a short time ago, when a group of young artists and literary men started a movement to revive the ancient classic drama of France, England, Italy and Spain. The plays of Ben Jonson, Marlowe, Lope de Vega, Calderon Camoens and others, will be presented. The three last named, are safe enough, but there are some plays of Jonson and Marlowe that will call for deep excisions.

A similar indication of a change in public opinion was also shown by the meeting of 300 members of the Drama League in the Montauk Theatre in Brooklyn, who came together to discuss: "What is fit for the Stage." Prominent dramatic critics took part in the debate and J. S. Metcalf, the dramatic critic of Life, sent the following letter:

"The time when the theatre confined itself to beauty, to sentiment, to romance, to stirring deeds of villainy and heroism, and to the creation of honest merriment seems to have passed. In common with poetry, fiction, and illustrative art it appears to have become educational by dissecting and depicting our fashionable and less distinguished vices, and the more vividly and strikingly this is done the stronger the appeal. All this may be only temporary, a sign of the unrest and change of our period due to the tremendous alterations in the conditions of human living. But before you determine what shall and shall not go on our stages it may be well to seek what has caused the need for such a determination and also to decide at the same time what shall go into our newspapers, our periodicals, our books, our illustrations, and other media of entertainment and information, that are even more accessible than the theatre. You may even have to determine what are fit and what are unfit subjects of discussion in mixed assemblages."

We agree with these views heartily, but with regard to deciding what is to go into papers and magazines we suggest that the good work might be inaugurated in the pages of Life itself, which is often most objectionable in the subjects it discusses, as well as in the manner in which it treats them and the illustrations in which it misuses great artistic ability.

Possibly if respectable actors and playwrights and decent people would all unite, we might witness something like what occurred in the National Theatre in Rome on October 22, when a play partly written by the notorious ex-Crown Princess Louise, the music being composed by her alleged husband Signor Toselli, was hissed off the stage. The whole audience rose to its feet and derisive epithets, yells and hisses turned the theatre into a pandemonium.

The readers of AMERICA will remember that in our issue of October 18 we criticized, at the suggestion of one of our subscribers, an offensive scene in the operetta known as "Sweethearts;" or rather it was the subscriber who had criticized it, and we based our strictures on the communication sent to us by the Manager who protested that the condemnation was unjust. At his suggestion a member of AMERICA's staff, a layman it is needless to say, and one qualified by many years' experience as a newspaper man, sat out the operetta and fully endorsed the objections. At the end of the second act he saw, as reported, four of the "comic" characters dressed as monks, who acted an entire scene of vulgar buffoonery, quite unbecoming the garb they wore. Mr. Victor Herbert added to the insult by making the quartette they sang a travesty of church music. The whole scene had no relevancy whatever, to the operetta itself, and could have been easily omitted without making what had been, up to that, very dainty and pleasing, a very vulgar and insulting performance. It goes to show what a single person can do who is not afraid to voice his opinion of plays which he is invited to patronize.

In his recent work "The Wallet of Time," Mr. William Winter, the venerable dramatic critic, writes as follows about the deplorable state of the American stage:

"Degeneracy in the drama is not a modern movement. It is notable, however, that from the time when Pinero's play of 'The Second Mrs. Tanqueray' was launched upon our stage, the dramatic current has been running steadily and with renewed force toward a literal, brazen, shameless portrayal of depraved persons, iniquitous conduct, and vile social conditions."

The book was finished before this fall's theatrical abominations were presented, but Mr. Winter has this to say about the so-called "moral lessons" of such plays:

"No spectator was ever benefited by the contemplation of them, and they have done much injury by arousing in the minds of many persons, of both sexes, and especially the young, a morbid, baneful inquisitiveness as to the lives and relationships of rakes and wantons. They naturally tend to propel the imagination toward iniquities and monstrosities; to fill the mind with images of lewd, immoral character, and pictures of licentious conduct; to depress the intellect and sadden the heart with an almost despairing sense of human frailty and wickedness, without inspiring even one suggestion of practical palliative value."

In another passage he reminds the reader that:

"The theatrical audience is composed largely of young persons, many of them girls, at an age when they are exceptionally sensitive to impressions. It is not prudishness; it is knowledge of the world and common sense that would bar anything and everything tending to cause and promote indiscriminate notice and discussion among young persons, or in a promiscuous assemblage (such as always convenes in a theatre,) of such themes as 'the social evil,' and its consequences. No right-minded, well-bred person introduces an indelicate, not to say foul subject for conversation in a drawing room. The introduction of such a subject would be considered—and justly so—an insult; and there is no more justification for insulting people in a theatre than there would be for insulting them in a parlor. The public does not attend the theatre for the purpose of obtaining information and 'views' about evil, its cause or its cure. The notion that social evils can be corrected by writing about them is little better than idiotic."

Regarding that well known scene in the opera "Les Huguenots" where the Cardinal of Lorraine is shown bestowing the Church's blessing on the daggers intended for use in the massacre of St. Bartholomew's day, Mr. Robert P. Green writes as follows to the New York Times:

"In a book, 'Two and Two Make Four,' written by the learned Bird S. Coler, ex-Controller of this city, the matter is fully explained. The revolutionary poet, Chenier, in his 'Charles IX,' dealing with the same theme, was the first to besmirch the scarlet robe of the Cardinal in this manner, but in a footnote he explicitly states that his Eminence was in Rome at the time of the event, and that no such scene ever took place, as, indeed, how could it? So much is said these days about church unity that perhaps opera lovers and managers of any and all creeds will unite in requiring the restoration of the footnote of Chenier to the libretto and programme of the opera, since Meyerbeer based his work on Chenier's. There is no reason," says Mr. Green in conclusion, "why it should not be done this very season."

None whatever—except the obstinate persistency of the old Protestant tradition which pervades even the operatic stage.

EDUCATION

Dr. Brown, of the University of New York, on College Courses—Trenton Rejects "Sex Hygiene" in Public School Teaching—Protestant Episcopal Bishops on Religion in Education

One of the latest suggestions made for a modification of the manner of training long held in honor among college men is that proposed by President Brown of New York University. His plan does not involve so complete a departure from the old methods and standards as does that sought by a majority of the defenders of the "immediately useful" in education. The ancient theory that the ideal aim of the college is to develop the intellect and character of the student by high and generally abstract study, is not rejected by Dr. Brown. He willingly admits the purpose sought in a college course to be the awakening of an intelligent appreciation of the capacity and scope of the fine mental attributes Godgiven to man, in order later to turn these powers to excellent use in preparation for the specific occupation the student may select as his life task.

In an interesting paper, contributed a while ago to the magazine section of the New York Sunday Times, Dr. Brown pleads only for a certain change in the carrying out of this theory because of what, for lack of a better name, he calls "dilettantism" in American college life. He describes the term as signifying "the softening of the mental and moral fibre because of lack of vigorous and profitable effort,"—most of us would say because of a lack of earnest, studious habits. He couples this lack with "the almost unavoidable and very serious evil of a mistaken and petty view of what can and must be done in after life by the young men and women who pass the most important years of their early life in college." President Brown's remedy is a compromise, a sort of via media, which concedes something to the modern vocational idea holding "the practical and immediately useful" to be the sole criterion in education, whilst, in a certain measure, it holds fast to the original notion that the particular must be ever less than the general and that the relation of technical to liberal studies is subordinate not co-ordinate.

He would introduce with the junior year in college enough specific training for an occupation to arouse, concentrate and maintain the mental capacity by that time likely to have been consciously realized. This is not an entirely new suggestion, however, since the plan is being practically followed in many institutions to-day, where young men, whilst still in college and working for a college degree, are permitted to take up and to follow certain courses properly included in the requirements of a professional school. Is the wider introduction of the plan to be commended?

Dr. Brown finds sufficient reason for his modification of the old program of strictly liberal studies during the college years, in conditions which he affirms to be fairly general. The old theory of the college course, he believes, can "rightly be applied only to a carefully and severely selected body of students, and can be applied successfully to them only by highly gifted instructors working in close relation with a number of students not too large." He contends, moreover, that neither of these conditions is met by colleges to-day as a whole. He proves this contention by the prevalent lack of provision for the adequate selection of college students; by the generally admitted fact that no adequate test of earnestness or of capability on the part of students is applied after these have been received into college classes; and as a fairly common rule no adequate arrangement is made for competent instructors able and willing to assume the difficult task of intimate and fruitful guidance of pupils. "It is generally true," says an editorial writer in the Times commenting on Dr. Brown's views, "of all American colleges that a boy or girl can enter them and graduate from them with a degree of actual acquisition and of actual effort far below what will surely be needed, and needed at once, when any of the occupations requiring education shall be taken up."

While it may be questioned whether this general statement regarding our colleges is entirely true, the present writer has no intention to enter into controversy over Dr. Brown's portrayal of conditions claimed actually to exist. But is it right to advocate the need of modification in the old noble ideal of general culture, simply because the imperative conditions for its attainment are found generally to be lacking in so-called colleges? Does not the defect of these necessary conditions rather prove a deplorable looseness in present-day educational methods, which itself ought to be corrected and reformed, rather than have it accepted as a sufficient reason for a further departure from the high ideals which the world's ablest minds have loved to inspire and to foster? If the kind of training required to produce the class of cultured men and women college work is meant to form, cannot be given to the very large number who crowd the so-called colleges of to-day because these are mentally unfit to realize its need and its worth, were it not a more praiseworthy aim to improve the conditions creating this impossibility rather than to aid the further propagation of the fundamentally unintelligent movement for the imposition of the "practical and the immediately useful" in every phase of educational activity?

The trouble lies deeper than Dr. Brown would have us believe. It is rather an outgrowth of that foolish faith, so common in our age, in the power of mere book learning, which has led the multitude to hold culture to rest in an accumulation of accomplishments rather than to recognize it to be, what it is in reality "a contest of the spiritual life with an opposite and seemingly hostile world." Instead of allowing themselves to be allured into compromises it behooves all lovers of true education to make relentless war upon the superficial, petty and unspiritual tendencies so markedly in evidence among us; to hold to the value of disinterested truth and knowledge, of "wisdom and understanding," whose price "is above rubies," in opposition to the ever growing demands of empty, practical culture with its brutalizing comfort and ease and its heartless civilization.

It is largely because of the commercialization of education, another unfortunate accompaniment of the new methods, that conditions described in Dr. Brown's paper as existent in his own and many other colleges have come to be. The inordinate desire to attract numbers rather than to safeguard quality now common among the heads of schools is gradually introducing ideals destructive of the ancient reverence for liberal studies. The cure is a simple one. Do not permit the bars to be let down; hold fast to the old standards, and if young men and women are found unfit to follow what these demand, let them be excluded from college courses. It is, after all, a fundamentally false notion that the enormous mass of students who in this country are being educated wholly or partially at public expense or by the use of generous gifts should, every one of them, be pushed through a college training.

Two items chronicled in the New York papers of October 26 merit a place in this column. The first tells us that Charles P. Taylor, President of the New Jersey State Federation of District Boards of Education, at a meeting of that body in Trenton declared the public school not to be the place in which to teach sex hygiene. Affirming that the necessary information on the subject should be given by parents, he added that educational leaders were making a mistake in trying to relieve parents of this responsibility.

The second is contained in a paragraph needing no comment, which we quote from the general letter published by the Episcopal body of the Protestant Episcopal church, recently gathered here in general convention.

"Here, then, we must insist upon giving education its full definition. The noblest faculty of the human being is the capacity of knowing and realizing the presence of God. The General Convention, therefore, has enlarged the scope of the General Board of Religious Education in order that all the educational work of the Church in Sunday schools, in primary and secondary schools, and institutions of higher learning may be more effectively organized and more directly brought to the attention of the people of the Church. The foundation of our hope for the future of this country, of the Church, and of the nation is the Christian education of our children.

"The trouble with much of our education to-day is that it is without coherence. What is needed is for our prominent educational institutions boldly to proclaim in theory and in practice that God, manifested in Christ, is the source and end of all knowledge; that Christian creed and life are not an adjunct tacked on to a system of intellectual training, but a foundation without which all learning is baseless and ephemeral."

The trouble, too, one may suggest, is that, holding to these excellent principles in regard to education, there is so little done to carry out the theory in practice.

ECONOMICS

Banks and Savings Banks

The function of the bank is to facilitate exchange. If A keeps a large balance to his credit he does so because he wishes to be able to pay conveniently and promptly such large sums as his business requires. If he has more money than is necessary for this, he does not leave it in the bank, but draws it out and invests it. If B discounts a lot of trade bills, he does so to get the money he needs to pay his creditors and renew his stock. If C sells bills drawn on London against bills of lading and invoices, it is to get the value of his goods more quickly so as to be able to repeat the transactions belonging to his line of trade. In its operations the bank is not restricted to its capital. It has its commercial deposits and can count on these maintaining a certain average week after week. Hence it can use a certain proportion of these with safety. Thus it enables money to be turned over very frequently, and so makes a capital, smaller than would otherwise be needful, serve the community efficiently. By multiplying operations of which each brings in a very small profit, it is able at the end of the year to declare a handsome dividend.

The function of the savings bank is quite different. It collects the small savings of the poor and invests them so as to get for its depositors a reasonable interest. If A has $100 he may lend it to B at any interest he pleases; but it will not be so easy to get good security. The chances are therefore that should he so lend it he may get 15 or 20 per cent. two or three times, and then lose the principal. But if twenty people with $100 each put their money into an agent's hands, he will be able to lend the $2,000 on a safe mortgage that will make their principal secure and return them an interest of 4 or 5 per cent.

Hence, while the deposits in a bank are of their nature temporary, those in a savings bank are of their nature permanent. A commercial banker could not pretend to a right to notice of withdrawal. A savings bank has not only the right but the obligation to demand such a notice. It may keep in hand a sum necessary to meet ordinary calls. It may invest a certain reserve in Government bonds returning a small interest, and saleable, though perhaps at a loss, should there be an extraordinary demand. But the savings bank's business is to make long loans, the usual security being real estate, consequently, it cannot pretend, no matter how sound its position, to pay off a large number of depositors on the spur of the moment.

The commercial banker's operations are shorter in their terms. Thirty or sixty day bills are maturing every day. He may have advanced money on call, either by way of call loan or overdrafts, and the security for such advances, merchandise in bond, or en route, can be turned into cash immediately. Hence a sound bank is expected to be ready to meet somewhat exorbitant demands at any moment.

As for money obtained from a bank, it is clear that it goes into the borrower's business, under normal conditions: that obtained from a savings bank does not. Indeed, when a man mortgages his house to keep his business going, he is not very far from bankruptcy, as things go ordinarily. Still there are exceptions. A man may raise money on mortgage to begin a new business. It is a risky speculation, but it is done. Nevertheless the normal savings bank business is with people who, having an income, wish to invest the surplus in real estate, and so raise the means by a mortgage which they pay off gradually, or with others who wish to improve their property and to pay for the improvements out of the rents, etc., they produce. It has therefore, been long held as a maxim that bank and savings-bank should keep each to its own field.

Lately there has been a change, and large banks have opened savings-bank departments. It may be that the commercial department and the savings are kept rigidly apart, so that they are really two distinct institutions. We fear, however, that such is not the case, the more so, as no keeping apart of the departments would release one from responsibility for the debts of the other, so long as they are departments of the one institution. A savings-bank department attached to a bank means, that the savings-bank is departing from its function as an investor of the people's savings in long loans on first-class security, to put these savings into commercial operations; or else that the bank is abandoning its functions to lend long loans on real estate. What would be thought of a savings-bank that turned over its deposits to a commercial bank at a low rate of interest without any other security than that of the bank's general standing? Or what would be thought of a commercial bank that put out its deposits in long loans on real estate. Yet it is to be feared that this is more or less what takes place when a bank starts a savings-bank department.

Another point is worthy of consideration. The motive for the opening of a savings-bank department may be a great demand for money on the commercial side. This means the disturbing of equilibrium. If there is a healthy demand for money in trade, there should be the same for funds for the improvement of property, especially in a new country. To take this for trade is to favor over trading, which invariably brings its penalty. It must be remembered too, that when hard times come, no one is so exacting as the savings-bank depositor. Business men understand that they and the banks stand or fall together, and there is reasonable forbearance on both sides. The savings-bank depositor knows only: "I have put my money in and I want it out." If the savings-bank depositor breaks his own bank he is on the whole the chief sufferer: if it be in his power to break the commercial bank, the whole commercial community must go to ruin.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

To commemorate the 350th anniversary of the foundation of the Sodality of the Blessed Virgin a Sodality Congress was held at St. Francis Xavier's College, this city, on November 1 and 2, and attended by delegates from the various Sodalities attached to Jesuit colleges and churches throughout the East. The meetings on November 1 were confined to Sodality Directors and a number of papers relating to Sodality topics were read and discussed. On November 2d, religious exercises were held in St. Francis Xavier's church, to fitly commemorate the event and to honor the Blessed Virgin. There was a solemn high Mass, the sermon at which was preached by Rev. William J. Ennis, S.J. In the evening Solemn Vespers were sung, followed by a sermon and Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament, the Rev. Charles W. Lyons, S.J., being the preacher. His Eminence Cardinal Farley presided at the ceremony. The Golden Jubilee of the Xavier Alumni Sodality of this city will be commemorated by a three days' celebration on December 7, 8 and 9. On the first day there will be Communion Mass and breakfast for the members, and in the evening Solemn Vespers, his Eminence, Cardinal Farley presiding. A public meeting with speeches and a special musical program will be held in the college theatre on the second evening, and on the third there will be a banquet at the Plaza Hotel.

"The Bishop of London," says the London Universe, "is one of the most puzzling characters in the English Church. He is a branchite. He calls himself a Catholic—an English Catholic. He has been called a pseudo-bishop, even in England. But let that pass. He objects to the 'Roman' bishops in England. But if he is an English bishop, with an English jurisdiction, what is he doing in Stockholm dedicating a church to St. Peter and St. Sigfried? On his way home he is dedicating another 'English' church in Catholic Belgium. Truly, the roaming of this English, London, Rome-excluding, branchite bishop, with a universal jurisdiction, is one of the funniest things of a funny theory. He reminds us of the pseudo-archbishop who carried his crozier in procession in Moscow!"

The Rev. E. Francotte, S.J., whose golden jubilee as a religious was celebrated on October 8, in Calcutta, India, is an example of a numerous class of missionaries whose claim to distinction is a life-long devotion to the cause of religion and science in the comparative obscurity of the class-room. Father Francotte, we learn from the Catholic Herald of India, landed in Calcutta in December, 1869, and for thirty-nine years has been connected with the College of St. Xavier's. The many pupils who have come under his instruction remember him as constantly improving the chemical laboratory and making it worthy of a first-class college. For thirty years he has been an indefatigable chronicler of the meteorological observations, and he is now engaged in preparing for publication in book-form the story of the Meteorological Observatory of St. Xavier's for the last forty-six years.

The fiftieth anniversary of the religious profession of four Presentation Nuns was observed at the Presentation Convent in San Francisco on October 19. Sister Mary Aloysius Kenniff, Sister Mary Vincent Kelleher, Sister Mary Paul Griffin and Sister Mary Ignatius O'Sullivan were among the first pupils of the Order of Presentation in California, and have labored there many years among the little ones of Christ.

A still more remarkable celebration was that of the golden jubilee of Mother Dominic and Sisters Dominic and Vincentia, three Sisters of Mercy, who were also sisters in blood, at the Mercy Convent at Fort Smith, Ark., on September 24. The Holy Father sent a cablegram bearing his congratulations and blessing. The jubilarians entered the Sisterhood at Helena, Ark., fifty-four years ago and after four years of training were admitted to their vows. They were nurses during the civil war.

The Nursing Sisters of the Little Company of Mary are shortly to establish a branch of their Order in Christchurch, capital of the provincial district of Canterbury, New Zealand. We learn from the New Zealand Tablet that their foundress was Mother Mary Potter, who died in Rome only eight months ago. It was in 1877 that she with five companions received the habit from Dr. Bagshawe, Bishop of Nottingham, under whose sanction the Order was established. At the invitation of the Pope a hospital was opened on the Cælian Hill, in Rome, and became the mother house, and a home for convalescents. The Convent of San Girolamo, was established a few years later near Fiesole.

In 1885 six Sisters embarked for Australia. Before the close of 1890 they had built a convent and hospital at Lewisham, a hospital for the insane at Ryde, and another institution in Adelaide. The hospital at Lewisham is said to be one of the finest and best equipped hospitals in the world. To-day the Sisterhood is doing good work in Ireland, Malta, South Africa, in the Archdiocese of Chicago and in Argentina.

The Dominican Sisters of St. Mary's, Cape Town, celebrated in September the golden jubilee of their foundation, which, the Catholic Magazine for South Africa says, was the first foundation in the Cape or in any part of the Union. It would be impossible to speak too highly of the great work the Sisters have done for South Africa. They were the pioneers of education for girls, and set out for their field of labor at a time when it required no ordinary courage to face the long journey and the unknown land. The first Vicar Apostolic of the Cape, Dr. Raymond Griffiths, was a Dominican, which no doubt prompted his choice of this pious Congregation. Of all the pioneers, Mother M. Borgia MacDonnell is the sole survivor.

CHRONICLE

November Elections.—The contest for State and municipal offices in New York resulted in a sweeping victory for the Fusion forces. John Purroy Mitchel, Collector of the Port, was elected Mayor of New York by a plurality of 121,000. The new chief magistrate of the city will have patronage at his disposal in 250 commissionships and other offices in the administration, the payroll of which amounts to more than $1,000,000 a year. The rout of the Tammany ticket was complete. In other parts of the country the Democrats suffered no significant reverses, and the results are generally interpreted as an endorsement of the Wilson Administration. In Maryland the Democrats will have a majority of three-fifths in the Senate and more than that in the House of Delegates, while they have elected Blair Lee to the Senate, following a campaign in which national issues were paramount. In New Jersey, James F. Fielder, President Wilson's candidate for Governor, carried the State by a plurality of 33,000. This, too, in a State where a faction of the party went bodily over to the Republican candidate and exhausted every resource to discount the popularity of the President in his own State. David I. Walsh, by the largest vote ever cast for a Democratic candidate, was elected Governor of Massachusetts, in spite of the defection of Governor Foss and regardless of the latter's bitter attack upon the tariff policy of the Democratic party. In minor elections, such as those for Mayor, the Democrats have generally been successful. For instance, Newton D. Baker, the Tom Johnson Mayor of Cleveland, was reelected over his Republican opponent, Davis, and Indianapolis gave its votes to a Democrat, Joseph E. Bell, who defeated a Progressive and a Republican. Cincinnati, however, elected a Republican for mayor by a plurality of about 3,000 over the present incumbent, a Democrat.

According to the New York Sun, "the indications are that the interest of the present Federal Administration in the political affairs of Greater New York is going to continue to be both direct and potent."

Mexico.—The American press gave general circulation to the report that what amounts to an ultimatum was served on President Huerta on November 2 by Nelson O'Shaughnessy, American Chargé d'Affaires, acting on instructions from the State Department at Washington. According to the report President Wilson's demands, as conveyed to President Huerta, were that the latter must no longer retain the Presidency of Mexico, that he must resign without delay, and refrain from any action which would place in the Executive chair any of his followers or family. General Blanquet was debarred from the Presidency by Mr. Wilson's communication, as was every man on whom General Huerta might desire to bestow the mantle of power. Formal statements were promptly made by Secretary Bryan and Mr. O'Shaughnessy that no "ultimatum" had been delivered to President Huerta by this Government. According to the New York Times, Mr. Bryan was plainly provoked over the "ultimatum order." The Secretary intimated that it had been instigated from elsewhere than Mexico City, and said that investigations of previous news despatches, dated London, had indicated that they were in reality put out in this country. For the circulation of the rumor regarding the ultimatum order the New York Times editorially holds Secretary Bryan responsible. The reports were not published until every effort had been made to verify them.

"They were placed before the Secretary of State by all the correspondents in Washington. He refused to speak. . . . It was in Mr. Bryan's power to suppress the reports, but he chose not to speak until they had been printed in all the morning newspapers and most of the evening newspapers as well. No Foreign Office in Europe would be guilty of such an action." To prevent any further misrepresentations of President Wilson's handling of the Mexican situation, Secretary Bryan sent a note to Great Britain and other foreign powers, promising that no move of importance would be made by the United States without giving the Foreign Powers most concerned advance information.

Harvester Trust.—Attorney-General McReynolds concluded his arguments for the dissolution of the International Harvester Trust Company before the Federal Court at St. Paul, Minn. He asked that the defendants have a reasonable time to submit to the court a proper plan of reorganization. Considerable emphasis was laid on the request that stockholders of the companies be kept separate, the Attorney-General insisting that no dissolution would be real until this was accomplished. The growth of the Harvester Company has been enormous. In 1903 its total business amounted to $53,000,000; in 1912 it had increased to $125,000,000; and between 1903 and 1911, the latest figures available, the assets of the concern had increased from $130,000,000 to $223,000,000. The International Harvester Company says the Attorney-General holds in one combine more than 90 per cent. of the great harvesting companies of the country.

Cuba.—The press cables from Rome state that the Most Rev. Adolphe Alexander Nouel, Archbishop of Santo Domingo, and formerly Provisional President of the Dominican Republic, has been appointed by the Pope Apostolic Delegate to Cuba and Porto Rico. His Excellency was born at Santo Domingo, December 12, 1862. He was appointed coadjutor to the Archbishop of Santo Domingo and titular of Methymne, Oct. 8, 1904, and consecrated by Cardinal Merry del Val, in Rome, on October 16. He succeeded to the see of Santo Domingo, August 21, 1906. He was elected President of the Republic on November 30, 1912, but resigned the office on December, 16 following.

Colombia.—On the tenth anniversary of the separation of Panama from Colombia, the Colombian Senate in session at Bogota unanimously adopted a resolution declaring again that Colombia's isthmian rights are imprescriptible, at the same time protesting against the causes preventing the use and defence of her rights and stating that she would view with satisfaction anything modifying those causes and replacing them by acts of equity and justice.—The Government took occasion from the late Eucharistic Congress at Bogotá to pay the nation's homage to Christ our Redeemer in the august mystery of the Eucharist.

Canada.—A by-election for the Provincial Legislature in the Peel constituency has resulted in the retaining of the seat by the Conservatives, but their majority is reduced by nearly one-half. The Ottawa Government had hoped for results in the late elections that would have rebuked the opposition to the Naval Bill and justified them in a new attempt to push it through Parliament. They will hardly undertake to do so at present.—The Government has been applied to for an extension of the navigation season on the St. Lawrence. It proposes to do its share, but the matter depends, so far as ocean shipping is concerned, upon the insurance companies. The Department of Marine will try to keep the river open between Quebec and Three Rivers throughout the winter by means of ice breakers.—Since the new tariff came into effect in the United States, Canadian cattle have been crossing the border, selling in Chicago at prices below those of the regular Canadian markets. The explanation is to be found apparently in the unsatisfactory condition of the West. The cattle owners are being pressed by their creditors, and so are forced to sell when the opportunity offers. American buyers, understanding the situation, go through the country giving them the opportunity, fixing the price themselves. The condition of the wheat growers is much the same. The grain coming out is, for the most part, of No. 1 Northern grade; but the growers have to sell at whatever price is offered, to pay their debts.—Thirty-nine natives of British India, awaiting deportation under the British Columbia Immigration laws, have applied for Habeas Corpus, in order to test the legality of these laws. Should they persevere, the right of one part of the Empire to exclude the people of another part will be settled in the highest English court of appeal.—The trials of the Nanaimo rioters have ended in the sentencing of many to imprisonment, the leaders getting two years. The Dominion Trades and Labor Congress, urged by the United Mine Workers of America, has appealed to the Minister of Justice to remit the sentences. It is also asking for an arbitration board to settle the matter in dispute between the miners and their employers.

Great Britain.—The Suffragists have resumed their felonious practices. They have committed several acts of arson, and threaten more. The Government resolved lately not to allow those convicted of this crime the benefit of the "Cat and Mouse" Act, which has worked out, as every reasonable person must have foreseen, into a general pardoning machine.—Failures of native banks in India have begun again on a larger scale than those of a few weeks ago. The Indian Government is much concerned. It had hoped that the natives would learn to trust the banks, and so give up by degrees their habit of hoarding gold, which has done much to disturb the money-market. Whatever foundation there may have been for such hopes, they are now shattered.—The engine driver of the train wrecked some time ago on the Midland Railway, in Yorkshire, was convicted of manslaughter, and received the light sentence of two months' imprisonment. Probably the authorities hoped that the unions would not think it worth while to agitate over a merely formal sentence. If so, they were disappointed. The railway-men threatened a general strike unless the man was pardoned, and the Government gave way.—The constituency of South Lanarkshire has been opened by the death of Sir Walter Menzies. It gave a majority to the Government of 1,200 at the last election. The Unionists have won Reading from the Government with a small majority over the combined vote of the Liberal and the Socialist candidates. In Linlithgowshire they succeeded in reducing the Liberal majority of over 2,000 to about 550.

Ireland.—Mr. Asquith's speech at Ladysmith, in which he declared that "nothing is to be done which will erect a permanent or an insuperable barrier in the way of Irish unity," has started a controversy as to why he put qualifying terms to the "barrier." But confidence is restored in his further assertion. "Nothing is to be done which will interfere with the setting up in Dublin of a subordinate Irish Parliament with an Executive responsible to it. That is the root of our principle and our Bill; from that we cannot and shall not depart. . . . We are not going to be false to the trust which the vast majority of the Irish people have reposed in us. We are not going to betray their cause." John Dillon, at Carlow, said he expressed Nationalist willingness to go any distance to meet the Ulster Unionists, short of sacrificing the Principle of Home Rule. John Guiney, brother of the late member, is the unopposed nominee for the vacancy in North Cork.—Continued prosperity is indicated by the total number of 640,622 open accounts in the Post Office Savings Bank in Ireland on December 31st last; at the end of 1907 it was 525,441. The amount standing to the credit of all open accounts was £12,820,870; in 1907 it was £10,575,914; in 1896, £6,153,778, and in 1881, £1,723,395.—No further attempt has been made by the Syndicalist strikers to deport poor children from Dublin to England. Archbishop Walsh has had a special collection made for the poor children's fund, and a balance of $10,000 in the treasury of the recent Irish National Pilgrimage to Lourdes has been turned over to the archbishop for the benefit of the children of the workmen affected by the strike. T. P. Gill, speaking in Waterford, referred to the manner in which Irish industries were being ruined by the strike, said Wexford had gone back five years in its progress.—Rev. Thomas Wheeler, S.J., who succeeded Father Matthew Russell as editor of the Irish Monthly, is dead. He was in his sixty-fifth year. He came of a distinguished Wexford family. Two of his brothers were priests and Bishop Carbery, O.P., of Hamilton, Canada, was his uncle.—Right Rev. John G. Neville, C.S.Sp., has been consecrated titular of Carrhoe and Vicar Apostolic of Zanzibar by Bishop O'Donnell, who in a congratulatory address said: "Religion and education and the welfare of the people, especially of the poorest classes, were the objects for which the bishops of Ireland were striving, but surely it was a consoling thing that they had lived to see the time when they were just to step into a new era and a far better prospect for the men who live in this old country."

Rome.—Nathan the Hebrew Mayor of Rome resigned his office on November 5. The "bloc" was seen to have split when the two candidates it had supported in Rome failed of election on the second ballot. The complexion of the legislature, however, has not materially changed. The Liberals have elected 240, but the defeat of Prince Teano and Scipione Borghese for both of whom Nathan had made a personal canvass prompted his action. The office of the newspaper which is the organ of the "bloc" was sacked by the mob and the editors beaten. A peculiar feature of the second balloting was that although it took place on Sunday it was more riotous than the week-day performances. Pistols were used and only the presence of a large force of police prevented graver disorders. Most remarkable of all is that the suffragettes shared in the frenzy, rushing about in autos and cabs, distributing pamphlets and urging the electors to vote for candidates who favored woman suffrage.—His Eminence Cardinal Louis Billot, S.J. has been appointed protector of the Pontifical Latin-American College.

Italy.—In conjunction with Austria, Italy remonstrated with Greece for persisting in its opposition to the work of defining the limits of the Albanian territory according to the decision of the London Conference.—Giolitti's program is said to embrace the pacification and consolidation of Tripoli, naval expansion, tax reduction, and extension of education. For the last named the budget has been doubled. That with the other things proposed will make it difficult to carry out the project of tax reduction. As all the members of the Cabinet were returned, the policy of the Government is apparently endorsed by the voters.

France.—The fearless letter of the five bishops of Brittany has attracted the attention of the country. They repudiate any disloyalty to the Republic in denouncing the lay schools and demand as French citizens the means to educate their children in schools which will not assail religion. They point out also the superiority of Catholic schools in secular training and quote Clemenceau himself in proof of their assertion.—As New York has been extravagantly expanded into a "Greater New York" so there is to be a "Greater Paris." All the suburbs which cluster around the fortifications are to be taken in so as to make the city six times greater than it actually is. As Paris has 148 people to the acre compared with London's 64, the enlargement it is hoped will help to do away with the present congestion. Great changes are proposed within the limits of the present city to provide small parks for the people. Great parks outside of the fortifications are also proposed.

Germany.—Under the title of Ludwig III the former Prince Regent of Bavaria, has now ascended the throne. For the first time within twenty-seven years the royal banner was unfurled over the Wittelsbach Palace. Both Houses of the Bavarian Diet had previously accepted the resolution which threw open for him the way to the throne. On November 5 Baron von Hertling announced in the Diet that, in accordance with the constitutional law of November 4, 1913, the regency had come to an end. Dr. Orterer, the President of the Ministerial Council, then read the Proclamation of the new King, Ludwig III, which the Diet received with loud and enthusiastic cheers. King Otto's insanity had been hopeless long before his accession to the royal dignity, of which he never had any conception. King Ludwig III pathetically referred to this condition in his Proclamation. "Deep concern for the welfare of the country," he said, "has led to the serious decision of ending the regency and declaring the vacancy of the throne. The question of succession has therefore been opened and the crown has come upon Us according to the right of primogeniture and inheritance in agnatic line of descent. We have therefore begun as King to rule this land and have entered into full possession of the kingly rights which are Ours by the grace of God." After a reception in the castle, where he received the congratulations of the nobility, King Ludwig III drove through the streets of the city, where the people hailed him with unbounded joy and affection. Later the army took its oath in the various churches throughout the country. Dispatches containing messages of most intimate attachment and mutual love were exchanged between the King and the German Emperor. The rejoicing is universal except for the revolutionary elements who are openly opposed to the monarchy. The day preceding the royal proclamation two members of the Diet had been officially sent to Fürstener Palace to ascertain the condition of the insane King Otto. They found him in a pathetic state, moving about aimlessly and uttering inarticulate sounds. As they withdrew they heard a sudden crash and found that he had dashed to the floor the tray with its porcelain dishes from which they had been served.

Austria-Hungary.—An important visit has been paid by King Ferdinand of Bulgaria to the Austrian Emperor and to the Austro-Hungarian Minister of Foreign Affairs, with whom he was in conference for many hours. The Bulgarian King was on his way to Castle Konopischt in Bohemia, where he accepted the hospitality of the Austrian heir apparent, Franz Ferdinand.—The condition of Count Kossuth, the leader of the "Kossuth Party," is now declared to be hopeless, and his death may be announced at any moment.—The old scenes of disturbance are repeating themselves in Parliament. Upon the attempt of the guards to remove certain members the Opposition arose and left the hall.—The Austrian emigration problem will probably be solved by the appointment of a committee which is to search the ships carrying emigrants, in order to make impossible the transportation of such as might be demanded for military duties. At all events it is thought that the Government will control the situation with a strong hand.

Syria.—The Jesuit Fathers of the Lyons Province, who have the management of the well-known medical faculty of Beirut, are about to open, at the beginning of the next school year, a law faculty and a high technical school. Both schools will be subsidized by the French Government, which, it must not be forgotten, has always subsidized the medical faculty and acknowledges the diplomas it confers.

Holland.—The Socialist Polak, President of the Diamond Workers' Union, has been chosen as a representative of the Province of Friesland, in the Upper House of Parliament. The successful campaign of the new member, it is claimed, was a logical sequence of the overtures made by the Government last July to induce several leaders of the Socialist party to enter the new Cabinet.

India.—From Simla, the summer capital of India, Consul Henry D. Baker writes that in the spring of 1914 work is to begin on what will be one of the most novel undertakings of the world, a great aerial cableway about 75 miles long across the Himalaya Mountain barriers which separate the beautiful and famous "Vale of Kashmir," in the native state of Kashmir, from the plains of the Punjab in northern India. This will be by far the longest cableway in the world, the longest at present being one of 22 miles in extent in Argentina. This cableway will solve for the Kashmir state the serious problem of transportation into the rest of the Empire of India. At first it will be used for freight only. If it is found to work with safety it is likely that in a year or two cars will be equipped for carrying passengers. A London firm will organize a company to undertake the work under a concession from the Kashmir Government, which will subscribe for one-third of the capital stock. The cost will be about $1,500,000.

China.—By a proclamation issued November 5, President Yuan Shih-kai expelled from Parliament the three hundred members of the Kow-Ming-Tang Party. Formerly adherents of the exiled Dr. Sun Yat-Sen, they have labored to curtail President Yuan's authority, and favored a Constitution that would make him absolutely dependent on the Parliament. Martial law is reported to be in operation in Peking, and executions are numerous. Parliament since it convened has accomplished little, but grave disorders meanwhile are spreading among the people.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Ancient Labor Organizations

I—ORIGIN AND DEVELOPMENT.

Few subjects can match for interest and importance in our age of industrial conflicts and organization the history of the trade unions of the past, the ancient and medieval labor guilds. The exploits of kings and captains, the rise and fall of monarchies, the clash and clamor of war, and the stealthy intrigues of world-conquering diplomacy can no longer rouse the masses as do the narratives that tell with sympathy and justice the homely tale of the struggles, the successes and the failures of the great classes of the laboring poor. For the Christian especially the victories of David and the splendors of Solomon must pale before the thought of the humble workshop of Nazareth.

If the history of labor is of interest to all, the accounts that give authentic information of the development, methods and results of more than twenty centuries of labor organization are particularly indispensable for the student of social problems.

That such organization took place long before the first clear evidence of it is afforded by ancient documents and inscriptions appears sufficiently manifest. The need of fellowship was always strongly felt by man, and with it came that natural impulse towards association to whose benefits no one could ever be entirely blind. But the first authentic records of trade unionism hitherto discovered brings us back no farther than the sixth or seventh century before Christ for the institution of the system of craft guilds.

Plutarch (Numa 17), as is well known, attributes them to the second legendary king of Rome, Numa Pompilius (715-672 B. C.). His statement must not, however, be received too credulously. It implies, nevertheless, that a century before the Christian era certain trade unions existed at Rome which, in the popular mind, dated back to time immemorial. According to a method sufficiently common at a period when historic criticism was less exacting, all were ascribed to the king to whom Rome was said to be indebted for other most important institutions. After the same convenient fashion the fables of animal life were gathered gradually about the name of Æsop, though many had existed even long before his day, and were later to be found among the ancient writings of the Egyptians.

Florus, we should mention, attributes the origin of the Roman labor organizations to Servius Tullius for the same reason. (1, 6, 3.).

The distinct craft guilds, or trade unions mentioned by Plutarch, as founded during the reign of Numa, are eight in number, while a ninth was said to embrace "the remaining trades." Departing somewhat from the customary English interpretation of the Greek text, we may classify the eight crafts as follows:

1, Flute-Players; 2, Goldsmiths; 3, Builders; 4, Dyers; 5, Tailors; 6, Tanners; 7, Coppersmiths; 8, Potters. That all these crafts existed in a specialized form at this early period is seriously to be questioned. Other trades, moreover, which were then probably of greater importance, are not mentioned here. Certain, however, it is that these ancient unions were regarded with a special reverence by the Romans, and consequently outlived the laws which proved fatal to so many other associations.

Shortly after the period to which tradition ascribed the beginning of the gild system in Rome, Solon (born in 638 B. C.), introduced his sweeping reforms in Greece. They completely changed the conditions of capital and labor at Athens. The poor had there been ground down to such utter destitution and misery that they sold their very sons and daughters, and lastly, even their own bodies into slavery to the masters of bread, in whose hands were the keys of wealth. In this stress of popular despair, which threatened to culminate in a bloody revolution, rich and poor alike chose Solon for their archon. Unlimited power was conferred on him to introduce whatever economic and constitutional reforms might be needed. As a consequence the law which reduced the laborer to slavery in lieu of the payment of his debt was abrogated. He was given the right to vote, although he could not himself be elected to office, and was ranked in the fourth class of citizens. Slight as such benefits may seem to us, they were regarded as a great boon in their day. A Greek fourth estate had thus been created.

To Solon likewise is ascribed by Gaius the Athenian law, considered as the charter of subsequent trade unions, which permitted the organization of societies, provided they were not hostile to the State. The Roman law engraved upon the Twelve Tables, which granted this same privilege, is regarded by Gaius as only a translation of the Solonic legislation. (Fourth Book of Gaius on the Law of the Twelve Tables. Digest XLVII, Tit., 22, De Collegiis et Corporibus.)

The guilds were in Rome commonly called collegia, in Greece eranoi and thiasoi. Other names were likewise in use, but all these appellations, like the English equivalent, "gild," were applied to societies of almost every variety. While little is known of the statutes of the labor organizations in particular, the constitutions and customs of the guilds in general are perfectly familiar to us. We here reproduce a description which comprises the salient characteristics of the Greek association. Each of these details was not, of course, to be found in every given instance.

"Let us now consider," writes Mr. H. Tompkins, "What these companies were which are called by the name of eranos and thiasos, and of which the inscriptions have revealed the number and importance. They were formed of members who met together to sacrifice to certain divinities and to celebrate their festivals in common; besides this they assisted those members who fell into necessitous circumstances, and provided for their funerals. They were at once religious associations and friendly societies. Sometimes they daringly partook of a political and commercial character. These private corporations (recognized by the State), had their presiding and other officers, their priests, their funds supplied by the contributions of members and the liberality of benefactors. They assembled in their sanctuaries and made decrees. They were found in great numbers in the important cities, and especially in the maritime ones. At Rhodes, for example, they were the Companions of the Sun, the Sons of Bacchus, of Minerva Lindienne, of Jupiter Atagyrus, of Jupiter Soter." (Friendly Societies of Antiquity.)

Although the reality was not always as idyllic as this picture represents it, and a statue of a god was usually sufficient to constitute the sanctuary, if we may so call their locals, yet the idea of a perfect Greek gild is here sufficiently expressed. Greater stress might, however, be placed upon the convivial nature of the banquets, which in the latter state of Greek and Roman society may almost have been the principal reason for the existence of such associations, and probably consisted in wild debauches and orgies. Political intrigues, as we shall see, were frequently a prime motive. How closely the trade gilds approximated to the description here given it is difficult to say, yet they were doubtlessly conformed, as far as possible, to the general gild ideal of their time.

It is to Rome, however, that we must turn for a complete and systematic development of craft and merchant gilds. The inscriptions dealing with them are countless in number and amazing in their variety. Almost every division of trade seemed to possess its union. Taruntenus Paternus, who was Prefect of the Imperial Guard in 179, enumerates thirty craft unions which were especially privileged by the Government. Yet he mentions only such trades as were connected with military work. (Dig. L. 6, 7. Liebenam, "Zur Geschichte und Organisation des Römischen Vereinswesens." p. 48.) Constantine in 337 extended special privileges to thirty-five trade corporations.

It is interesting to note that a grouping similar to that of the Middle Ages was likewise observed at Rome. The potters occupied the Esquiline, the silk-workers and perfumers were settled in Tuscan Street, the oil-dealers and cheese-mongers had their booths in Valabrum, and the silversmiths and tanners were located beyond the Tiber.

As in the Middle Ages, so here likewise streets or sections of the city were often named after the tradesmen and merchants who displayed their wares in them. Thus we have Perfumers' Street, Harness-makers' Street, Corn-venders' Row, and Sandal Street. In the latter Apollo Sandaliarius, or Apollo of the Sandal-makers, had his shrine.

The ancient Roman gilds were, according to ancient custom, placed under the special guardianship of some divinity. While merchants naturally turned to Mercury, the craftsmen most frequently dedicated their gilds to Minerva, the goddess of the arts. Ovid in particular tells of the many various classes of workingmen and women who assisted in great throngs at the celebration of her feast. (Fast. III, 308 sqq. 819-832.) The gilds, as we have seen, at times made the temples of a god their meeting places. Thus the merchant gild described by Livy, which met in the temple of Mercury, took for its feast the anniversary of the temple's dedication. The same author writes of a gild of flute-players, who went upon a strike because the censors forbade them to hold their banquets in the temple of Jupiter at Rome, as had been their custom from the earliest times. They consequently went in a body to another city, where they were well received. But when they had celebrated their feast, and all were helplessly drunk, they were placed upon a wagon and so returned to Rome, where a reconciliation took place. (Livy ix, 30.) Liebenam refers to other classical authors who have different versions of this story, but it serves at all events to illustrate existing conditions.

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

Laying the Alcoholic Demon*

The scientific and practical treatise, entitled "The Cure of Alcoholism," has to-day a world-wide application. Books have been written on the subject in the thousands, and advertisements of absolute cures in the hundreds of thousands; and our legislatures have been filling their records with speeches and their codes with prohibitory enactments on this very disturbing politico-social theme—with the result that the sale of alcoholic liquors has doubled in a decade. Most of the books were written by zealots without scientific knowledge or balanced judgment; the patent cure-all but added new diseases or intensified the malady; and the prohibition laws, resting on a merely legal and not a moral basis, and often on a party motive that continued to provoke partisan opposition, have lamentably failed to prohibit. Dr. O'Malley has as intense dislike of alcoholism, and as little appreciation of the value of alcoholic beverages in any form, as the most rabid prohibitionist; but he has made a scientific study of the pathology, history and statistics of the subject, its causes, consequences, varieties, degrees and environments, and as an especially experienced physician and well-informed Catholic, he knows the moral, as well as medical remedies that are efficient, and in how far they are applicable. His statements and inferences are, therefore, neither far-fetched nor onesided, and as he covers as much of the entire ground as the lay reader can travel with a medical expert, he has produced the most thorough and satisfying review of alcoholism in all its phases that has been given to the general public. It has the additional advantage of a directness and pithiness of style and a wealth of illustrative information that make the reading easy and inviting.

The first part, dealing with the medical aspect of the disease, explains the nature of alcohol, its proportions in liquors and patent medicines and its physical and mental effects; its relation to infectious diseases, insanity, imbecility, crime, pauperism, occupation and climate; the transmission of alcoholic tendencies through heredity; the history and inefficacy of restrictive legislation; the treatment of alcoholism in English and American institutions, and finally the most approved physical prescriptions for its cure in the various stages and degrees. Of the prescriptions' efficacy we do not presume to judge, except in so far as they are the result of the wide experience of a keen and conscientious physician; but not a few of his conclusions on non-medical matters may be questioned. His theory that the white, brown, yellow and black races flourish and multiply only within zones marked by definite degrees of latitude or isothermal lines, would make most Americans, except the tropical or near-tropical negro, incapable of development. He instances as proof that Northern Europeans decay in a hot climate, that the Gothic, Lombard and Norse conquerors of Spain, Italy, Sicily, ultimately disappeared. But the same is true of the Franks and Burgundians, the Normans in England and Ireland, of all the dynasties of the period, and of all conquerors who were not numerous enough to absorb or exterminate the native peoples. Their disappearance, as an entity, was due not to climate, but to gradual absorption into the larger numbers of the general population. Another instance is the dying out of a Norwegian colony in Texas. A single instance is not convincing. French families have died out in France, and have flourished in Canada, far north of the isothermal zone our author would assign them; and we happen to know several Norwegian families in a southernmost Texas city that have multiplied healthily to three generations. The progenitor in one of them had recently a golden jubilee that was attended by seventy-two vigorous descendants. The fact that they were all Catholics might have been the factor differentiating them from their decadent compatriots.

It is a factor that Dr. O'Malley by no means overlooks. He believes strongly in the force of heredity—sometimes overlooking in his appraisal several counter-acting elements—and he holds up as a deterrent to bibulous parents the certainty of transmitting the alcoholic tendency to their offspring for many generations. He also insists that the physical craving must be eliminated from the system by medical treatment before the patient's will power is free to act; but when this is done he prescribes a course for physician and patient that has seldom found its way into medical books. Chronic and occasionally confirmed drunkards have been known to conquer the habit without recourse to religious aids; but Dr. O'Malley has little faith in the frequency of such cures, and less in their permanence. Holding that the supernatural helps which strengthen and reinforce the will and illumine the intellect are normally the only efficacious remedies, he devotes somewhat more than half of the 312 pages to this phase of the question. It will astonish many of his medical readers, opening up to them a new world that they would do well to take possession of. They will find an excellent summary of the moral and dogmatic theology on the subject expressed with pulpit force in the more rigorous and homely idiom of the medical lecture room.

Having explained the moral responsibility of the drunkard for his own act and the evil done to his offspring, and the general uselessness or danger of alcohol as a medicine—even in the case of snake bite it but adds one poison to another—the author gives an extended and useful chapter on the control of the passions, the correlation of which is such that the mastery of one conduces to the mastery of all, and vice versa; on the fundamental virtues of prudence, temperance, justice and fortitude that bring the concupiscent and irascible emotions into harmony with reason; and on the allied virtues and opposing vices, which are treated with theological accuracy, but with a spice that is not used in formal treatises. For instance, speaking of effeminacy as opposed to the fortitude that makes man or woman valiant: "The dawdling, mincing, simpering, candy-munching, gossiping, fluffy girl or woman is a vicious yet pathetic parasite, fit only for the limbo of babes; yet God intended that woman should hoe her row just as honestly as a man; and He will hold us accountable for the education we give girls which makes that flabby jellyfish, the effeminate woman, possible. . . . Did you ever know a romantic woman that was a good housekeeper?"

Having treated the drunkard medically according to his type and degree and, if necessary, confined him in a well-governed house of restraint from which "the politician, the police, the professional saint, the female agitator are to be kept out, except as patients," Dr. O'Malley would strengthen the moral muscles of the "flabby-willed alcoholic"—and every drunkard is essentially a weakling, "too flabby to be a vigorous scoundrel." If he is an ordinary pagan he must be taught the natural moral virtues, for they all form a chain that is no stronger than its weakest link; and to this end there is a valuable dissertation on natural virtues and the practical method of acquiring them, and a striking description of the evils of drunkenness, which thus concludes:

"It breaks vows binding before God. The worship due to the Creator is prevented or made sacrilegious by the drunkard, who may go through the forms of worship while his eyes are turned back to offal. It wrecks the drunkard's body; and if he is a father it inflicts horrible suffering on generations born and to come: idiocy, imbecility, neurosis, tendencies to disease, stupor of mind. The drunken father or mother spills blood that clamors for vengeance to the powerful and just God, and He will and must get full satisfaction if it takes all eternity to settle the score."

The natural man can acquire the moral virtues and be cured, but he has not half the chance of the patient who has recourse to the supernatural; hence, with the floods of supernatural grace at his gates, the modern pagan who choseth to remain a merely natural man is so in the sense in which an idiot was wont to be called a "natural."

Therefore, since ordinarily the conquest of drunkenness demands the use of supernatural forces, the drunkard and his doctor are provided with a sketch of these in "Supernatural Control," a thirty-five page chapter, which is really an accurate and strikingly up-to-date epitome of St. Thomas and St. Augustine on Grace, and of the proofs of the truth and Divine origin of the Catholic Church. Sacramental grace is the spiritual anti-toxin that will complete the drunkard's cure, but he must take it in large doses, frequently and regularly. An occasional Sunday dinner will not restore his strength; it must be "daily bread." The following extract on this subject illustrates the style and thoroughness of the writer:

"The patient must arrange with a priest in his neighborhood so that he may be able to go to Confession any morning before Mass, and so leave no excuse for putting off Communion. Soon these morning Confessions will not be necessary. . . . All this is unintelligible to those who are not Catholics, but the drunkard that has been a Catholic has enough faith left to understand what is meant. A confirmed drunkard is not a Catholic, of course, except in the State census. The method described is absolutely scientific as a medical process; so scientific that as a physician I should advise a drunkard who is not a Catholic, but who is serious in his desire to reform, to become a Catholic in order to make sure of his cure. This motive would require considerable purification before it could pass the examiners, but the procedure in itself is reasonable. He must not be deterred by the example of drunkards who are set down as Catholics in the census, for 'drunkards belong to no church, except to the extent that some of them pay pew-rent.'"

There is a useful appendix on opium and kindred drugs, and a particularly helpful index. While exception may be taken to some views and theories embodied in the volume, there can be no hesitation in commending it to priest, physician and intelligent layman as an admirable and most instructive exposition of the only effective remedy for one of the most deep-rooted and far-reaching evils of our day.

An Indian Arcadia*

The great scholar, Menendez Pelayo, would have welcomed these portly volumes of Father Hernandez on the Jesuit Missions or Reductions of Paraguay. To use a phrase which Richard Le Gallienne applies to Mr. Saintsbury, here is a work to suit the learned Spaniard, that "leviathan who could swallow whole libraries at a meal." These volumes do not quite reach the bulk of Dr. Nares' "Burleigh and His Times," so wittily criticized by Macaulay. Their 1,360 well-filled pages, however, faintly remind us of it. Father Hernandez has not attempted a history of the Guarani Missions. He did not intend to build a finished monument; he has laid its solid pedestal. He has given us a book, which for the future annalist of the Reductions will be a rich mine of information. He has gathered the ore in generous quantities; other hands must smelt and mould it to definite form. To fully understand the social and economic aspects of the Paraguay Missions this book will be almost indispensable. Three hundred pages of official documents, gathered from the archives of Seville, Buenos Ayres, Rio de Janeiro, Santiago de Chile, the Vatican Library, etc., prove the pains-taking labor and the conscientious research of the writer. Mr. Joseph McCabe, the author of what he dares to call "A Candid History of the Jesuits," might learn from this Jesuit historian the art, which, in spite of his pretended candor he seems to have scarcely even attempted to master, that of backing up his statements by documentary proof and evidence. History is no longer written as Mr. Joseph McCabe writes it. His unsupported word is not weighty enough to convince the reader of the serious accusations with which he burdens his pages.

The religions of antiquity never inspired that divine enthusiasm which throbs in the heart of the heralds of the Cross, and which was the inspiration of the missionaries of Paraguay. The philosophers of paganism never left their groves or porticoes in order to carry their teaching to foreign shores, to civilize the untutored savage and to instill into his mind and heart a knowledge and a love of the True and the Good. The religion of Christ alone, verifying the axiom that "the Good is diffusive of itself," has wrought this marvel. In her unbroken line of missionaries she possesses a convincing proof of her divine origin and constitution. By their labors in every quarter of the globe, by their heroism and extraordinary success, her apostles prove that the Church which commissioned them for their work is the very one to which Christ spoke the words: "Go and teach all nations."

The missions are the epic of Catholicism, its Iliad and its Odyssey. Few episodes of that romance are so stirring as that of the Jesuit "Doctrinas" or Reductions among the Guaranis of Paraguay. Epic, idyl and tragedy here combined to produce a fascinating story. While following the rise and development of these communities, in their quaint and interesting historian, Charlevoix, and studying their social organization in the splendidly documented pages of Father Hernandez, we almost forget that we are dealing with facts and seem transported into imaginary realms, such as were dreamt of by More in his "Utopia," or Campanella in his "City of the Sun."

The ideal commonwealth has long been the dream of fallen and suffering humanity. While Bacon, in his "New Atlantis," Harrington in his "Oceana," and Campanella in his above-mentioned work, were theorizing about it in the seventeenth century, the Jesuit missionaries were in some way realizing the dreams in the forests of the New World. In those vast regions now forming the republics of Paraguay, Uruguay, Argentina, and the southern portions of Bolivia and Brazil, the Jesuits organized their first mission-colony or industrial commune, technically "doctrina" or "reduction," about the year 1610, at Loreto, on the banks of the Paranápanema. They acted in full accord with the ecclesiastical and civil authorities, under the explicit sanction of Philip III, of Spain, duly recorded in the "cedulas" or royal ordinances of 1606, 1607, 1609. It was the beginning of an Indian Arcadia, the laying of the cornerstone of a Red-Man's Commonwealth. That Indian Arcadia lasted to 1767, over 150 years. For that period, the Jesuit was the Red-Man's legislator, father, teacher, purveyor, monitor; his guide, philosopher and friend. He civilized him, saved him from his vices, from his enemies and from himself. He was accused of doing it for sordid gain. When the missionaries were driven from their reductions, their enemies looked in vain for the fabulous wealth these were said to conceal. It was nowhere to be found.

These "Reductions," where the Indians were peaceably "reduced" to order, discipline, a definite social and communal life, have had, like the Jesuits themselves, their admirers and their foes. We are not a little surprised to count among the former such men as Buffon and Voltaire, Montesquieu and Raynal, d'Alembert and Robertson. These writers may misunderstand the motives of the missionaries, sneer at their ideals and criticize their methods, but they pay homage to their heroism, and impartially, though grudgingly, register their success. Voltaire speaks of the work as "a triumph of humanity" (Essai sur les Mœurs, p. 423.) The apostate priest Raynal, pays this tribute to the rulers of this Christian Arcadia:

"When in 1768, the missions of Paraguay were taken from the Jesuits, they had reached the highest degree perhaps of civilization, to which such new and untrained natures could be lifted, a civilization vastly superior to anything that existed in the New World. The laws were observed, order and discipline reigned, manners and morals were pure, all hearts were happily united in the bonds of brotherhood, the arts of peace were brought to perfection, the refinements of life were not unknown, abundance and plenty prevailed." (Histoire politique et philosophique des Indes, vol. II. p. 289).

The Reductions were the outcome of peculiar and unusual circumstances. To understand them, we must view them in the light of the political and colonial conditions of the times. In 1515 the mail-clad and at times iron-hearted Spanish conquistadores under Juan Diaz de Solis, had overrun the basin of La Plata, and after fierce and bloody encounters had subdued the warlike natives. The encomienda system already existing in other Spanish colonies was introduced here also. That famous system was in some way a species of mitigated feudalism. The kings of Spain were naturally anxious to reward the hardy path-finders who like de Solis, Cortez, Valdivia, Pizarro, had with their swords carved out in the West kingdoms and empires for Aragon and Castile. They did so by grants of land and the encomienda. By the latter the monarchs, waiving their own immediate rights over the conquered Indians, bound them, not absolutely, but under certain clearly defined restrictions to their immediate conquerors. It was the transfer by the sovereign to individuals, of his right over his Indian subjects; it was the transfer also of his obligation to watch over their spiritual and temporal welfare. These encomienda grants were not in perpetuity; they lasted only during the life of the original beneficiary and his first heir; they then reverted to the crown. The encomendero promised under oath to treat the Indians well and to provide for their physical and spiritual needs. That oath was too often disregarded. To their credit, the Spanish monarchs from Ferdinand and Isabella, to Ferdinand VII, made strenuous and sincere efforts to protect the natives, but Charcas, Asunción and Tucuman were far from Madrid and Seville. Edmund Burke's words in "Conciliation" illustrate the situation. "In large bodies, the circulation of power must be less vigorous at the extremities. Nature has said it. The Turk cannot govern Egypt and Arabia and Kurdistan as he governs Thrace; nor has he the same dominion in Crimea and Algiers which he has at Brusa and Smyrna. . . . The Sultan gets such obedience as he can." The words were true of the Kings of Spain and their colonies. In its milder forms the encomienda system made mitayas or serfs of the Indians; in its harsher aspects yanacunas or slaves. Time and again the Indians rebelled, and though often wreaking vengeance on their masters, they were generally defeated at last by the well-armed, well-drilled encomenderos, only to feel their chains riveted more firmly than before. Kings, viceroys, bishops, all the friends of civilization in the mother country and in the colonies, earnestly strove to remedy the evil. Jesuits like Saloni, Ortega, Borsena, Fields, had already labored in Paraguay among the brave, but fierce, man-eating Guaranis. Their efforts had necessarily been sporadic, and though heroism had been displayed and good done, they had not produced lasting results. Claudius Aquaviva, then general of the Society of Jesus, realized that concentrated, well organized efforts were absolutely necessary. To be effectively controlled, the Indian must be won from the tangled forests and matted jungles where lurked the cobra, where the puma awaited its prey, and deadly fevers brooded under every bush and tree. Permanent settlements had to be made, some kind of government introduced suited to the restless, improvident and childish character of the Red-Man. Something of the kind had been attempted in Brazil. Aquaviva outlined the general policy; the virtuous and able Diego de Torres Bollo, then Provincial of Paraguay, worked out the details.

The plan, which made the Jesuits the virtual arbiters and in some sense, the real, though by no means independent rulers of this "Indian State," was considered an attack on the encomienda. If so, it was justified, for the harshness and cruelty of the encomenderos had not only made slaves of the Indians, but had made them reject with loathing the religion of their tyrants. Under that plan, which perhaps it may not be uninteresting to explain more fully later on, over 700,000 Guaranis alone, between 1610 and 1768, were saved from slavery and paganism; were civilized and refined. To build up that Indian commonwealth, on the banks of the Paraná and the Uruguay, in grassy pampa and verdant savannah, apostles like Maceta and Cataldino, Monroy and Montoya toiled, martyrs like Osorio, Mendoza and Baraza bled. To the unfounded and often absurd charges brought against them by their enemies, and amongst them by Mr. Joseph McCabe, the Jesuits have one triumphant answer. "Our labors, our toils, our blood, won a nation to the Cross and rescued it from barbarism and destruction."

JOHN C. REVILLE, S.J.

The Basis of a New Pedagogy*

Maria Montessori is an earnest woman of high purpose, great zeal and astounding activity. She has dedicated her life to the education of children; and, unlike many teachers, doomed to die without a vision of the good which they have done, she is already enjoying the reward of her work. Defective though her methods are in some essential details, yet many of them are admirable for the practical turn which they give to important truths of child psychology. Few methods of teaching make better use of the child's instinct for play. Few catch the young imagination more easily or hold it more firmly. Fewer still are more insistent on the necessity of directing childish whims into ethical channels.

All this is in a measure good. Indeed, to some extent it is both admirable for the baby-pupil and welcome to the nervous, high-strung mistress who is thereby relieved of much tension and worry. Were Signora Montessori's methods more decisive in will training they would be a welcome innovation in many a humdrum American classroom. As they stand, they appear to present a lack of firmness in dealing with the fractious. Report has it that the religious atmosphere with which the Dottoressa surrounds her children renders greater firmness unnecessary. This is credible, but quite ineffective for good in many of our schools. Maria Montessori has, then, achieved a large measure of success in dealing with children.

In view of this it is entirely too bad that she did not resist the temptation to expose the philosophical basis of her system. She yielded to the impulse to philosophize, with the result that, despite her many good methods, her system appears utterly perverse. Her philosophy is not only false, but strangest of all it is in open and flat contradiction to the plans and devices and instructions explained in "The Montessori Method." She has succeeded in separating speculation and practice so completely that readers of her second book, "Pedagogical Anthropology," will be apt to consider her a Dr. Jekyll in one volume and a Mr. Hyde in the other. In the first book she insists on the absolute freedom of the will; in the second she is an apostle of determinism. The reason is clear. In the one case she is drawing on experience; in the other she is speculating about subtle questions which lie beyond her ken. She neither understands the problems at issue nor their bearing on practical life. Her vision is clouded. Her reasoning is inconsequent. Her pen is weak and halting. She is caught at hero-worshipping. Her hero is Lombroso, the unspeakable prig who knew so much of freedom and spirituality and criminology that he could be tricked into absurd decisions with ease by clumsy practical jokers.

Signora Montessori has been unfair to herself and to her followers; unwittingly so, it is true, but unfair for all that. Her view is narrow, partial, materialistic. She has fallen completely under the influence of men with whom she should have no part. An Italian anthropologist is seldom worthy of admiration, much less of discipleship. It is absolutely and unreservedly wrong to exalt the body at the cost of the spirit. Education which gauges the soul and the capacities thereof by a crack in the head or a crook in the back or a bulb on the nose is not worthy of consideration by an intellectual person. Much less is it worthy of praise by a pure, sweet-souled woman like Maria Montessori. Neither would she praise it did she understand it. She does praise it, however. She commits herself unreservedly, not to Lombroso's statistics, but to Lombroso's philosophy. She makes his psychology and ethics her own to the extent of declaring that etiology applied to the Lombrosian doctrines reveals the faults of society, the sins of the world. In Lombrosianism and the hypothesis of De Giovanni concerning ontogenetic development she finds an ethical guide which leads toward the supreme ideal of the purification of the world and the perfection of the human species. Thus she replaces Christ, the hope of nations, by a sorry formula which has come to be ridiculed in every intelligent school of ethics.

Would that her words were at least obscure enough to permit a more lenient interpretation! They are not. Obscurity of statement is not one of the author's characteristics. Her doctrine pervades nearly all her pages. She returns to it again and again, driving at it now this way, now that, until finally she fairly startles the reader by exclaiming: "A defective physical development tells us that the psychic personality must also have its defects (especially in regard to the intelligence). . . . In the words of Rousseau: 'Our intellectual gifts, our vices, our virtues, and consequently our characters, are all dependent upon our organism.'"

These are unfortunate statements, impossible of defence and explanation. In view of them, we wonder how the Signora would explain the superb intellectuality of Pope, the cripple, and the genius of the all but chronic invalid, Heine? How would she account for the mental gifts of the sickly Darwin, the frail Shelley, the dyspeptic Carlyle, Spencer and De Quincey? Some explanation is required. The best would consist in a withdrawal of the statements.

But this is a small matter. Not so, however, the Dottoressa's remarkable assertion about vice and virtue. It shocks our very sense of decency to read that vice and virtue and character depend on our organism. St. Ignatius forsooth was virtuous because his stomach was wretchedly disordered. St. Theresa was ecstatic because her digestion was good. Xavier was an apostle because his frame was big. Berchmans was saintly because his intestines were diseased. If you do not like Tweedledee try Tweedledum. It is all the same. Vice, virtue, character depend on our organism, facts to the contrary notwithstanding. The very circumstance that the doctrine which sets forth a criminal type and identifies crime with sickness has begun to be considered outworn and threadbare even by radicals should have made Signora Montessori cautious.

There is no criminal type. Criminals are drawn from every rank and form and structure and condition of people under the sun. The cross-eyed girl is a thief and a liar; so, too, is the straight-eyed girl. The hunchback is a knave; so is he of the willowy form. The deaf man vents his spleen and uses his fists on his wife; so, too, does he whose ears are keen as a cat's. The beggar whose feet show through broken shoes steals a bite to eat; the bloated banker wrecks a bank through greed of gold or to pay his alimony. Crime and motives for crime take every form; are found, alas, in all ranks, amongst all classes and types, rich and poor, red-haired, black-haired, cross-eyed, normal-eyed, crooked, straight, and so on almost to the infinite. The opposite doctrine is a demon's tool for the perversion of individual and social morality.

Maria Montessori seems to appreciate this in a dim, hazy way. After making the astounding assertion that we are impotent in the face of the interrelation between physical and moral deformity, she asks, naively enough: "Is it, then, no longer a sin to do evil, no longer a merit to do good?" No, she answers. That is clear enough. But little that follows is clear. We are told to alter the interpretation of facts, and the result will be a high moral progress pointing to a new path in pedagogy. This might be convincing were it intelligible. Then there follows an irrelevant and befogged disquisition on instinctive acts, often opposite in nature, which deserve neither praise nor blame. Some men, it seems, are born with an instinct for good, some with an instinct for evil. One is physiologically a proletarian, another a capitalist. It is all a question of birth. Dante is quoted to support the main contention of the paragraph. The fault is not Dante's. His ethics are sound. The trouble lies in the fact that the Dottoressa has never learned the fundamental distinction between an actus humanus and an actus hominis.

In view of the novelty of the passage the Signora's reticences are regrettable. She should have described the physiology of a capitalist, and told us how comes it that men are born so; what does it all mean? One of our capitalists looks like a very shrewd fairy in breeches. Another wears feathers in her hat. A third changes his appearance with the season. In summer he resembles a "guid, bonnie laddie"; in winter he is just a common capitalist.

But this is unimportant. The moral aspect of the author's work is the real issue. And this aspect is, to say the least, decidedly peculiar. What good can come of such ideas as the following: "The European . . . has not the racial virtues (of the Chinaman). The race can permit itself the luxury of not being virtuous on its own account. Its biological conditions are so perfect that they (sic) have reached the fulness of life. . . . If virtue is the goal of the Chinese, happiness is the goal of the Europeans. . . . We ought to strive for the supreme result of producing men who will be happy: always keeping clearly before us the idea that the happy man is the one who may be spared the effort of thinking of himself, and dedicate all his energies to the unlimited progress of human society.

"The preoccupation of virtue, the voluntary sacrifice are in any case forces turned back upon themselves, that expend upon the individual energies that are lost to the world at large; nevertheless, such standards of virtue are necessary for certain inferior types."

Analysis is superfluous; comment unnecessary. However, in passing, we pray God to take Maria Montessori's superior types of people to Himself and give us the inferior type. The world is in sore need of "virtue and voluntary sacrifice." Given these, we shall be able to bear with equanimity the stigma of the name "inferior type." The designation is of little moment; the virtues which the Dottoressa treats so contemptuously are of supreme value.

All this speculation is a bit radical. But the good lady does not mean a bit of it. She does not understand most of it. She is emotional, romantic. Her feelings outrance her sober judgments, and she jots the former down before her maturer thoughts can apply a corrective thereto. She lacks intellectual poise and caution. She has never learned to peep into corners and dark holes wherein danger lurks. Her ardor for empiricism and her loyalty to Morselli hurry her on blindly to complete speculative agnosticism. She condemns the human mind to a ceaseless and perhaps fruitless search for the solution of the eternal problems which it offers itself. She has no doubt that philosophical problems are always in a state of evolution. Indeed, amongst them there obtains a natural selection whereby the strongest concepts are predisposed to prove victorious. This would be amusing were it not so decidedly dangerous. As it stands it is of a piece with a fundamental doctrine of Modernism, and offers quick and complete bankruptcy to all science.

Such, of course, is not the Signora's intention. She is but indulging a habit, and perchance a privilege of her sex. It is to be hoped that experience and kindly criticism will teach her that universal propositions are apt to prove treacherous at critical moments. Evidently she does not realize this as yet. As a consequence many statements unmentioned in this article are ridiculously false. For instance, it is not true that "the child of poverty is an inferior in stature, in cranium, in weight, in muscular and intellectual strength." The babies of the poverty-stricken Hebrews of the "East Side" have been awarded the prizes for perfect physique. The poor mothers of Ireland, whose diet consists of potatoes and buttermilk, and little enough of that, and whose wealth is measured by the clothes they wear and a few homely household utensils, will show the Signora seven stalwart sons and eight blooming daughters, firm of limb, keen of mind, clean of soul, ay, by the grace and love of God, as clean as any born of woman. Their craniums are not deformed, their limbs are not withered, their souls are not atrophied. They are the brawn of the earth. They are high-spirited. Their rise to lofty places in Church and State is not due to inferior intellects. Yet they are poor, pathetically so. And if this is not convincing the Signora should take ship to New York, and on landing there travel southward. The negro cabin will make her ashamed of her statement. Poverty will be great. Kinky heads will be numerous, but shapely. Lungs will be lusty; limbs strong; stomachs large and eager, and seldom full to sufficiency. And the youngsters will grow, under her very eyes, into lusty boys, lusty brawlers, lusty fighters. And Maria Montessori will go home to her sunny land and replace that word "poverty" by another more apt.

We trust so, at least. And we trust, too, that the good lady, for whom we have entire respect and sympathy, will hereafter choose better guides in psychology and ethics. For Maria Montessori, it is said, is a good woman; Maria Montessori is certainly an earnest, well-intentioned, hard-working woman; but Maria Montessori is a poor philosopher. Her doctrines would bring about a state of affairs which would justify Carlyle's statement, that civilization is anarchy plus the policeman.

CORRESPONDENCE

The Catholic University at Tokyo

The cornerstone of the first building of the great Catholic University, which, by Direction of Pope Pius X, the Fathers of the Society of Jesus have established at Tokyo, Japan, will soon be laid, with the usual formal ceremonies. Ground was broken early in September for the new building. It will be a three-story brick structure, accommodating about five hundred students. The first class of students, thirty in number, have entered upon a preparatory course. This little band is the nucleus of a student body that in future years will probably number thousands.

The founding of this College at Tokyo followed a suggestion to that effect made to the Holy See by his Eminence Cardinal O'Connell, of Boston, after his return to Rome from his memorable and successful diplomatic mission as the Special Envoy of the Holy Father to the Mikado, in 1905. We now learn from his Eminence's official organ, the Boston Pilot, that as a perpetual testimony to his sponsorship of the University, at the request of the Jesuit Fathers, he has written, with his own hand, a short document to be placed in the cornerstone with other documents.

Father Hoffman, the Superior of the Jesuit Missions in Japan, wrote to his Eminence as follows:

Jochi Daigaku,
Tokyo, Japan, Oct. 3, 1913.

YOUR EMINENCE:

Your Eminence will be pleased to hear that the great work of higher education under Catholic auspices in Japan, the primary impulse for which is due to your Eminence, is now in a fair way of progress. The first class of students, numbering some thirty, has entered upon a two years' preparatory course of English and German to fit themselves for higher education. In the beginning of September ground was broken for our new college building. It will be a handsome three-story brick structure accommodating some five hundred students, and will worthily represent Catholic education in the capital of the Mikado. At present the concrete foundations are being put in; the ceremony of laying the cornerstone is to take place in about two months from now. Among the documents to be enclosed in the cornerstone we should like to have a few lines from the hand of your Eminence, the first originator of the project, as a perpetual memento of your Eminence's kindly interest in our undertaking.

With the assurance of respect and devotion of our small community for your Eminence and with a prayer for your Eminence's continued favor, I remain,

Your Eminence's devoted servant in Christ,

(Signed) HERM. HOFFMAN, S.J.,
Superior of Mission of Society of Jesus in Japan.

Following is the reply of the Cardinal to Father Hoffman's communication:

ARCHBISHOP'S HOUSE, GRANBY STREET,
BOSTON, Oct. 31, 1913.

REV. HERMAN HOFFMAN, S.J.,

Jochi Daigaku, Tokyo, Japan.

DEAR FATHER HOFFMAN:

I am very happy to hear that the project, which by God's grace I had the honor of initiating, namely, the founding of a University under Catholic auspices in Japan, has finally come to fruition, and that you are about to lay the cornerstone of a college building in Tokyo, which will be in charge of the Jesuit Fathers.

The people of Japan will always be very dear to me, not only on account of the kindness of the reception they tendered me on the occasion of my visit as Special Envoy of the Holy Father to the Mikado, in 1905, but also on account of their naturally beautiful traits of character and of soul which should make them very dear to the heart of Our Lord.

It is my earnest wish that the work now so happily begun may be brought to splendid perfection to the greater glory of God and for the honor of Holy Church.

Sincerely yours in Xt.,

(Signed) ✠ WILLIAM CARDINAL O'CONNELL.
Abp. Boston.

Father Bernard Vaughan "At Home" at Farm Street

LONDON, October 29, 1913.

More correctly speaking, Father Bernard Vaughan, S.J., is "at home" when he is at 114 Mount street, Grosvenor Square—for, as is well known, the London headquarters of the Society of Jesus in one of the most fashionable districts of the metropolis really consists of two houses, the Mount street building being set apart for the residence of the "preaching" staff and the Farm street house for the staff of writers. And yet I am by no means certain that Father Bernard Vaughan does not find himself equally "at home" in the squalid East End back street where it was, not long ago, my privilege to accompany him on a tour of inspection and relief. With him, from the severe simplicity of the establishment in Mayfair to the squalor of a Thames-side slum, "there is but a step to be made."

Father Vaughan told me that he labored practically in secret for something like a twelvemonth in Whitechapel, sleeping two nights out of every seven in a room on the ground floor of a hovel—a room that was also his kitchen, dining-room and reception-room—in Lucas street, Commercial road. His furniture consisted of a deal table and two deal chairs, a camp bedstead, and a frying-pan. In the latter utensil I found him one day cooking his "dinner," consisting of some liver and bacon, in order that he might share it with an old woman, aged seventy, living in the same tenement-house—and who, by the way, walked two miles to her work every morning, earned six shillings a week, and paid eighteen pence a week rent! Then, after "dinner," Father Bernard would sally forth bell in hand, garbed in cassock and biretta and with crucifix hanging at his breast, into the purlieus of Periwinkle Square—quite a Dickensian touch about that appellation, is there not?—off the Commercial road. By four o'clock P. M. a vast, if poor and ragged, congregation would pack Periwinkle Square, and Father Vaughan, mounting a table, with the children grouped around him, would commence the service. First, he catechised the little ones, then preached an exhortation rather than a sermon, and afterwards heard confessions, visited the sick, etc. Small wonder that he speedily began to be idolized by the rough population of a locality so "dangerous" that it is given a wide berth even by the police. It was a noble and touching work.

While it is safe to say that, under whatsoever auspices he lectures or preaches, Bernard Vaughan's potent personality inevitably attracts huge and representative audiences, he is really more in his element among the poorest of the poor. He told the writer that he found just the least possible drawback to his mission work in the East End to be the residence in Whitechapel of so many thousands of Jews. "Not but what," he added with his humorous smile, "they are highly respectable citizens, and it takes all sorts and conditions of men and women to make a world."

Father Vaughan has ever been, in Kipling's familiar phrase, "a first-class fighting man," and innumerable are the battles he has won for Christ. His long-ago libel action against the Rock, when he was awarded three hundred pounds damages and three hundred pounds costs, is a case in point. He was conspicuous for his own cross-examination, whereof one present in court remarked that he had acquitted himself not merely like a good witness, but like counsel for both plaintiff and defendant and like a judge directing a jury! Another instance was when, some twenty years ago, Dr. Moorhouse rashly ventured to impeach the claims of Rome. Renting the Free Trade Hall at Manchester on ten consecutive Wednesdays, Father Vaughan addressed an audience of five thousand on every one of those days, and very effectually disposed of his opponent's every argument.

One or two of the following typically characteristic stories may possibly be unfamiliar to readers of AMERICA. Father Bernard had been preaching in the Gesù Church, at Rome, for the charities of Pope Leo XIII, when His Holiness made a witty mot. Several of the Cardinals having been heard to remark that Father Vaughan preached "just like an Italian," the Holy Father humorously remarked: "But you must know that he is an Italian—he was born on Vesuvius, and we merely sent him to England to cool!" On another occasion, after having preached at Cannes to a congregation that included the late King Edward VII and some fifteen other royal personages, somebody asked him: "Didn't you feel nervous before such a lot of royalties?" "No," rejoined Father Vaughan; "you see, I am accustomed to preach in the presence of Our Blessed Lord." Once staying at Cambridge as the guest of Dr. Butler, the famous Master of Trinity, he happened to be standing under Holbein's portrait of Henry VIII, when his host inquired: "What would you, as a Jesuit, do if His Majesty were to step from that canvas?" "I should request the ladies to leave the room!"

The Vaughans of Courtfield, one of the oldest Catholic families in Great Britain, were descended from that Herbert, Count of Vermandois, who came to England with William the Conqueror in 1066, and whose wife was Emma, daughter of the Count of Blois and of Adela, the Conqueror's daughter. King Henry V, who as a child was nursed at Courtfield by the Countess of Salisbury, knighted Roger Vaughan on the field of Agincourt in 1415; whilst another Countess of Salisbury, Margaret Pole, "the last of the Plantagenets," was also in the direct line.

Bernard Vaughan himself is one of the fourteen children of the late Col. Vaughan, of Crimean War fame. He was early destined for the army, but, as he laughingly says, "I put my money not on the rouge, but on the noir"—in other words, he preferred a black cassock to a scarlet coat. Educated at Stonyhurst College (of which his great grandfather was the founder), he passed through the sharp training of a novice of the Society of Jesus to become a professor at that college and, after four years of science and theology, to be ordained priest. In 1881 he first "stormed" London by preaching a remarkable Lenten course at Farm street on the divine life of the soul.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

The Socialist Vote

Socialist candidates have not greatly attracted public attention during the recent campaign, with the exception of certain localities. The fact that they have even suffered apparent defeats is likely, however, to be misconstrued. In New York the Socialist mayoralty candidate, Charles Edward Russell, received a total of thirty-two thousand votes, or roundly three thousand five hundred more than had been given him last year as candidate for the governorship. In very many election districts he outran the Tammany candidate.

It is true that in Schenectady the Socialist Mayor Lunn has been deposed, but only by a combination of non-partisans, as Seidel and Berger had been defeated in previous campaigns at Milwaukee. In each of these instances, however, Socialism has gained a substantial increase in votes. The very fact that in many cities the old parties have been forced to combine against the Socialists gives evidence that the Socialist strength is not negligible. In such cases even apparent defeat is a real triumph. At Paterson the silk strike prepared the way for a decisive Socialist victory during the recent elections. Old offices have been lost and new places have been won by the Socialists in various portions of the country. In general the Party has made no remarkable progress, for the reasons which have been explained in AMERICA. It has not, however, fallen back, but has only been retarded in its onward march by the countless divisions within its ranks. Its work of promoting class-hatred, radicalism and irreligion has in the meantime been carried on most actively in every section of the country. For the comparatively few that may be prepared to vote its ticket, there are countless others who have been more or less inoculated with its virus. A mind once perverted by radicalism can only rarely be brought back again to an appreciation or understanding of sound Christian principles. Here above all an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. Constant intelligent social instruction is required if Christian laborers are not to fall into the snares laid for them by Socialism. Active and constructive social work must be undertaken.

Minority Rights in Ulster

A good reductio ad absurdum of the Ulster Orange contention was presented by Mr. Erskine Childers in the London Times.

"Belfast excluded, the number of Catholics and Protestants is almost precisely equal, 597,573 and 597,176; a neat balance. Remedy clear: Make Belfast into a separate State. It has more inhabitants than five Canadian provinces, two Australian States, fourteen German States, and eleven Swiss cantons. But stay. Within Belfast there are 93,243 Catholics, mainly in one compact area; more than in six Swiss cantons, four German States, and the same as in Prince Edward Island. West Belfast, then, must be a State, too; and so on."

These facts seem to have effectively burst the Carsonite bubble; but a serious danger remains, that in their commendable anxiety for a peaceful settlement by consent, the Nationalist leaders will agree to an extension of local government in Northwest Ulster that would leave the Catholics at the mercy of the Orange majority. The persecutions of Nationalist workers and the industrial ostracizing of Catholics in Belfast indicate that little mercy or justice is to be expected in that quarter. The Catholics of Northeast Ulster have made more sacrifices for liberty and conscience during the last century, and especially in the Home Rule movement, than any other body in Ireland; and justice demands that in the final settlement their rights should be faithfully guarded.

The Advertising Church

The fact that a Methodist church in New York City announced not long ago, "a special baseball service" has made a correspondent of the Nation entertain a faint suspicion that "perhaps" there is at least "a tendency in some of the Protestant churches to resort to advertising methods which savor, at least, of moving-picture shows and the bargain counter." After expressing a doubt whether "sensationalism and blatant advertising" is a genuine remedy for the falling off that is observed in the attendance of Protestant churches, he graciously concedes that: "Whatever may be the fundamental errors of the Roman Catholic Church, it nevertheless commands the respect of many Protestants, because, to a marked degree, it maintains an impressive dignity. It does not attempt to be a vaudeville or a circus."

The Nation's correspondent then seems to marvel that the Protestant church fails to attract worshippers, notwithstanding the fact that; "she is to a marked degree divesting herself of many of the hideous doctrines of the old theology, and, apparently, to some extent is trying to adapt herself to theological conceptions which are both rational and spiritual." Now a mere Catholic onlooker would say that the fatal readiness of Protestantism to "divest herself" and "adapt herself" is just what is emptying her churches. Time was when she had a dogmatic system of a certain kind, "hideous," indeed it may have been, but still it had some consistency, and people felt bound to come and listen to her doctrine, whereas now even the announcement of "a special baseball service" will scarcely bring them to church. But Catholicism, needless to say, succeeds in filling her temples with worshippers several times every Sunday chiefly because she teaches with divine authority the same unchanging doctrine she received from the Apostles.

Phonetic Decay

English pronunciation, in the opinion of Dr. Robert Bridges, is on the road to ruin. To prove the fact and to offer a remedy he wrote an essay three years ago, and now that he is Poet Laureate, and feeling perhaps that he has become in consequence a sort of official guardian of the King's English, he has republished the work as a "Tract on the Present State of English Pronunciation." The danger he sees menacing the language lies in the conversational speech now being used in southern England. "A great number of our unaccented vowels," Dr. Bridges writes, "which have been for centuries losing their distinction, are coming now perilously near to being pronounced all alike, i. e., with the sound of the second syllable of the word danger, wherein neither the e nor the r is sounded, but in their place a sort of indeterminate vowel." Of, for instance, is pronounced erv; and, ernd; to, ter; suggest, sergest; affection, erfecshern; subordinate, serbordernate; equally, equerly; nature, neycher; Tuesday, Cheusdy, etc., etc.

It is the laziness of speakers, Dr. Bridges points out, that is responsible for this phonetic decay. The average man, provided he is understood, takes little pains to articulate distinctly. Ter he says easily and unconsciously, but tu he pronounces with awkwardness and self-consciousness. If his nurses, parents and teachers, however, had made him educate his lips and tongue during his early years, and had not allowed him to fall into slovenly habits of pronunciation, he would not feel self-conscious now, when he said, for instance, "I came from Oxford tu London," rather than "frerm Oxford ter London." "If children were taught from the first," is the Laureate's wise observation, "to differentiate the unaccented vowels correctly, they would do that as unconsciously as they now slur them. In French schools this is done: and that is the reason why their adults pronounce so well."

Though phonetic spelling is "full of horrors" to Dr. Bridges, he sees in a mild form of it the only means of arresting the process of decay that is daily removing the pronunciation of English further and further from its spelling. The orthography of a large number of our words is, of course, quite independent now of their pronunciation. Dr. Bridges cites, for instance, twenty-one ways, ranging from indictment to choir, of writing the sound of long i.

To solve the pronouncing difficulty and to put a stop to the phonetic decay now in operation, Dr. Bridges has devised a tentative alphabet made up of fifty-eight symbols, many of them resembling old Anglo-Saxon letters. By means of these new characters, or with the aid of little curls and tails and ligatures added to the old symbols, the exact value of every vowel and consonant is indicated. Silent terminal vowels are dropped and doubled consonants are made single.

Dr. Bridges' suggestions, however, are not likely to meet with a very wide or enthusiastic adoption. The printer for one would surely raise a loud protest against a twofold increase in the number of his lower-case letters. "Correct pronunciation," moreover, is a pretty variable and arbitrary matter, as a study of the different dictionaries will show. The sound of a living language's words, as time goes on, cannot but change. We know that many familiar words were pronounced in Shakespeare's time quite otherwise than we hear them now. Our Victorian pronunciations may become by the end of the present century nearly as obsolete and antiquated. Who knows? The Poet Laureate's monograph drives home, at any rate, one important lesson: Parents and teachers should make the children under their care enunciate distinctly.

Where Did Sœur Thérèse Get the Bank Note?

The Catholic takes the Church and everything connected with it so much as a matter of course that he does not conceive how it ruffles the feelings of those who are not Catholics. He talks of saints and miracles with an unscientific assurance that is a disgrace to the twentieth century, which believes chiefly in biology, geology, the other 'ologies, theology excepted, and the Press. We have been speaking a good deal lately about "The Little Flower of Jesus" and her miracles, in a way to move the spleen of the modern man and woman. At least one has been on the watch to catch us tripping over science or morals or anything else in the affair; and having, as he thought, caught us, he published his discovery and our disgrace in the Church of England periodical, the Guardian. The Carmelite nuns at Gallipoli are often in difficulties, and as these recur they invoke their little sister, Thérèse, who comes to their assistance with money. Once she put into the cash box a note for 50 francs. At this the "Gradgrind" of the Guardian—we hope he is a "Gradgrind," open to conversion, not a "Boulderby" obduratus et obcæcatus—exclaims that bank notes are "facts," strictly limited in numbers, possessed by definite individuals and payable by definite banks. Hence, to put a bank note in a cash box, Thérèse, who lives now in the heavenly country, where bank notes do not circulate, must either have stolen the note, or forged it. Both suppositions are impossible. Hence, the triumphant conclusion is implied, that the whole story is a fib, unless some other explanation can be given, as "Gradgrind" remarks, with generous confidence in its impossibility.

Explanations are as "plentiful as blackberries" almost. Another Guardian correspondent points out that in working miracles the saints are not the principal agents. The miracle is God's work, and one can hardly accuse God of theft or of forgery. How Thérèse in glory got hold of a terrestrial bank note is of as little importance morally as how the fish got hold of the tribute money. It is interesting as a matter of speculation, and correspondent No. 2 suggests that should correspondent No. 1 have the happiness of meeting Thérèse in heaven, she will, perhaps, satisfy his curiosity, should it survive the change from its natural earthly atmosphere.

The writer of "Notes" in the Tablet says that "it is simply the old story of the widow's cruse. There the oil was withdrawn, and yet the amount left in the cruse was undiminished. Here—on the hypothesis of a miracle—the wonder was reversed. A bank note was apparently added to the liabilities of the bank of issue, and yet its total indebtedness was not increased." We do not intend for a moment to dissent from the possibility of this explanation, though the two causes are not quite parallel. In the case of the oil the multiplication was specific only, the cruse was always full, no matter how much was withdrawn. In the case of the note it must have been individual. Every note has its definite number, and the miraculous note must in the Tablet's explanation have borne the number of another. Still, this would not invalidate the explanation; but a simpler one suggests itself to the writer, who in his youth passed some years in a bank of issue.

A glance at the Note Circulation Account of every such bank shows that there are a good many notes issued that never come back. They are lost, and as such become res nullius. Some are hidden away so effectively by misers, as never to be found by the heirs; others are dropped and blown away by the wind; others are burned when houses catch fire; others go down with foundering ships. The lost notes give a supply exceeding all demands that miracles will ever make.

Does He Mean It?

Goblet d'Alviella used to be spoken of as the Grand Master of the Belgian Freemasons. Can it be he who wrote an article lately in one of the magazines—the Paris La Croix does not tell us which—admitting that "there is an incontestable religious reaction in Europe," inspired by the wish to put an end to what he properly calls "the moral anarchy which has already lasted too long." He insists that materialism has met its Waterloo, and that the withered spiritual condition of Europe is about to change.

This is a consoling prophecy if faith could be put in it. What suggests a gentle scepticism in the matter is that this old militant still belongs, we believe, to the intolerant party which calls itself Liberal, whose dominant purpose has been for more than a quarter of a century to abolish all the religious schools of Belgium. Indeed, simultaneously with the announcement comes the news that the Provincial Council of Brabant granted a subsidy of 25,000 francs to the University of Brussels, which has only 1,200 students, but refused to give anything to Louvain, which has 2,900 on its roster. It is true that Louvain is not a State or provincial establishment, but neither is Brussels. The reason of the discrimination is that the latter is masonic and rationalistic; the former is Catholic.

Perhaps M. Goblet's utterance is only a post-election device. When the polls open again the old anti-clerical flame may burst out anew. We are used to tactics of that kind in our own country and usually discount them. They often have the very opposite effect of what was intended.

Meantime, however, an outsider is puzzled to know how, when the general Government has been so long stanchly Catholic and has achieved such success, these provincial and municipal councils remain so openly and defiantly antagonistic. Had the Liberals been in power they would not have been so lenient to their Catholic opponents. The remorselessness of their action back in the 70's, when they cancelled the elections of provincial and communal officials, is still fresh in peoples' memories. But Belgian Catholics are vigorous upholders of political liberty. Their adversaries are not.

Three Jubilees

Three jubilees of distinguished Jesuits were celebrated at Valkenburg, October 15. The first of the jubilarians was the octogenarian Father Augustine Lehmkuhl, who commemorated on that day the sixtieth anniversary of his entrance into the Society of Jesus. The Holy Father, Pope Pius X, in his own hand wrote a letter congratulating him upon his great work as a moral theologian and as a writer upon ascetic and mystic theology. Only within recent years he had begun to edit his valuable ascetico-mystic library, at the special request of the late Cardinal Fischer. The second of the great trio was Father Victor Cathrein, who celebrated his golden jubilee of the religious life. As an authority upon philosophical, moral and social questions, he is known throughout the world. A new work of Catholic apologetics, we understand, is soon to be added to his already numerous publications. The third to be honored upon that day, as likewise commemorating his fiftieth year in the Society of Jesus, was Father Rüt. Although less widely known than his fellow jubilarians, he enjoys the highest esteem in the Order itself as a scientist who for long years has been devoted to the teaching of chemistry. He is at present preparing a large work upon this subject. All three men, with their records of faithful and meritorious service for the Church, are continuing unwearied in their great labors. Such are the religious whom Germany considers dangerous to the Fatherland, and who in exile are offering up their lives for it and for the cause of Christ. May their labors still continue for many years to come and may others take pattern from their lives.

The anonymous author of "Home," a serial running in the Century Magazine, introduces into the November instalment of the story, Father Matthias, a priest whose moral theology is certainly as "Jesuitical" as the most Protestant readers could desire. For we find the priest advising a non-Catholic who already has a wife in the United States, to marry a Brazilian girl.

"Why make a mountain out of a distant molehill!" asked Father Matthias. "Need your two worlds ever clash? You lose nothing. You give peace to the girl, who is ready to renounce the rights and privileges of Mother Church rather than say a word that might frighten you away. . . . The girl is all I am thinking of—the girl and the children. . . . After all, it is a small thing for you to do. You and I will know the marriage is illegal, but it is big odds that the law will never know it. . . . In the balance against peace of mind, lies are feathers. Besides, we all live a lie, anyway. Our ambition should be to live a big, kindly lie and not a mean, self-centered one."

So Father Matthias "married" the lovers and then went off to register the documents. Many of the Century's readers doubtless found highly entertaining this travesty on the marriage legislation of the one Church that has always upheld consistently the sacredness and unity of matrimony. But were the Catholic subscribers of that periodical equally pleased?

The famous ritual murder trial at Kief in Russia, which began on October 8, ended on November 10 by the acquittal of the accused Mendel Beiliss.

The facts of the case are as follows:

Andrew Yuschinsky, 13 years old, of Christian parentage, was found murdered in March, 1911. His body was discovered in a cave. There were forty-seven small wounds on the body, apparently made with an awl, but physicians believe that the awl wounds were inflicted before a death wound was made in the heart by a knife. The body had been drained of blood.

The court sat every Sunday and on most days the session lasted until far into the night. Several hundred witnesses were examined. Few of the witnesses knew anything about Beiliss.

The greater part of the testimony in the case was devoted to a discussion of ritual murder, whether or not it existed.

Troops with fixed bayonets guarded the court house and mounted Cossacks with drawn sabres patrolled the streets, to prevent anti-Semitic outbreaks. The authorities were prepared to take every precaution to prevent a pogrom.

When the verdict was announced, a roar of protest went up from the crowd that jammed the court room. It was quickly taken up by the throng outside. The accused was conducted to his home by soldiers to protect him from the mob.

LITERATURE

Famous Modern Battles. By A. HILLIARD ATTERIDGE, with Maps and Plans. Boston: Small, Maynard and Company. $1.75.

The Crimean War ended the forty years of peace that followed Waterloo, and began the era of modern wars. Hence this book opens very properly with the Battle of the Alma. It includes one battle, or more, of every great war since, closing with that of Lule Burgas in the Balkan War of last year. It contains an account too, of the Battles of Santiago and Paardberg; which, if they do not deserve, from a military point of view, to stand in the same category with Chancellorsville, Plevna and Mukden, can certainly be called famous, from the point of view of the readers, American and English, of this work.

The narrative is easy and picturesque. Tactics and strategy are explained comprehensively, in such a way as with the assistance of the maps, to be quite intelligible to the ordinary reader. We are not sure that the Frenchmen will accept the author's story of the Alma; in fact De la Gorce gives a very different account of it. But it does not follow, therefore, that the story in this book is not true in the main. On the other hand, even the French will read with approval, the account of Rezonville and Gravelotte. It is no detraction from von Moltke to show how exaggerated were the ideas current after 1870, of the machine-like working out of his strategy that made the condition of the French absolutely hopeless. It is not too much to say that had any one besides Bazaine been in command Rezonville would have been a decisive victory, and there would have been neither Gravelotte nor Sedan. Mr. Atteridge shows very well how Ducrot might have, at least, postponed the latter catastrophe, had he not been sacrificed to Wimpffen: he does not, we think, do sufficient justice to MacMahon, by bringing out clearly how absolutely he was deprived of initiative by the Minister of War. There are a few errors in spelling, as, "Wimpfenn," for "Wimpffen," and the too common "Gallifet" for "Galliffet."

All ages will find this book extremely interesting. We can recommend especially to those who are beginning to think of Christmas presents. Any boy or young man with historical or military tastes, will read and re-read it eagerly.

H. W.

Worldlyman, A Modern Morality of Our Day. By PERCY FITZGERALD. New York: Benziger Bros. 80 cents.

"I have only one failing, and that is, I can never deny myself anything," was the naive confession of "Worldlyman" whose story is the latest of the two-hundred volumes or so which the versatile Mr. Percy Fitzgerald has "accused" himself of writing. When Worldlyman was a boy at Saxon-hurst, he made a lifelong friend of Father S. Sepulchre who used to warn him even then against joining the "Piety and Pleasure Company, Limited." But when Worldlyman came into his twenty thousand pounds a year, the priest foresaw what a hard task the young heir would have getting to Heaven, so he determined to keep an eye on him to the very end. Worldlyman spent his money like a prince, lost his health living riotously and to recover it started for America on the luxurious and "unsinkable" liner Leviathan in the company of a merry party of friends. On the Captain's birthday Sir Joel Chattels, the richest man aboard, made a speech in praise of those who had at last built an "unsinkable" ship that could "bid defiance to all the enemies that make the sea so dangerous." Rounds of applause. "What eloquence these millioned men have! How suitably they speak!" But the covert blasphemy awoke the slumbering faith of Worldlyman. He indignantly arose and begged all good and orthodox folk who were listening "to say aloud that without the assistance and supervision of the Almighty, which he prayed devotedly they would have, they could not make a safe voyage."

When the Leviathan not long after, struck a submerged iceberg, Father S. Sepulchre mysteriously appears at Worldlyman's prayer and prepares him and many others for a good end. The priest dwells with enthusiasm on the opportunity they now have of dying well. "See how everything is favorable, delightfully so; time, health, clear-headedness! We can lift up our hearts and pray, and see, and walk deliberately to the very edge." He is eager that Worldlyman should have a correct idea of death: "It's life, man, the real life; it is a beginning, not an end; a happiness, not a pain; a meeting, and not a parting; to be desired, not feared." There is matter in Mr. Fitzgerald's book for many a good sermon and meditation, and his wit sparkles from almost every page. As the "unsinkable" Leviathan goes down, Father Sepulchre rejoices at the salutary effect the disaster will have on the hundreds of thousands who will read of it, and "try to think what we thought, place themselves in our situation, and strive to find an answer to the question: 'How would I behave under similar conditions?'" This excellent "Morality" of Mr. Fitzgerald's teaches the right answer.

Maria, die Liebe und Wonne des Menschengeschlechtes. Von P. P. SEEBÖCK, O.F.M., Felizian Rauch. Innsbruck. 65 cents.

This book is a new addition to the sodalist's library. The writer, who is well known for his popular ascetical works, has chosen the names of seventy-two eminent servants of Mary, and under each has gathered together pious episodes, sayings and writings attributed to the great men and women, mostly canonized Saints, whose pictures in miniature are thus hung in his Marian gallery. Devout souls will find here many useful and happy suggestions for honoring their Queen and Mother, while directors of sodalities will be glad to place the book among their works of reference.

Lightships and Lighthouses. By FREDERICK A. TALBOT, Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Company. $1.50.

This is an extremely interesting book. While it does not pretend to be scientific, it is sufficiently so to give any one, who has made a high school course in physics, an intelligent idea of the construction of the lighthouse tower, and of the lantern itself. From it one learns the difficulties to be overcome in the building of a lighthouse on a rock or reef out at sea, and the tedium to be endured by the light-keepers in lighthouse and lightship during the stormy winters. It is a book to please anybody and is a suitable gift for a boy. We would say that it would be hard to find a more suitable one, were it not for the deplorable English of the author. He often writes in such a way as to prove that he has but the haziest idea of the meaning of words. This is a serious defect. A book to be read by young people, should be in good style; and the more it is likely to hold their attention, the more carefully should the style be attended to. We have remarked this already with regard to other books of this author; and we should be gratified to see in future works or editions such an improvement as would allow us to give them a commendation without reserve.

Glimpses of Latin Europe. By THOMAS J. KENNY, A.M., S.T.B., Baltimore: John Murphy Company. $1.75.

This is an account of what the author saw in Spain, Southern France and Italy during a visit to Europe to attend the Eucharistic Congress in Madrid. It tells, amongst other things, of Lourdes, Rome and the noble Eucharistic celebration that drew its author across the Atlantic. Some of the subjects are trite enough, but the fervent piety and the descriptive skill with which they are treated, make them new. The illustrations are many and good; and there is an interesting chapter on Tangiers. We are sure that those who choose it for a Christmas gift to young or old will have no reason to regret their choice, and we recommend heads of colleges, academies and schools to make a note of it against the time for buying prizes. It is a pity that Catholic publishers do not seem to employ proofreaders competent to exclude the misprints with which this, like too many of our Catholic books, is disfigured.

Student und Vinzenzverein. Von HANS GRUNDEL.

Meine Residenzarbeit. Von INA JÜNEMANN.

Die Früchte einer sozialstudentischen Bewegung. Von DR. HERMANN PLATZ. M. Glabach: Volksvereins-Verlag. Each 40 pf.

A series of well-written and neatly-printed pamphlets which we would like to see in the hands of our Catholic American students are the successive numbers of the Studenten-Bibliothek published by the Social Secretariate for Student Work. They are highly suggestive and stimulating and open vistas of glorious possibilities for practical social usefulness on the part of our students of both sexes. The first booklet, "Student und Vinzenzverein," describes the work of students' Vincentian organizations, which might likewise be carried on by a College sodality. The author, Hans Grunzel, is a student of philosophy who appeals to his fellow-students to win new apostles for this grand work. In the same manner a series of scenes descriptive of her visits to the poor in factories and tenements is given by Ina Jünemann. With deft literary touches she pictures her work as a student among the destitute and afflicted, as well as among the German laborers and working women, and the splendid activities of the Secretariate for Social Student Work, in her little volume, "Meine Residenzarbeit." By placing students under older and experienced social workers, they will learn to understand, without danger to themselves, the meaning of poverty and misery and the great mission which is open to them. A social conscience will thus be awakened among Catholics. The wealthier the students the greater likewise is the need of such lessons. A spirit of deeper seriousness and a sense of responsibility on the part of our Catholic student body will thus be developed. An erudite and zealous treatise is furthermore contributed to this series by Dr. Hermann Platz. His pamphlet, "Die Früchte einer sozialstudentischen Bewegung," traces the growth of social ideas in France. It is likewise a valuable contribution to the intellectual and literary life of Catholicism in that country. We hope that these booklets will not only find many readers among American professors and pupils, but will arouse a spirit of Christian rivalry in our own colleges. J. H.

Viajes Científicos, por el PADRE RICARDO CIRERA, S.J. Tortosa, España: El Observatorio del Ebro.

This little book treats of the author's many journeys in connection with his scientific work. Father Cirera is the founder and director of the well-known Observatory of the Ebro. Viajes Científicos is not a diary of places and of the persons met in the author's travels, but might be termed some general impressions on the progress of science. The work is in a popular style and is a product of the plan of the Jesuit Fathers of the Observatory of the Ebro to publish, along with their more technical bulletin, various works of a less technical and more popular character in order to arouse in Spain a widespread interest in scientific questions. In this connection we are informed that a weekly scientific review, to be known as Iberica, is soon to be published.

In his little volume Father Cirera gives us some general impressions on the growth of observatories and tells of the constantly increasing interest in meteorology and seismology. After speaking of the general progress of science and its causes, we are brought to a question which is of interest to those desirous of knowing how an educated Spaniard, one recognized for his work in the scientific world, looks upon the present scientific position of his country. Under the title "Algo sobre España" the author, in giving his views on the state of scientific culture in Spain, informs us that he is considering only facts and not the very general foreign opinion of Spanish progress. The ordinary foreign view of Spain is drawn from pictures of bull-rings and from the exaggerated and even invented newspaper accounts of civil disorders. The real Spain and its people are not known. The Scientific Congress of Granada, the International Exposition of Lunar Studies, held in Barcelona, and the various scientific congresses of the Spanish Society passed unnoticed in the foreign press. The work being done in agriculture and in solving difficult irrigation problems is known only to the well-informed foreign scientific scholar. Excellent observatories and well-equipped scientific schools and laboratories have been established in the country, while the publication of the monumental Encyclopedia of Espasa is something of more than national significance. In giving the general impressions of his many scientific journeys through the various countries of the world, Father Cirera draws the following conclusion: Spain is not the inferior nation in scientific culture that many believe; she is inferior only to the group of great nations of central Europe; apart from these nations, and considered only in the reality and not in the false light of foreign opinion, Spain may rest satisfied with the state of its scientific culture and progress when compared with other countries.

Glaubensschild und Geistesschwert. (The Shield of Faith and the Sword of the Spirit.) By Dr. ANTON LEINZ. Herder, St. Louis, Mo. $1.45.

These apologetic sermons breathe the spirit of the Ecclesia Militans. The title, the reverend author, who is an army chaplain, the numerous examples drawn from the soldier's life, even the energetic, sometimes almost choppy style suggest that there were military uniforms in the audience. The tone, however, is not aggressive or controversial, but strong and convincing in defence and explanation of Catholic doctrine.

The addresses are rather short. There are over seventy in four hundred and forty pages, but they are not intended to give a full exposition of the subject treated. They are merely a few striking thoughts, usually grouped around a very appropriate illustration taken from Scripture, history and the daily chronicle. This method cannot fail to engage the close attention of the hearer and reader and leave a strong impression on his mind.

As a help for preachers the book will prove a valuable repertory of illustrations and good thoughts, which they can easily develop and supplement with appeals to the heart of their hearers.

Questions d'enseignement de Philosophie Scolastique. Par le PÈRE PAUL GENY. Paris: Gabriel Beauchesne. 3 francs.

This is a collection of essays by a Professor of the Gregorian University, and it is well worthy of serious study by all interested in the teaching of scholastic philosophy. The first and most important essay is a plea for a change in the place that General Metaphysics, or Ontology, holds in the curriculum, and a division of its matter, so that students may be occupied in those points that have an immediate bearing on subjects about to be taken up. These preliminary views, moreover, the author would restrict as much as possible, while he would put the formal study of Ontology at the end of the course. He argues the question with much force and erudition, and he is able to cite many supporters of his ideas amongst the experienced teachers of to-day.

We feel a certain difficulty in controverting the views of such men. We think that we may take, nevertheless, the liberty of pointing out a practical difficulty. If Natural Science were on good terms with Metaphysics we should not be averse to the changes proposed. But Natural Science in its professors is too often hostile to Metaphysics. We know that there are some, and these of the highest reputation, who are loyal to the metaphysical notions of matter, form, substance, accident, quantity, extension, etc., but there are many who take on these the current ideas of chemists and physicists without any metaphysical training at all. We fear that if our students become familiar with false notions in classes of Natural Philosophy, in which, because they see a good deal with their bodily eyes, they may think that they see everything, theories included, in the same way, they will hardly be persuaded to abandon them in the school of metaphysics. This has occurred, apparently, to Père Geny; for he gives in his second essay a scheme of a general course of Natural Science for students in letters and arts, which, though we approve of it heartily, will not, we think—and Père Geny seems to confess as much—commend itself to the professors of Natural Science for several reasons; and of these not the least is that it would take away the danger we have mentioned. We think, too, that Père Geny exaggerates the incompetency of the ordinary First-Year Philosopher in matters metaphysical, and that this young person grasps more than Père Geny admits. But into this error, the more profound the philosopher is, the more prone is he to fall.

Taking as a source-book "The Life and Letters of Lady Sarah Lennox," a fair but frail English woman of the eighteenth century, Katharine Tynan has constructed a historical novel entitled "Rose of the Garden." (Bobbs-Merrill, $1.35.) As Lady Sarah was divorced by her husband because she ran off with another man, and the whole disgraceful story along with that of her subsequent marriage to a third man, is rather sympathetically told in this book, Katharine Tynan's Catholic admirers will wish that she had chosen a more virtuous heroine for this latest novel of hers.

"Catholic Priests Distinguished Protestants Have Known," is a pamphlet intended as an antidote against literature of the Menace type which seeks to defame the Church by singling out the priesthood for its calumnious attacks. "Of all institutions, human or divine," says the Foreword, "perhaps none is more exposed to criticism, vituperation and calumny than the priesthood in the Catholic Church. Invented accusations are repeated and exaggerated, and actual offences are given the greatest possible notoriety and are generalized in the most unscrupulous manner. If one priest sins, his failing is charged to the whole priesthood, the entire Church." The authors have selected, as the other side of the picture, eleven notable instances of priest heroes to whom distinguished Protestants have given the just meed of praise, so to set against one Judas, the eleven saints. The pamphlet is published by the Central Bureau of the Central Verein, St. Louis, and is sold for three cents per copy.

"Zur Würdigung der deutschen Arbeiter-Sozialpolitik" is a defence of the social reform policies of the German Government in answer to an indiscriminate attack made upon them by a Berlin professor. The author, Dr. Franz Hitze, is one of the most prominent social reform leaders in Germany, a member of the Reichstag and a foremost champion in the cause of Catholic organization. Additional articles by Dr. Wuermeling and Dr. Fassbender complete the work. The publication is issued by the Volksverein-Verlag of M. Gladbach. Price, 1.60 M.

The volume "Zentrum und Katholizismus," issued by the International Publishing Company "Messis," of Amsterdam, deals with the dissensions among Catholics in the critical question of the relationship of the Centre to Catholicism. Dr. Krueckemeyer has essayed the difficult task of compiling the material which he hopes will enable the reader to form his own judgment. It is an unhappy controversy about which "the less said, the better," except where it becomes necessary to clarify the ideas of those concerned. How far the book is really called for it is hard to say at our distance. Price M. 3, 60.

THE DRAMA

Depth Calleth Unto Depth

The Dramatic Mirror comes to the rescue of Mr. Benson who was accused of snubbing New York a short time ago by refusing to show how much of a Shakespearian actor he was. It publishes a letter of Mr. Benson which says that "all great cities are so ugly and inhuman that they cannot be cradles or nurseries of art." That only makes matters worse; for New York being the biggest of American cities is consequently the ugliest and most inhuman and is, above all others, to be shunned by self-respecting artists.

Nevertheless, according to Sir J. Forbes-Robertson, such plays are good commercial investments, and therefore should naturally seek New York. Sir Henry Irving also vouches for their earning capacity—"Hamlet" especially being a drawing card. But Sir J. Forbes-Robertson insists on an occasional descent into the depths. Hence his travesty of "Antony and Cleopatra," to which we have already referred, and his new affirmation of that belief in restaging the ancient atrocity of "The Sacrament of Judas."

In the French Revolution an unfrocked monk, who is also a priest, is announced as "never having administered a Sacrament"; a feature probably adduced by way of palliation. He is an occupant of a peasant's hut and is supporting himself as a schoolmaster. An aristocrat pursued by soldiers appears on the scene, and as he is about to be shot asks the apostate priest to hear his confession. This is "the Sacrament of Judas." In the recital of his sins the penitent reveals the fact that he had wronged the peasant girl whom the apostate had been asked by the revolutionists to marry; whereupon Sir Forbes-Robertson who was acting the part of the confessor, depicts by "the clinching of his left hand," the struggle going on in his mind. Shall he kill the penitent or absolve him? He elects the latter and after marrying the twain and helping them to escape, reveals himself on the balcony in his monk's garb and is promptly shot by the guards in the presence of the audience.

Although the play is a translation of the French, it reeks with invraisemblances, a reproach which good French writers abhor. Escaped monks do not usually carry their robes with them, especially when flitting about peasants' huts in such dangerous times as the French Revolution; nor were they likely to be schoolmasters among people who are alleged to have been abnormally poor and illiterate; nor were French huts in those days supplied with balconies, but one was needed for the concluding thrill; nor should Sir Forbes-Robertson devote his great ability to portraying what is essentially offensive to Catholics and other respectable people. He is evidently affected by the public clamor for what is horrible, and like so many others yields to it. Indeed the sense of propriety seems to have entered into that state which the late Mayor Gaynor described as "intellectual spissitude." Thus for instance the unspeakable Gaby Deslys whose floral family or stage name is in violent contradiction with her conduct, asks a parson who has written a play to let her into the caste, because she says "it is a highly Christian and moral performance." Gaby has lost her right to talk on such subjects.

But she has a rival in Roland B. Molineux "who," the press reminds us, "once stood within the shadow of the electric chair," and has just married after his divorce. Assuredly the galaxy of distinguished dramatic authors must be delighted by the apparition of this effulgent luminary. Indeed, David Belasco is quoted as "expecting great things from this vice drama and does not propose to relinquish his right in the Criterion before next Spring."

Meantime the Rockefeller Report on White Slavery which was generally denounced as unfit for circulation is to evade the condemnation by getting before the public in another and more dangerous fashion. The Universal Film Company has dramatized it under the title "The Traffic in Souls," and according to the New York Times of November 3, "the pictures, which, it is said, will be more realistic than several of the vice plays, are to be produced under the direction of the Traveler's Aid Society and other organizations which look out for the welfare of young girls in the cities. They are to be put on the picture screen in a New York theatre for a special performance at an early date.

"The pictures are staged," said one of the officers of the society, "to depict vividly the inner workings of the vice interests in New York City, and the snares that are being laid for young girls as described in the report. It shows the nets that the 'agents' prepare at the large steamship piers, at the railroad stations, at the dance halls, and the stores. Considerable stress is placed, too, upon the systematization of the vice interests, and the division of the spoils and profits.

"Ever since the Rockefeller report was issued, heads of settlements and social workers from all over the country have urged us to present the white slavery peril so that it would provide a lesson and a warning for every young girl. This we have endeavored to do, and in such a manner as to show them the way to escape the pitfalls. We have shown none of the glamour of vice, and have portrayed only its horrible, repulsive side, so that no phase of the life may appear in the leastwise attractive. As the picture stands, we believe it to be a tremendous warning for all young women all over the world, and for that reason, we are going to send it to every country for presentation."

This pious resolution of a money-making concern to display "the inner workings of vice" will not, as its promoters assure us, "be a tremendous warning for all young women all the world over." On the contrary it will be a most effective means of disseminating vice and in extending the very traffic it proposes to suppress.

"The promoters of this scheme," says the Times, "are incurring a fearful responsibility," and the question naturally arises, are the decent people of this country or any other country going to permit them to incur this responsibility? If New York fiercely pursued and jailed the systematized and organized band of fire-fiends who were destroying life and property in the Metropolis, why is there not some law to prevent the men who deliberately plan such a world-wide havoc in human souls, whether it be for the purpose of gain or because of the insensate philanthropy behind which it screens itself. It costs about a dollar to see an indecent play, but with this latest moving-picture scheme, millions of hitherto innocent children can purchase damnation for a nickel. Something should be done and done quickly.

EDUCATION

Parochial Schools Use Facilities of Public Schools—Professor Adams, London University, on American Schools.

Mention has been made several times in this column of the interesting situation which in Altoona, Pa., grew out of the most recently enacted school code of Pennsylvania. One section of that code provides for manual training schools and other auxiliary adjuncts to the ordinary common school course. The Catholic tax-payers of Altoona made the claim that their children, although attending the parochial schools of the city, should share in the opportunity for training existing in the splendidly equipped manual training department of the public schools. The claim was not allowed by the school board and a legal battle followed in the Courts to be determined whether parochial school pupils could be justly excluded from these auxiliary institutions provided for by the new Educational Code of the State. The Judge of the County Court, to whose lot fell the first learning of the case, decided that not only do the pupils of the Parish schools have the right to attend any one or all of the courses offered in the city's public schools as they may desire, but that every private school scholar enjoys a similar right. His interpretation of the disputed section of the new code was later fully approved by the Justices of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, and the Altoona parochial school pupils were permitted to register regularly for the extra courses in the city schools whilst attending the parish schools and receiving the rest of their education there.

A like happy combination was effected some time ago in Grand Rapids, Mich., without any recourse to the Courts having been required. Three years ago the department of manual training in the public schools of Michigan City was opened to the children of the parochial schools, and the experiment of admitting these to its advantages at the close of the afternoon's sessions in their own institutions is proving most successful. The City Superintendent at the time contended that the children of Catholic taxpayers should be welcomed to any part of the public school curriculum of which they wished to avail themselves. During the three years the attendance of the parochial school pupils at the afternoon courses in the training school has increased 100 per cent., and the results have been satisfactory alike to both public and parochial school authorities. It has even been suggested that the Sisters who teach in the Catholic schools be given opportunity to enjoy the facilities at hand for manual training instruction on Saturday mornings.

It is useful for us to have the independent judgment of outsiders confront us now and then, it helps to take us out of a groove and to avoid the complacency of mere subjectivism. Such an opportunity comes to American schoolmen through the candid statement of the impressions left upon the mind of Professor John Adams, a well-known Professor of Education at the University of London, who had lately made an intimate study of American schools. Shortly following his return from America, where he gave a course of lectures on "Education" to students in the universities of Colorado and Illinois, Professor Adams was interviewed by a representative of the Morning Post of London. His general view of educational condition with us is favorable, more so than one usually finds to be the case with an Englishman speaking of America.

"In everything educational they are just a bit ahead of us, whether in good or evil," he said to the Post interviewer. "A very great interest is taken in education; it is regarded as a living force which counts materially, and not as a something extra—the average Englishman's view, I am sorry to say. Perhaps the shadow of the sectarian problem is beginning to rise in America in the case of the Roman Catholics, who, I think, will soon begin to ask for separate schools. But in the meantime the Americans are free from our chief difficulty, and education on the other side of the Atlantic is generally in a very live condition, less bookish than ours and readier, almost as a consequence, to introduce the other media which are in more direct touch with the world around. Scouting, for instance, has a better chance in their schools, and everywhere I found the liveliest interest in Sir Robert Baden-Powell's work."

Professor Adams finds it a "singular fact" that while women predominate in American education, almost all the chief administrative posts are held by men. He notes some striking exceptions, such as the "famous Mrs. Young, City Superintendent of Schools in Chicago." Freedom between teacher and child is a "main characteristic of education in the States" is another fact which the London Professor comments upon. "The pupils," he remarks, "are always more prominent than with us; the teacher is less often in the limelight. This freedom of intercourse, he adds, is beginning to develop in English schools; perhaps, in America, it is carried to excess, and a little more restraint, a wholesome strain of austerity were better for the nation.

According to Professor Adams, the predominance of women among the teaching body may account for much.

"I have nothing but admiration for the work of women teachers, but it seems to me that the kind of order maintained by a woman in a class of boys ranging in age from 13 to 15 is not, somehow or other, the most healthy type of discipline. In America this employment of women in the teaching of the highest classes of the boys is altogether an economic question. Men regard teaching as a mere stepping-stone which they leave as soon as they can stride to the next—it is not at all an organized profession for men—and this fact explains what at first surprises one, that so many Americans distinguished in the law and in politics have at one time or another been schoolmasters. We in Britain may, sooner, or later come face to face with the problem of a dearth of male teachers. The proportion of women over men in our schools has gradually increased under the Education act. In Scotland, in 1888, the numbers of men and women certified teachers were, I think, about equal, but women are now preponderating there."

In visiting the schools of the country, Professor Adams was particularly impressed by the cheerful brightness of the atmosphere pervading them,—a "sense of gladness" he found running through the whole of our educational system.

"The Americans do not put up shabby buildings in dingy streets," he remarks, "as I lately have seen in the South of France, but make their schools the centre of social life. Parents visit the schools frequently while lessons are going on, and in many cities the Parents' Associations are doing good work in creating closer interest between home and school, citizen and teacher. Here, again, however, it is mostly women; their husbands are too much absorbed in business to give heed to these matters. 'When do you see your children?' I would ask an American father. 'Oh, on Saturday nights and Sunday mornings,' would be the answer nine times out of ten."

The general good behavior of the American child calls for very complimentary reference in the English schoolman's review of his visit. He naively admits that this is not the usual impression made by our young people upon foreigners, but his experience happened to be a more pleasant one than is usually the case. However, he is candid enough to admit that the children of America are sui generis.

"One may put it that there are no babies in America—they seem to start life grown up. Whatever may be the case elsewhere, in America it is true, as Professor Bagley puts it: 'A child is the most serious thing in Nature.' Certainly there is almost no baby talk, which, of course, is psychologically right, but a certain human charm seems to be lost in consequence. In the schools corporal punishment is not used, which often makes it trying for the teacher, there being no stern disciplinary background, and that is really all the cane is in English schools."

Very probably Professor Adams would have modified his opinion somewhat had he had occasion to deal more directly with the young people in the schools of the United States. The lack of the "stern disciplinary background" does indeed make it trying for the teacher,—so trying that in the closing session of the great meeting of the National Educational Association held in San Francisco some years ago, the representative public school teachers of the land there assembled did not hesitate to frame a strong indictment of the young people in their charge. Deploping conditions which "demand the earliest thought and action of our leaders of opinion" the Association called attention to four counts marking youthful tendencies among school children of to-day: "A tendency toward a disregard for constituted authority; a lack of respect for age and superior wisdom; a weak appreciation of the demands of duty; a disposition to follow pleasure and interest rather than obligation and order."

One other interesting comment may be noted in Professor Adams's interview.

"The people who are worst paid in the States," he said, "are the thinkers and idealists—teachers, clergymen, professors, Judges—these are, in this sense, the intellectual salt of the earth. Teachers have little social prestige, but professors are highly honored. They are regarded, perhaps, as clever 'cranks' by the business men, with the feeling, it may be, that though they are of no use in the really important business of life, they add somewhat to the national reputation. This was Cecil Rhodes's view, and probably is Mr. Carnegie's!"

SOCIOLOGY

Shall We Protect, or only Befriend Emigrant Girls?

At a meeting of the General Committee of the Society for Befriending Girls, an unpleasant fact came out which tends to show why, notwithstanding the efforts of those engaged in the work, the results are not always completely satisfying. The society was originally styled, for the Protection of Girls. A member asked the reason of the change. He was told that among English girls the word "protection" was always taken to imply rescue work, and consequently its use alienated those for whom the society was working.

The statement was confirmed by a member from Scotland, by another from Montreal, by a third from Boston, and by a fourth from Brussels as regards English girls only. A member from Dublin, we are glad to see, denied that any such notion prevailed among Irish girls; and it was acknowledged by the authorities of the society, that the change had been made in the face of strong opposition, one member having resigned on account of it.

At first sight one might look upon the change as insignificant, and wonder why any should have opposed it so far as to make it the reason of abandoning the society. A little reflection will show, we think, that the change is a radical one. In itself the term "protection" has no connection whatever with the term "rescue." The former signifies the averting from one of a threatening danger: the latter, a drawing one out of the danger already in possession. We protect travellers by sea from shipwreck by all sorts of devices and they enjoy a safety they would not have otherwise: we rescue them from shipwreck by means of lifeboats when their ship is on the rocks and the sea is on the point of swallowing them up. So too the society in question protects emigrant girls, leading them in safety to their destination: to rescue them supposes they have fallen into the hands of their enemies, and is an entirely different work. It is noteworthy that the objection to the term "protection" comes from girls who have lived under Protestant influences, English and American girls. Irish and Belgians, and other Catholics from the continent find no fault with it. We think we are not far wrong in tracing the root of the objection in that independence, that impatience of control, as characteristic of Protestantism, as dependence, submission to authority, are of Catholicity. The Catholic girl in a purely Catholic atmosphere, looks to her pastor for guidance. If she proposes to emigrate she will discuss the matter with him. Should he indicate dangers that may threaten her, she appeals for protection, and will make it a matter of conscience to follow his directions and to put herself into the hands of those he designates as protectors. The Protestant spirit is the opposite of this. It is the spirit of private judgment, of self-reliance. The girl imbued with it holds herself free to avail herself of the protection offered her or not, just as she pleases. She dislikes the word "protection," because it implies insufficiency on her part, and therefore a moral obligation to subject herself to the guardianship of others: she approves "befriending," because it leaves her free to accept or reject the "friendship" offered.

If, therefore, the society is to do its work thoroughly, it must stick to the idea of protection, and those who are to be the objects of its care, must be educated up to the conviction that what they need to save them from the dangers that threaten is not friendship, but protection from the moment they leave their homes until they are handed over to their friends in a foreign land, or to those who can be trusted to give them honest employment. This is the more necessary, because everyone with experience knows that those are least ready to accept the society's proffered friendship, who through ignorance of danger or lightness of character, need it most.

The defenders of the change say that the English speaking girls' objection to the term "protection" comes from the fact that it implies in English speaking places, rescue work. But this does not invalidate what we have said about the root of the objection. It implies rescue work, merely because the Protestant spirit is strong in such places. A girl is supposed by that spirit of insubordination to be able to take care of herself, until, by a miserable fall, she has proved herself unable to do so. The idea is utterly false; and Catholic societies should lay a solid foundation for their work by combating it. At no time have Catholics, high, low, rich, poor, educated and simple, city-bred and country-bred, needed that continual protection against error and sin, which it is the function of the Church to give them, more than to-day. Thoughtful men have said much of late years on the "infiltrations of Protestantism." Of these the most insidious, perhaps, is the spirit of independence and self-sufficiency which makes too many Catholics impatient of being protected. They know better than their Holy Mother, and are even ready to teach her. This spirit appears from time to time amongst those who undertake Catholic social works, threatening both work and workers with disaster.

H. W.

We have during the past two weeks chronicled the beginning or more complete development of various social movements conducted under Catholic auspices. A free lecture bureau has now been founded at Buffalo under the honorary presidency of Bishop Colton and the direction of Rev. F. X. Sindele, S.J. The Alumni Sodality of Canisius College has pledged itself for the success of the work, which is to be carried on under its auspices. The lecturers are men who have devoted themselves to the special study of social topics, and it is hoped that the course will eventually cover the entire field of social, moral and religious questions. Twenty-six lectures are offered at present, dealing with socialism, education, and the various industrial, civic and reform problems. "For the attainment of better results," the circular issued by the Canisius College Free Lecture Bureau states, "it was thought advisable not to restrict the lectures to a fixed place or time, but rather to offer the various parishes and Catholic societies the opportunity of having them held in their own halls and at such times as will offer the people the greatest convenience." This plan will presumably be found most practical.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

The British Review for October, 1913, expresses its opinion as follows about Sir Oliver Lodge's latest utterance on his favorite subject of Psychic Research:

"Sir Oliver Lodge has won for himself a high position in the estimation of his countrymen, but we question whether his undoubted eminence is not largely due to other qualities than those of science. Parts of his presidential discourse to the British Association seem to us to afford evidence rather of skill in speech than of precision in thought, so that we hesitate to follow Sir Oliver, even when he tends towards conclusions which on other grounds we ourselves accept. Let us take one instance of what we mean.

"The President, as was to be expected, spoke, though not at length, of the evidence of a life after death that, according to him, is furnished by psychical research. There is a great danger that imperfectly instructed Christians will in increasing numbers attempt to buttress their faith with arguments derived from this source. The evidence, if evidence it be, is in large part gathered in an atmosphere of such fraud on one side and—we say it boldly—of such credulity on the other side as to breed the gravest suspicion in the minds of reasonable men. But let us assume that the investigators do sometimes establish communication with spiritual beings. Even so, there is not the shadow of a guarantee that those beings are the disembodied spirits of men and women. A Christian ought to reflect that far more probably they are devils out of Hell masquerading, for the destruction of souls, as the spirits of the departed, and he would do well to remember the condemnation that Holy Writ pronounces on those that resort to such. Fraud or familiar spirits—surely in neither can one find a fitting buttress for faith.

PERSONAL

Father Antonio Christofaro, pastor of Grisola, Calahic, recently celebrated his one hundredth birthday. He is in perfect health, and celebrated his daily Mass on his birthday. The Holy Father honored the venerable ecclesiastic with an autograph letter of congratulation, according him the Apostolic Benediction.

Holy Cross College, Worcester, Mass., is proud of the election of an alumnus as Governor in the person of David I. Walsh. In celebration of the event President Dinand declared a full holiday for students and faculty on Nov. 6. Last Monday night there was a jubilation meeting at the college, at which the Governor-elect was the honored guest. The new Governor of New York, Hon. Martin H. Glynn, and the Hon. John Purroy Mitchel, mayor-elect of New York are former students of St. John's College, Fordham.

Edward H. Thompson of Cambridge, Mass., has taken paper pulp casts of the Temple of the Jaguars at Chichen Itza in Yucatan, from which he is to execute for the American Museum of Natural History in New York a full-sized model of this remarkable survival of the architectural of the Toltec or Maya race, from which the Aztecs "kindled the flames of their civilization." The site on which the temple stands was bought some time ago by Mr. Thompson. His reproduction of the Temple of the Jaguars will be the architectural feature of one of the entrances to the Museum's new wing.

Senor Pidal y Mon, one of the grandest figures in Spain, has passed away. He was a great Catholic, and it is interesting to observe that, though a layman, he made a full course of Thomistic philosophy and theology with the Dominicans under the guidance of Fray Gonzalez Ceferino, afterwards Archbishop of Toledo. He knew the "Summa" of St. Thomas almost by heart, and worked arduously for the revival and wide diffusion in Spain of scholastic philosophy. One of the greatest Spanish orators of the century, his thoughts, his very phrases, were colored by his deep acquaintance with St. Thomas. He played a leading part in the exciting politics of his time, and was one of those who fought strongest against the Revolution in the seventies, and procured the restoration of the Bourbon monarchy. He filled the highest posts in the government of the country, being several times Conservative President of Congress. It was he who in one of his greatest orations compared the law of guarantees, under which the Pope lived in Rome to the superscription placed by Pilate over the head of Our Lord.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

The following is the letter recently sent by Cardinal Merry del Val to Lord Rothschild in regard to the Jewish Ritual Murder trial:

Segreteria di Stato, di Sua Santita,
18th October, 1913.

My Lord,—

In reply to your letter of October 7, I am in a position to certify that the typewritten copy of Ganganelli's report to the Consultors of the Holy Office is substantially authentic. I am able to give you this assurance after inquiries made at the Holy Office, where the original document is kept. As to the extract of Innocent IV.'s letter, there can be no doubt of the accuracy of Raynald's quotation, which is confirmed by the fact of Ganganelli citing it in his report.

Trusting that this declaration may serve your purpose,
I have the honor to be, my Lord,

Your obedient servant,

R. CARD. MERRY DEL VAL.

In forwarding this correspondence Lord Rothschild explains that the documents which he submitted to Cardinal Merry del Val were copies of an Encyclical issued by Pope Innocent IV. in 1247 and quoted from Raynald's "Annales Ecclesiastici," and of an elaborate report dealing with all known cases of alleged ritual murder, drawn up by Cardinal Ganganelli, afterwards Pope Clement XIV., in 1758. The Encyclical emphatically declares the charge against the Jews to be false, and points out that the belief that it is warranted by Jewish teaching is totally unfounded. Cardinal Ganganelli's report, which was occasioned by a trial very similar to the Beiliss case, and in which, curiously enough, the then ecclesiastical authorities of Kieff were concerned, not only decided against the prosecution in that case, but reviewed many other cases and expressed the opinion that in all except two there was absolutely no evidence of Jewish guilt. In regard to the two exceptions the Cardinal's opinion was doubtful, and he declared that in any case they could have no compromising bearing on Jewish teaching in general. On the general question of the possibility of ritual murders among Jews, he held that the Encyclical of Innocent IV. and similar Encyclicals of Gregory IX. and Gregory X. were conclusive. Finally he appealed to the many Bulls and Encyclicals of other Popes extending protection to the Jews as evidence that the Church could never have believed that Judaism countenanced ritual murder.

The Presbyterians of New Zealand are seemingly not content with the work done in the secondary schools of the State and are entering upon a policy of building colleges of their own. One such Presbyterian college for young women will be opened next February at Havelock North and another is projected for Dunedin. The New Zealand Tablet welcomes this inauguration on the part of the Presbyterian body of a denominational educational policy, since it is at least a partial affirmation of the principle for which Catholics are always contending that for Christians the true ideal in education is the school permeated through and through with a religious atmosphere. This movement of Presbyterians towards denominationalism in education, the Tablet believes, is a sign of the times, and it will not end with the building of a few secondary schools for girls.

A Scripture Conference Class for ladies will meet at St. Regis Cenacle, 140th Street and Riverside Drive on the second and the fourth Thursday of each month of the winter and the spring, at half-past three. The opening conference was held on Thursday, November 13. Those who wish to attend can get further information from the Rev. Mother Superior, or from Miss Edith R. Wilson, 47 Second Avenue, New Brighton, S. I.

While celebrating Mass at Harbor Grace, Newfoundland, on October 19, Bishop March was fired upon and slightly wounded by a member of the congregation, James Hare, who is believed to be demented. Hare fired two shots at the bishop before he was seized and disarmed. One bullet grazed the bishop's head inflicting a flesh wound; the other went wide. After having his head bound up the bishop continued the service.

The Very Rev. William Joseph Ring, O.M.I., of Inchicore, Dublin, now in his seventy-ninth year, fifty of which have been spent in the priesthood, still possesses much of the vigor and energy of earlier years. Father Ring is one of the founders of the mission of the English martyrs, Tower Hill, London, where later he became Superior and built the present fine schools. Speaking in reminiscent mood to a representative of the London Catholic Times, Father Ring recalled recently the humble beginnings of the Tower Hill Mission, upwards of half a century ago. Before the erection of the splendid new church the thousands of Catholics of the big scattered district had to be contented with a very insignificant building, which held about one hundred people. A temporary church, made of galvanized iron, served for a considerable time. The first appeal was not for money to build a fine church and presbytery, but to erect schools for the children who were running wild through the streets. Catholics, Protestants and Jews contributed. The schools were begun, the cornerstone being laid by the Princess Marguerite of Orleans.

OBITUARY

In the death of Sister Mary Cordelia, at Mount St. Vincent, on November 3, the Sisters of Charity of New York have lost a valued member and the Catholic educational body of the diocese a trained, efficient and devoted worker. Sister Cordelia entered the Community in June, 1885, and was soon made a member of the teaching staff, and later became directress of that institution which, under her guidance, made marked progress, looking forward even then to the culmination since reached of a college course. In 1906, she was attacked by a serious malady, that caused her retirement from active duty for more than a year. On the opening of the College of Mt. St. Vincent in 1910, she was recalled to the Mother House to assist in the great work. Early in 1913, she was again stricken, this time not to recover. Sister Cordelia was not an ordinary character. Her personality was strong, her ability marked. Her advice in educational matters was eagerly sought, not only by members of her own community, but by others far and near. In the progress of the Sisters' Summer School at Washington, she took a deep interest, heading, for two successive summers, the little colony of Sisters who attended from Mt. St. Vincent. She will long be missed by her co-workers.

SECURITY

The notes are the obligation of the motherhouse of The Sisters of the Order of St. Joseph, in Georgia. They are secured by first mortgage on a tract of land in the City of Augusta, Georgia, at the southwest corner of Wrightsboro Road and Rhind Avenue, containing 20 acres. The location is in one of the best residence sections of Augusta, occupying a commanding site overlooking the entire city. A reasonable value of this land is $25,000.

There is being completed on the above described property three large buildings; two of them, the administration and dormitory buildings, being four stories in height; and the third building being three stories in height, used as a chapel. All the buildings are connected by three-story corridors. The buildings are of uniform construction, the first stories being of Georgia granite and the other stories are of pressed brick with stone trimmings. The construction is very substantial and the buildings present a very attractive appearance. The buildings cost, complete, $240,000. They will be used as an academy.

The deed of trust was approved by Right Reverend B. J. Keiley, Bishop of Savannah. The motherhouse of this Order was formerly at Washington, Georgia, but was removed to Augusta on the erection of this academy. This Order also owns properties in several other cities of Georgia.

Deed of Trust requires $130,000 fire insurance and $65,000 tornado insurance, with loss clause payable to Mercantile Trust Company, Trustee for noteholders. Title perfect—examined by local counsel and by Legal Department of Mercantile Trust Company. Mortgage papers prepared by us.

NAZARETH ACADEMY, Nazareth, Kentucky

Conducted by the Sisters of Charity of Nazareth

Courses thorough. Methods progressive. Excellent advantages in Music and Art.

This Institution, one of Kentucky's famous boarding schools for girls, is situated on the L. & N. Railroad, two miles from historic Bardstown and thirty-eight miles from Louisville, the metropolis of the State. The climatic advantages of the location can hardly be surpassed. Free from the extreme of heat and cold, as well as from malarial influences, the atmosphere is pure and invigorating at all seasons, affording opportunities for open-air exercise almost any day of the year. Parks and groves, shaded avenues, golf links, and an extensive campus furnished with basket ball, tennis courts, etc., add to the attraction of an out-door life.

The buildings, with a frontage of a thousand feet, too extensive to be represented in a single picture, contain study and class rooms, laboratories, libraries, music rooms, dormitories, refectories, recreation halls, a spacious auditorium and a fine museum, all arranged with a view not only to the physical comfort and convenience of the students but to what is best and highest in education.

CHRONICLE

Mexico.—It is quite impossible from the conflicting and contradicting reports in the press to form any idea of actual conditions in Mexico, or as to how far our Government has proceeded or intends to proceed in seeking a solution of the present entanglement. Rumors of impending war, of broken off negotiations, of the recall of Mr. Lind and Mr. O'Shaughnessy, of activity in naval and army circles, of proposals to arm the revolutionists under Carranza, of final edicts or ultimatums to Huerta, follow one another in endless repetition and denial with a result that is bewildering. Matters seem to have reached an impasse. The difficulty seems to be, if Huerta is to resign his provisional presidency, into whose hands is the resignation to be made. The World, on November 12, asked the forty-two Senators at present in Washington these questions: 1. Are you in favor of armed intervention in Mexico. 2. Are you in favor of lifting the embargo on arms and blockading the ports in order to aid the Constitutionalists? 3. Are you in favor of awaiting the results of the next election in Mexico before taking any action? Senator Stone, of Missouri, was the only one who advocated armed intervention. Fifteen Senators were non-committal on all the questions asked. There were seventeen Senators, Democrats and Republicans, who favored and ten who opposed the raising of the embargo on arms, and only three who were in favor of awaiting the results of the next elections in Mexico before taking action. As the total number of Senators is 96, the poll taken by the World has to be considered accordingly. Senator Moheno, the Mexican Secretary of Foreign Affairs, is credited with making the following statement on November 13: "In matters of foreign relations, only the minister of that branch has the right to talk, in spite of the insidious declarations to the contrary in the press. Minister Lind while in Mexico had absolutely no contact with Mexican official circles and has returned to Vera Cruz without having held a conference with one single Mexican official. As for our relations with the United States, they have suffered no change and the public may rest absolutely tranquil. This is not a diplomatic excuse, but the absolute truth."

No Tariff Preference.—It is the opinion of Attorney-General McReynolds that the 5 per cent. discount to American vessels only, cannot be given without impairing the stipulations of the existing treaties between the United States and other nations, and therefore the section of the tariff law providing for such reduction of all duties on goods, wares and merchandise imported in American vessels is inoperative. In accordance with this ruling the Secretary of the Treasury will instruct collectors of customs to make no allowance of discount on duties and to proceed with the liquidation of entries, leaving importers who are dissatisfied to carry their protest to the board of general appraisers, or to the United States Court of Customs Appeals. Several foreign Governments made strong representations to the State Department against the proposed discrimination, and there were some indirect threats of a trade war if the preference duty was enforced. Officials of the Treasury Department believe that the question will be made the subject of further tests, and that the decision of the Attorney-General will not be regarded as final by importers.

Railroad Men Win Increase.—The award of the arbitration board in the case of the conductors and trainmen of the Eastern railroads was made public on November

10. The employees are granted an increase on present wages of seven per cent., which is about half of what they wanted. The arbitration board estimates that this will involve a total increase in the payrolls of the forty-one railroads represented of eight-tenths of one per cent. in the total operating expenses of the roads, or approximately $6,000,000 a year. In reaching its award the board ruled mainly against the employees on four out of five points submitted as reasons why the demand should be granted and found for them on the fifth, the increased cost of living. Since 1909, when last an increase was granted, the arbitrators found the cost of living had advanced seven per cent. It was therefore more than a coincidence that the increase granted in wages is exactly the increase in the cost of living, as outlined by documents introduced by the employees. Thus ends, by arbitration under the Newland amendment to the Erdman act, a controversy which threatened at one time to tie up by a strike the railroads of all States east of the Mississippi and north of the Ohio. The award of the arbitration commission is binding and final.

Philippines.—Governor-General Francis Burton Harrison, on his arrival, November 13, at Camp Overton, in the Province of Moro, Mindanao, was greeted by seventy Moro chieftains in gala costumes.—Dean C. Worcester, former Secretary of the Interior for the Philippines, telegraphed his refusal to comply with a cabled request from the Assembly, that he testify before a committee of investigation into the charges of Philippine slavery. He asserted that the report of the evidence was in the Government office, and was conclusive.

Canada.—Eleven months ago the Conservatives won the Dominion Parliament seat in Macdonald, Manitoba, by 700 majority. This was claimed as a victory for the Naval Bill. The Liberals appealed to the courts, and the election has been annulled on the grounds of serious corruption.—Sir Redmond Roblin attacked Mr. Samuel, British Postmaster-General, for his remarks on the Manitoba schools, characterizing them, in language more forcible than polite, as gross interference by a British Minister who drew his information from the adversaries of the Manitoba Government. Mr. Samuel says that he is surprised that his remarks were taken amiss, and seeks refuge in the commonplace of imprudent speakers, that perhaps they were reported incorrectly.—Some months ago it was hoped that a modus vivendi in the Manitoba Catholic school question might be reached through the leasing of the private Catholic schools to the Board of Education under the condition that while the schools should be carried on under public supervision, no change should be made in their status. Mr. A. J. Andrews, K.C., gave an exhaustive opinion to the effect that there was nothing illegal in the scheme. The Board of Education took another counsel's opinion, which said that the scheme could be carried out only if the schools came under the absolute control of the Board, and that the separation of pupils according to their religion and the wearing of the religious habit by teachers must stop. "The struggle goes on," says Les Cloches de Saint-Boniface.—The Privy Council has allowed the appeal of the Cotton Estate against the Government of Quebec for $21,360 and interest, succession tax exacted on property outside the Province. It is said that the decision will oblige the Government to refund some one or two million dollars to other estates.—The Rev. T. Fish, Grand Chaplain of the Orangemen, told the London, Ont., Lodge that Sir James Whitney was about to define his position on the bi-lingual schools. He added that the Government is doing all it can in the matter, but that it will take five years "to stamp out the teaching of French."—Parliament is expected to meet about the middle of January.

Great Britain.—The Unionist rejoicings over Reading and Linlithgowshire were checked and the confidence of the Liberals was revived by the election at Keighley, in Yorkshire, when the new Solicitor-General was returned. There was a small increase in his majority, but the vote was practically the same as that of the last election. This seems to indicate that whether the miners of the north are pleased with the Government or not, they are not turning towards the Unionists. There are still two Scottish elections pending, of which the result is being waited for with anxiety.—The Japanese Foreign Office has denied the rumor that it had approached Great Britain confidentially to bring about the termination of the existing alliance.—The Stock Exchange Committee has suspended the three senior partners of Heybourn & Croft for five years for their conduct in connection with the deal between the English and the American Marconi Company. Heybourn was close to Godfrey Isaacs, and was a witness in the Marconi Parliamentary investigation.—Negotiations are said to be on foot between the Suffragists and the Government looking to the taking of women's suffrage into the Liberal policy. It is said that the Government will agree only on condition that militant suffragism be renounced. As militant suffragism was adopted only as a means to compel the Government to adopt women's suffrage, it would naturally be dropped should the Government yield.—The Duke of Sutherland has answered Mr. Lloyd George's diatribes against the extermination of the peasantry in order to make deer forests by offering the Government 100,000 acres, the chief part of his deer forest, for about thirty shillings an acre, warning him, nevertheless, that any attempt to convert it into agricultural land will fail.—It is now said that in the recent naval maneuvers the "German fleet" so outwitted the "Home fleet" that it would have entered the Thames in triumph, had the Admiralty not interfered.

Ireland.—The strike of the Dublin dock workers continues to disturb social, political and economic conditions. Larkin, who has been released from prison, and his deputy Connolly, the Syndicalist leaders in the trouble, with their allies have added an anti-clerical campaign to their laborite agitation. George Bernard Shaw and George Russell ("Æ") availed themselves of the opportunity, as speakers at a sympathetic meeting, to make violent attacks on the Archbishop of Dublin and the Irish priesthood for their successful action against the Socialist scheme to deport poor Irish children to England. It is recalled that this deportation idea in the interest of the Socialist propaganda is a recrudescence of a similar episode in 1823, during the career of the famous Socialist Robert Owen, one of the founders of modern Socialism. Bishop Keene, speaking at the recent Meath Synod, said that the United Kingdom in general, and Ireland in particular, were in danger of being made the cock-pit of strikes for Socialistic experiments of such a dangerous character that they would not be tolerated by Continental Governments. He outlined the program of Continental Socialists as the abolition of private property, right of inheritance, wages system, all competition, marriage and family and religion. "Thank God," he added, "no considerable section of the Irish community of any great weight or importance would like to see such forces let loose."—The strike troubles make a gloomy outlook for the Christmas season. The pawnshops are said to be overflowing with pledges of all kinds. The loss to Dublin's trade is, of course, very heavy. Apart from permanent injury to industries the loss so far is estimated at £750,000. The men and women on strike have lost at least £500,000 in wages.—The revival of the project of a steamship line from Blacksod Bay to Halifax and Boston has been received with much local approval.

Rome.—On November 12, 130 American sailors accompanied by Captain Maxwell were received by the Sovereign Pontiff in the Papal apartments instead of the court of San Damaso, where such functions usually take place. His Holiness spoke most affably with the men, blessing the objects of piety they brought with them, and giving them all the apostolic benediction. As the sailors left the hall they gave three cheers for the Pope. On November 15, Rear Admiral Charles J. Badger and Rear Admiral Wilson were received in special audience by His Holiness.—On Sunday, November 16, the solemn service for the anniversary of the coronation of Pius X, which had been postponed from August 9, was held in the Sistine Chapel. The solemn High Mass, at which His Holiness assisted, was sung by His Eminence Cardinal Merry del Val, Secretary of State the first Cardinal named by the reigning Pontiff.—According to the press official announcement was made at the Vatican, on November 11, of the appointment of Mgr. Edward Kozlowski, of St. Stanislaus' Church, Bay City, Mich., as titular Bishop of Germa, in Asia Minor, and Auxiliary Bishop of the diocese of Milwaukee.

Spain.—When Dato accepted the post of Premier he was not able to consult with Maura, who had withdrawn from the capital and had not on that account received his approval. The Conservative party was in consequence in a state of consternation for if there was disagreement between the leaders there would be a split and the monarchy itself would be endangered. Hence Maura was recalled to Madrid by a number of friends who were Ministers during his last period of Government, and who have not accepted posts in the present Conservative Ministry, and a consultation took place. The general tone of this meeting was favorable to peace on account of the disastrous consequences for the Crown and country which division would entail, and so when subsequently a meeting was held between Maura and the new Conservative Premier a reconciliation, at the cost of much sacrifice on Maura's part, resulted. The reconciliation had an immediate effect on the Liberals. Dato's appointment had been received by them with delight, but in this new turn of affairs they immediately began to assail him. Nevertheless though Dato has excellent men in his Cabinet, and all earnest Catholics, the promise he made to respect all the previous legislation of the Liberals is causing alarm and the question is asked, does it include the measures passed with regard to the teaching of catechism in the schools? The chief trouble in Spain is the vicious press which is weaning the workingmen from the Church. This activity of the enemy has at last, though it is late in the day, aroused Catholic newspaper men to do something to stem the tide. To an outsider the statistics give considerable comfort. This year the Catholic publications number 600—being 50 more than last year—of which 246 are periodicals, 287 reviews, and 67 propaganda sheets. Of these publications, 68 are dailies, 5 are issued three times a week, 9 twice a week, 80 weekly, 3 every ten days, 16 fortnightly, 23 monthly, and 42 at unknown or irregular intervals. Of the reviews, 32 are weekly, 56 fortnightly, 122 monthly, and 77 are of unknown or irregular dates of publication. A splendid record this, and a work of the most urgent necessity, but, alas! that such necessity was not recognized and such work not begun years and years ago. In social activity also a great deal of energy is being called into action and very many "casas del pueblo," or people's houses, are being established to counteract the work of similar revolutionary casas organized by Leroux.

France.—The Minister of Marine announces that the Government has decided to begin the construction, in January, 1914, of four new battleships, and at the beginning of the succeeding year four more of the most recent type. Although aeroplanes, he said, may be used at naval bases, the dirigibles will be more available to assure the control of the Mediterranean.—At the recent meeting of the Congress of Catholic Jurisconsults, Mgr. Sevin read the following telegram which was the Holy Father's reply to the address sent to him by the members of the Congress. "The Holy Father Pius X accepts with special good will the homage of filial devotion and submission of the Catholic Jurisconsults assembled at Lyons in their thirty-seventh Congress, under the presidency of Mgr. Sevin and Senator Lamarzelle, and with the intervention of numerous bishops. He thanks them all for their renewed assurances of fidelity and as a pledge for the success and happy results of their labors he sends them most heartily his apostolic blessing."—The American Income Tax law, it is reported, has been denounced in some quarters as "brutal and tactless" because of the clause applying to foreign holders of American securities, and by some it was feared that the financial market in Paris for American stocks and bonds would be in the future seriously affected.—The new French State loan will be in the neighborhood of $280,000,000. It is believed that there will be a three per cent. perpetual stock. There is not the least doubt that the loan will be covered several if not many times in France alone.

Germany.—On November 12, King Ludwig III of Bavaria ascended the royal throne, which for twenty-seven years had stood unoccupied. The ovation accorded him on every side, as the royal train passed on to Our Lady's Church for the solemn religious ceremonies, was overwhelming in its enthusiastic manifestations of joy, affection and loyalty. At the portals of the church the King was received by the clergy of Munich, and Mass was celebrated by the Archbishop of München-Freising, Dr. von Bettinger. The public receptions, later given to the new monarch by the people at St. Mary's Place, and by the nobility and the Diet in the Royal Castle, were further manifestations of the universal approval with which the recent events are regarded by the entire nation. "The affectionate expressions of these last days," said the King, "show that our country sees in the termination of the regency a pledge of successful future development. The people of Bavaria have shown an appreciative understanding of the hard resolution that has been taken. My earnest purpose hereafter shall ever be to remain one in spirit with them. The kingship established by God can unfold its strength only where it is rooted in the firm confidence and love of the people."—The results of the first and second ballot in Baden leave the Centre in the lead, as by far the strongest party, with a total gain of four seats in the Diet. The following is the final outcome of the elections: Centrists, 30; Conservatives, 5; Independent, 1; Social Democrats, 13; National Liberals, 19; Progressives, 5. The power of the Red Bloc has been broken. Although the Centrists and Conservatives, forming the Right, have only 35 representatives against 38 of the other combined parties, yet several of the latter representatives have been elected only by the Centrist vote and will not follow the Red Bloc politics. The Socialists have lost seven out of twenty seats, while the united Right has been strengthened by six additional representatives. Since Baden had been looked upon as the stronghold of Liberalism the elections have been followed with the keenest interest throughout Germany, and the signal victory of the Centre will lend great moral prestige to the party.—The recent Krupp trials are now regarded as a glorious vindication of German officers and officials.

Austria-Hungary.—The Czech Culture Society forwarded a formal protest to the Swedish Academy of Science against bestowing the Nobel Prize upon Peter Rosegger. While acknowledging his literary merits, the society holds that he is using his popularity to carry on a Germanizing propaganda, and has only recently collected school funds to Germanize Slavish children. He is likewise misusing the Nobel Prize, the same society claims, for promoting similar interests. On the part of the Germans the matter is regarded as a new manifestation of the deep-seated hatred of Czech against Teuton.—The Budget Commission is continuing its investigations into the "emigration scandal." The Polish editor, Stabinski, defended the emigration propaganda carried on in his paper by holding that he had received only favorable reports from the Poles who had settled in Canada, and that while Galicia is a land of misery, Canada is a land of promise. He objected to the numerous arrests and the persecution of officials of the Canadian Pacific. Representative Lasocki, on the other hand, denounced the agents of the same line as extortioners and as "robbers of human beings."—The Evangelical League is straining every nerve and leaving no means untried to make perverts of the Catholic population of Austria. The League itself has, during the past year alone, increased by 180 locals and 23,000 members. Catholics are looking forward to a campaign of even more excessive hatred and constant vilification than has been waged against them in the past.

Balkans.—On November 13 the Greek and Turkish delegates reached a substantial agreement on all points under negotiation so that a complete settlement of the controversy between the two nations may soon be expected. Meantime Italy and Austria have presented a collective note to Greece complaining that the delimitation of Albania by the International Commission is being hampered by the attitude of the population under Greek influence. Greece is informed that both Italy and Austria have instructed their representatives on the commission to regard as Albanian all villages where opposition is encountered.—Rumors were rife for a while that King Ferdinand of Bulgaria was about to abdicate on account of his unpopularity in consequence of the failure of the second war which he instigated, but it is now affirmed on what is said to be excellent authority that the King never entertained any such purpose.—Bulgaria has sent an ultimatum to Greece demanding rights for nationals in Macedonia. Eight days are given as the limit for acceptance.

Russia.—On November 12 the Duma rejected, by a vote of 152 to 92, a proposal to give rights to Jewish subjects of the Czar equal to those enjoyed by all others.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Contempt of Authority in the Young, and Its Cure

A writer in AMERICA recalled lately how a Convention of Public School Teachers deplored their pupils' disregard for authority. The fact is deplorable; but it is not surprising. Indeed, a strong argument proving submission to authority to be a natural element of human society, may be drawn from its survival in any degree, notwithstanding the constant attacks upon it. Let us recount the more notable of these occurring in the English-speaking world.

There is a Home Rule Bill before the British Parliament. Those who do not like it are free to oppose it in every lawful way. But with this many are not content; and so for more than a year the greater part of the Protestants of Ulster have been preparing to resist it in arms. This is not a popular movement under leaders more or less ignorant and irresponsible. At its head is one who has been a high law official of the Crown, and who may yet reach the highest place as such. His supporters include men who have served in the army and the navy, where they should have learned obedience, nobles and others of high degree; and it enjoys more than the tacit support, not of revolutionists, but of the great Conservative party, which calls itself the party of order. The seditious speaking, pledging, organizing, arming, drilling are open and notorious; yet the Government remains absolutely inactive. Take another example. Lord Halsbury, for years Lord Chancellor, is a determined enemy of the Bill. He said publicly the other day that the King has a constitutional right to reject it, and his assertion was styled "amazing." It may be amazing to attempt to revive, in order to kill Home Rule, the royal prerogative which Whigs and Tories, Liberals and Conservatives, Radicals and Unionists, have for years agreed to extinguish; but to the reasonable mind it is still more amazing that, even in a limited monarchy, Parliament should, with general approval, have so encroached upon the supreme authority as to have reduced the sovereign to the wretched condition of the rois fainéants of the old Merovingian day. Again, there are continual labor troubles in Great Britain, and in attempts to settle them the labor leaders have put themselves, unrebuked, above the law, assuming an equality with the Government, and treating with it as would an ambassador of a foreign power. In Dublin a strike organizer has just been tried for sedition. His meetings had been proclaimed. He held them, nevertheless, and burned publicly the proclamation that forbade them in the King's name. He boasted that he had never said: "God save the King," but in derision, adding: "I say it now in derision." He was sentenced to seven months' imprisonment. Had he committed a petty theft he would have fared worse. The Attorney-General hastened to assure him that under the Act of 40, 41 Victoria, he was a first-class misdemeanant, which means that under a law passed by Parliament and approved by the Crown, one who "blasphemes God and the King" is to be made as comfortable as possible during the brief interruption of his liberty. His supporters would not stand even this. They notified the Government that their leader must be freed. Accordingly the prison doors opened, and he came forth saying, the Government made a greater mistake in pulling me in: it made a much greater in letting me out. A railway accident involving loss of life was proved to be due to the carelessness of the engineer. He was convicted of manslaughter and sentenced to imprisonment for two months only. At once the railwaymen rose, threatening the Government with a general strike unless he was released; and he was pardoned. The outrageous defiance of authority by the Suffragists, and the weakness of the Government in dealing with them are too well known to need repeating.

We may glance now at our neighbor to the north. For over a year there has been trouble in the collieries on Vancouver Island. Some few months ago the United Mine Workers of America, from its seat of government in Indianapolis, ordered a strike in Nanaimo unless certain demands were granted. The mine-owners refused to listen to dictation from a foreign country, and the strike began, which degenerated at length into serious riots, with loss of life. The militia was called out. Some of the Unions denounced this, and their members gathered at the wharf in Vancouver jeering at the men as they embarked, and even stoning them with impunity. Over a hundred of the rioters were arrested and tried. Of them a considerable number pleaded guilty, others were convicted, while not a few were acquitted. The Provincial Government acted, therefore, with some firmness: the judge who presided at the trials deserves high praise. Addressing those who had pleaded guilty, he said that he had tried to see in their plea an evidence of sorrow that would justify him in showing some clemency, but he was sorry to have to say that their whole demeanor compelled him to the opposite view. He then imposed sentences ranging from two years imprisonment downwards. Immediately the agitation for release began. The Social Democrats, the Socialists of Canada, the British Columbia Federation of Labor, and the two alien organizations, the United Mine Workers of America and the Industrial Workers of the World, formed a Miners' Liberation League, which has received the formal support of the Trades and Labor Council in Vancouver, and in other places. Moreover, in several cities these councils are preparing to expel from the unions all members of the militia.

We may come now to our own country. It is true, and we are sincerely thankful for it, that the defiance of authority to be seen elsewhere is not so evident in the United States. The Federal authority, rarely exercised it is true, is a reality. The lawless may be inclined to defy municipal and State authorities, but they hesitate at the idea of coming into conflict with the national Government. But one cannot say that authority is respected as such. The red flag, the sign of defiance of authority, is paraded through our streets. Anarchists of many affiliations speak and organize freely, and only when they resort to violence are they repressed. This is to govern by a kind of utilitarianism, not by the principles of order. We could instance many strikes in which for weeks great cities were on the verge of almost revolution; and, though the danger was overcome, no satisfaction was exacted from the leaders, who enjoyed immunity until dynamiting was brought home to them. Another grievous injury to public authority in this country is the assumption by private individuals united in conventions or conferences, or other such meetings to dictate to it and to rebuke it if it does not perform its functions according to their ideas. Women and ministers are great offenders in this; and the latter go further, expounding their political notions in the pulpit, trying thus to impose them upon public authority. The last development of this spirit is the "recall," which keeps elected functionaries on perpetual trial before a self-constituted court which never adjourns. Those functionaries, from the highest to the lowest, are responsible to the people, but they are not answerable to the people at every instant. The Constitution provides the time when they must give an account of themselves, namely, the time of elections. Should they fail grievously during their term of office there are exceptional remedies, such as impeachment. But as a rule they are superiors during that term, private individuals are inferiors, and whatever tends to upset this relation is a social plague.

The root of the disorders we have mentioned, and of many more, is to be found in prevailing false notions of the constitution of civil society, as we learned from the wise Leo XIII. Catholic teaching is perfectly clear. Human society is instituted by God, who made man a social being. In it are two elements, the passive, namely, the multitude, which is to be united and directed to the common good of all; and the active, the depository of authority, uniting and directing all to that common good. Social union is not to be obtained by force, though authority has force in reserve to coerce the unruly. It is a moral union of intellects and wills. The people recognize the right of social authority and submit freely to it. Hence, St. Paul says, that all the authority is ordained of God, that he who resists it resists the ordinance of God, and that those exercising it hold not the sword in vain. But such doctrines are not accepted to-day. This is a democratic age we are told. Be it so; but democracy is quite as compatible with the rights of authority and its due exercise as the most absolute monarchy. The Christian notion of society, which, though confirmed by revelation, is deduced from natural reason, and is recognized as true by the primary workings of human intelligence, is heard in Catholic schools. Everywhere else is a false democratic sociology, monistic and evolutionary. Its practical conclusions are in every mouth, they are put into practice continually. How can young people living in such an environment respect authority? Let their teachers, their parents, their seniors, take up the Christian doctrine in the matter, and live according to it, and the rising generation will follow their example. As things are, their errors are responsible for the evil of which they complain.

Ancient Labor Gilds

II—POLITICS IN THE ROMAN GILDS.

Neither during the Republic nor during the Empire was it ever the intention of the Roman law to interfere with pure labor gilds. It was the political character which they often assumed, the excesses to which they led and the dangers which they were thought to threaten to the State that brought about their dissolution from time to time. Yet even then the intention of the law was manifested by the fact that the steady ancient craft gilds, which had continued for centuries, were not molested. Thus the historian Suetonius writes of Cæsar that "He destroyed all the gilds except those which had been founded in ancient times." (Suet. Cæs. 42.) Again of Augustus he says: "He dissolved the gilds, except such as were of long standing and legalized." (Suet. Octav. 32.)

During the disturbed times and amid the hideous immorality of the last days of the Republic, pictured so graphically by Sallust, the gilds mingled largely in the intrigues of political life. Their services were courted, with bribes and promises we may presume, by every politician at election times. Ambitious men used them for their own dark purposes, and even Cicero, with all his disdain of the lower classes and the laborers, is said to have availed himself of their assistance. We can, therefore, understand the reason for such severe measures as the Lex Gabinia, which forbade all secret gatherings of the people, under penalty of death. Such laws were directed not against the gilds, but against political agitators and revolutionists, who cared for them only as stepping-stones to the acquisition of personal power.

Most interesting in this relation is the discovery at Pompeii of the political posters of the trade gilds. The wealthy and luxurious city was throbbing with political life on the eve of the great catastrophe, and the labor unions were active in every section to secure the election of their favorite candidates. Signs like the following were soliciting the votes of the bewildered citizens near popular taverns and public places:

"The Fishermen vote for Pompilius Rufus as Edile."
 "The United Goldsmiths want Cuspius Pansa for Edile." The latter, as other similar notices indicated, was the choice of gilds as varied in their interests as the unions of the Jewelers, the Muleteers, the Carpenters and the Worshipers of Isis.

Casellius Marcellus is put forward for the same office in a notice which would appear rather amusing in our day:

"His neighbors favor Casellius Marcellus."

That the influence, however, of this politician extended beyond the circle of his immediate friends is evident from advertisements showing that he had the support of the wagoners, farmers and other unions. Even Venus, the protecting goddess of Pompeii, is made to declare herself in favor of his election: "Venus wants Casellius for Edile!"

Neither did the guilds fail to put forth the usual electioneering promises. Thus in 73 the Bakers' Union of Pompeii canvassed for C. Julius Polybius, because "He brings good bread." Probably he had promised them to secure a reduction in the price of grain, or other similar favors. Particular oddities are the announcements of such guilds as "the Night Drinkers" and "the Sleepy-heads," indicating in the former case, we may presume, the propensity of the members to carouse until the morning. Certain women, likewise, as the placards show, were carrying on a vigorous campaign for their political favorites. There is nothing new beneath the sun, as all these discoveries show! A list of the various political notices was drawn up as early as 1887 at Paris by P. Willems. (Les Elections Municipales à Pompéii.)

It was not, however, it would appear, such canvassing that the Roman statesmen dreaded, but those secret gatherings in which the guilds were only made a cloak for ulterior and dangerous designs.

In the provinces especially the Emperors exercised the greatest watchfulness. A classical illustration is that which occurs in the famous correspondence between Pliny and Trajan. The former, writing from Nicomedia (Plin. Ep. ad Trai. 33), desires to obtain permission for the organization of a guild of craftsmen to serve as a fire department to the city. He recommends the project favorably, and argues that, since only about 150 members are to be admitted, all of them craftsmen, he will be able to see to it that no unlawful purposes are pursued. The Emperor, however, is not convinced. In his reply (Trai. ad Plin. 34), he states that all previous societies formed in that province, under whatever pretence, have invariably degenerated into political clubs. "Let us bear in mind," he says, "that this province, and in particular this city, have been disturbed by factions of just this kind." Yet Trajan was not opposed to guilds as such, and conferred special privileges upon a bakers' union in Rome; nor were the guilds as uncommon in the provinces as a passage from Gaius might imply.

There was little hope for the laborer under paganism. But even that glimmer of a brighter future was relentlessly extinguished when he turned from sound economic and political principles to follow the leadership of mere revolutionary demagogues.

History repeats itself, and to-day we find the attempt made throughout the entire world to degrade the labor unions into mere political tools, to make them subsidiary to a political party whose anti-Christian tendencies and open opposition to religious education in the schools must pervert all sound trade-union principles, to turn them finally into political centres of revolutionary activity. The laborer has every right and duty to safeguard his lawful economic interests by the powerful means of the ballot. But Socialism is only saddling him with a new State tyranny, which must lead to a slavery perhaps not vastly unlike that which during the following centuries was to shackle the Roman unions. It is degrading his nobler faculties by driving religion from his heart, and is preparing for his ultimate downfall by kindling everywhere the fires of hatred and revolution. The political life must and should be deeply influenced by sound, Christian trade-union ideals. But all class politics are anti-Christian and anti-social. Socialist politicians may further their own ambitions, but they are digging the grave of the labor movement. JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

A Convert's Journey*

The story of a convert's journey from Protestantism into the Church is nearly always interesting. The goal that each attains is the same, but the paths that lead to it and the experiences had on the way are wonderfully varied. English-speaking Catholics, happily, are well provided with such books. We have, for example, Newman's incomparable "Apologia"; Brownson's "Convert;" Allies' "Life's Decision"; Stone's "Invitation Heeded"; Benson's "Confessions of a Convert"; Von Ruville's "Back to Holy Church"; De Costa's "From Canterbury to Rome"; Hitchcock's "Pilgrim of Eternity"; Burnett's "Path which Led a Protestant Lawyer to the Catholic Church"; Miss Curtis's "Some Roads to Rome in America," and a number of others. A valuable addition to this list of books is "A Loyal Life," a biography of Henry Livingston Richards, written by his Jesuit son. For the work not only gives an account, largely in his own words, of an Episcopalian minister's conversion to Catholicism, and of his subsequent career, but the volume also contains an extended sketch by Father Richards of the Oxford Movement in this country, which will be of great service to the student of American church history. It could be wished, however, that the author had said more about the progress of Tractarianism in New England, and had furnished the volume with an index. As the book is a son's loving tribute to a venerated father, the reader must not look for a very "critical" biography, but see rather in Mr. Richards an excellent example of the kind of laymen the Church in this country needs to-day.

Henry Livingston Richards, a descendant on both his father's and his mother's side, of New England Puritans,

*A Loyal Life, a Biography of Henry Livingston Richards with Selections from the Letters and a Sketch of the Catholic Movement in America. By Joseph Havens Richards, Priest of the Society of Jesus. St. Louis: B. Herder. $2.00.

and patriots of '76, was born in Granville, Ohio in 1805. After becoming a Catholic he liked to believe that through his mother, Isabella Mower, "very probably a modification of Moore," and through her mother, Jennie Dorrity, some Irish blood ran in his veins. His father was the pioneer doctor of the little frontier village and an old-fashioned Calvinist.

At sixteen Henry was sent to Kenyon College, which Philander Chase, the first Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Ohio, had just founded. Vivid descriptions are given of the hardships young Richards had to endure, and a good account, too, of his early religious experiences. He had to leave college, however, after a year's stay to be a clerk in his uncle's store. He was duly "converted" and became an exemplary "church member." Dr. Richards, his father, meanwhile had embraced Episcopalianism, taking with him from the local Congregationalist church a company of seceders, and was appointed their lay-reader. Henry followed his father.

Reentering Kenyon College, young Richards was graduated and then began to study for the ministry. He was ordained in 1842, married that same year Miss Cynthia Cowles, and took his bride to Columbus, Ohio, where he became the first rector of the new missionary church of St. Paul. The Rev. Mr. Richards' "style of Churchmanship" at this time was "Extreme Low," with a strong Calvinistic bias. But he now found that he was expected to minister to the spiritual needs of a congregation whose leading members held High Church views. "I cannot refrain from an expression of astonishment," he wrote in after years, "at the temerity with which I undertook the serious and awful responsibility of directing souls and educating them for eternity with the crude, half-fledged notions in which I had been educated." He says in another place: "I felt very sensibly as a result of my parish labors among the people, the necessity of something like Confession, in order to complete success in the work of my ministry."

Meanwhile, a zealous bookseller, who belonged to Mr. Richards' flock, kept his pastor supplied with the Oxford Movement literature that was coming from England. This course of reading made him adopt the Via Media theory, and he began to consider himself a "Catholic." But when an Irishman came to St. Paul's one day and asked: "Is this the Catholic Church?" Mr. Richards promptly answered, "No!" and directed the stranger aright. "Think of my chagrin and mortification," he says, "when I became conscious of this sudden and spontaneous betrayal of my new principles." Thus was St. Augustine's ancient test applied again in Ohio.

The bitter opposition shown by the Evangelical party of the Episcopalian Church to the Tractarian Movement helped to hasten conversions to Catholicism. Charges made against two High Church bishops forced them to resign their sees and checked the spread of the Via Media theory in the Episcopalian Church. But between 1845 and 1852, about fifty American Protestant clergymen became Catholics. One of them was Mr. Richards.

Because of failing health he left Columbus in December, 1848, and journeyed to New Orleans. While there he chanced to pick up in a Catholic bookshop a copy of Keenan's "Catechism," which he bought and read. The book gave Mr. Richards a new idea of Roman Catholic doctrine, and Kenrick's "Primacy of the Apostolic See," Milner's "End of Controversy," and frequent visits to Catholic churches, wrought such a change in the minister's religious opinions that he returned home the following spring no longer a Tractarian. A family uproar, of course, ensued. There was certainly no precipitancy, however, about his next step toward the Church, for though he had consulted a priest about being received, he continued for two years to officiate quite often as a minister. But on being stricken down with a serious illness he realized his soul's peril, and as soon as he was well enough, made arrangements for his reception into the Church. He became a Catholic, January 25, 1852.

As is not unusual with converts, Mr. Richards had many things to try him during the early years of his Catholic life. Leaving his wife and four children in his father's care, he secured employment in a New York commercial house, and went to Jersey City to live. But just as he began to thrive a little an attack of illness laid him low, cost him his position and plunged him into poverty. However, he subsequently succeeded in making a new start, prospered sufficiently to have his family join him, and when he saw them all baptized Catholics his happiness was complete. "Mr. Richards," writes his biographer, "never underwent such a period of acclimatization as some converts experience after their entrance into the Church. He never felt any of their repugnances to Catholic doctrines, the result, no doubt, of their early prejudices. As he said himself, he 'took it strong.' From the beginning he was as fervent and enthusiastic in all the exercises of Catholic piety as though he had been reared in the faith," and the Catholic atmosphere in which he now began to live had a mellowing influence on the former Puritan minister.

From the time of his conversion to that of his death, Mr. Richards took a keen interest in Catholic activities of all kinds and labored zealously to promote them. He was always tireless in Sunday school work; a St. Vincent de Paul Conference started in Jersey City in 1857, and probably one of the earliest founded in this country, made him its first president; and he was largely instrumental in securing the admission of the priest into the charitable and penal institutions of Hudson County, and in bringing about a great improvement in their administration. A sympathetic friend of converts, Mr. Richards did much to make them feel at home in their new surroundings. To the Catholic Review, a weekly paper edited by P. V. Hickey, he frequently contributed articles of a controversial character or urging the necessity and advantages of religious education. That Mr. Richards' practice in this matter kept pace with his theory is proved by the fact that he sent all his children to Catholic schools.

When his business made him, in 1868, a resident of Boston, he became a pillar of the Immaculate Conception Church, and began to promote Catholic interests in New England's metropolis with the same zeal he had shown in Jersey City. The Catholic Union, an organization of educated men which was founded in 1873 for the furthering of Catholic activities, elected him the successor of its first president, Mr. Metcalf, and he worked with others until religious privileges had been won for the Catholics in Boston's houses of charity and correction. He lectured a little, and wrote a great deal for the Sacred Heart Review and other Catholic periodicals. Indeed, he wielded such a trenchant pen that in 1871, Father Hecker wanted him to be the editor of a weekly paper that he purposed starting. Mr. Richards felt, however, that he should decline the offer. The "project was finally abandoned," says his biographer, and Father Hecker's "ideal of a great Catholic weekly has been realized only recently in AMERICA."

The panic of 1873 forced Mr. Richards out of business, and at sixty-four he found himself looking for employment. He soon secured a place, however, on the Boston Board of Charities, and was connected with that body for twenty-three years, being enabled during that period to do a world of good to the countless poor he visited. After seeing his youngest son ordained a priest at Woodstock in 1885, he joyfully said his Nunc dimittis, but his health then began to improve so unexpectedly that he not only lived to celebrate with his wife their Golden Wedding in 1892, but published ten years later a booklet, entitled "Fifty Years in the Church." "He wished to testify to his old friends and to the Protestant world in general that he had found the Church, not only everything that he had expected, but far more, and that every year only served to increase his love for the Holy Mother of the Faithful and his gratitude to God for being sheltered within her bosom." Surviving his wife but a few years, Mr. Richards ended his "Loyal Life," November 8, 1903, while his Jesuit son stood by his bedside and gave the last absolution. On his monument was engraved this appropriate text from his patron, St. Paul: "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith."

WALTER DWIGHT, S.J.

"The Monk of Wittenberg"*

It is a disappointment to learn that none of the Martin Luther portraits which have come down to us tally with the descriptions given us by his contemporaries. The disappointment is increased when we recall that portrait painting was so highly developed in Luther's day, and we wonder why Holbein and Dürer, who have given us faithful portraits of Melanchthon, never used brush or pencil to depict the arch leader of the Reformation. Lucas Cranach, the elder, regarded preeminently as the painter of the Reformation, was an intimate friend of Luther, and from him we might have expected something reliable. Cranach, however, allowed the warmth of his admiration for the new doctrines to influence his art and took pains to suppress those natural defects that would have given to his pictures of Luther the faithful expression of the soul. It is curious that the few absolutely genuine Cranach portraits have little, if anything, in common with the Luther features of a later day. The "broad, peasant face," with "the powerful jaw" remains, but the process of transformation carried the various reproductions further and further from the original.

The typical Luther of to-day appears, perhaps, for the first time as a wood-cut, made after Luther's death by Lucas Cranach, the younger. This type became generally known through a picture made by him nine years after Luther's death for an altar-piece in the parish church at Weimar. True, the "oleograph" of Luther in the fur "Cappa," which adorns so many churches, retains some traces of the bold warrior features of the Reformer, but it is so lacking in fidelity to the original that a Protestant historian declares, "even the Doctor's own Catherine would be unable to recognize her Martin."

The absence of a reliable portrait of Luther may well make us suspicious of the pen pictures handed down to us by so many of his followers and admirers. Even among Protestants to-day there is a general demand for a plain unvarnished likeness of Luther. "Amicus Lutherus magis amica veritas," exclaims Chr. Rogge, expressing this demand as recently as 1906. This same writer admits that there is "much to be learned from the Catholics, even though they emphasized Luther's less favorable qualities," adding that "we could not indeed expect them to look at Luther with our eyes, but nevertheless, we have not lost all hope of again finding among them men who will fight the Monk of Wittenberg with weapons worthy of him."

We venture to say that Herr Rogge's hope has now been fulfilled, and that in Father Grisar's Luther we have at length a true picture of the man whose figure looms so large in the religious and secular history of his times. His story of Luther told in three stout volumes in German, was completed a few months ago, and the second volume of the series, into which the work is being translated into English, has just been published. A review of the entire work, touching on its general outlines, the absolute impartiality of the author, the method adopted of leaving the works and words of the man to speak for themselves, the favor with which the book has been received by Protestant students of the Luther period, the untenableness of the grounds on which objections have been made by a few who are chagrined to behold the most prominent idol in the Walhalla of Protestantism sent crashing to the pavement—all this has been set forth in Father Husslein's able review to which the reader is referred in the issue of AMERICA for March 1, 1913.

To say that Grisar is merciless in dissecting the character of Luther might imply that he had allowed the odium theologicum to guide his pen and warp his judgment. The contrary is the fact. Grisar is as stoical as the chief surgeon at a clinic. Nor is it a dead body that he lays on the operating table, but the living Luther—Luther as he talked, Luther as he thought and Luther as he taught. His work is a fine piece of subtle analysis, or rather an admirable, specimen of high-class, twentieth century criticism.

Of course, while objectively presenting the facts connected with his hero's life, the author is not expected, nor does he attempt to divest himself of the duty of an historian, which is not only to state the truth, but to point out inconsistencies, expose with candor the fallacy of an argument, draw the necessary inferences from conduct or from principles, and call attention to cause and effect.

Grisar's treatment of Luther's marriage with Catherine Von Bora may serve to illustrate the simplicity and directness of his methods, as well as the calmness and deliberation of his judgments. We select two paragraphs from the several pages devoted to the subject:

"Suddenly, without consulting any of his friends and with a haste which surprised even his own followers, on the evening of June 13, he celebrated his wedding with Bora in his own house, with all the formalities then usual. . . . The marriage seems to have been duly witnessed by Bugenhagen, as Pastor of Wittenberg. The public wedding did not take place till June 27, according to the custom common in that district of dividing the actual marriage from the public ceremony."

Then after a résumé of the views of the marriage entertained by contemporaries, the excuses of Luther's friends and the taunts of his opponents, coupled with Luther's defence of his act, and the author's own comments thereon, Father Grisar concludes:

"In the above, light has been thrown upon the numerous legends attaching to Luther's wedding at Wittenberg, and their true value may be better appreciated.

"It is clear, for instance, from the facts recorded that it is incorrect to accuse Luther of not having complied with the then formalities, and of having consummated the marriage before even attempting to conclude these. The distinction mentioned above between the two acts of June 13 and 27, each of which had its special significance, was either unknown to or ignored by these objectors." "However," adds Grisar, "from the point of view of civil law the regularity of Luther's new status was very doubtful, as both Canon Law and the Law of the Empire did not recognize the marriage of priests and monks, and lawyers were forced to base their decisions upon such laws, etc., etc., etc."

One of the spicy stories with which the readers of the life of Luther have been regaled is that of the great Reformer's throwing, in a burst of indignation, the inkwell at his Satanic majesty. This is only one of the many legends which Grisar summarily dismisses with the following comment:

"The mention of the diabolical spectres infesting the Wartburg Castle calls to mind the famous ink-stain on one of the walls of the Castle. The tradition is that it was caused by Luther hurling the ink-pot at the devil, who was disputing with him. The tradition is, however, a legend which probably had its origin in a murky splash on the wall. In Köstlin and Kawerau's new biography of Luther this has already been pointed out, and the fact recalled that in 1712, Peter the Great was shown a similar stain in Luther's room at Wittenberg, and that a well-known Protestant writer in his autobiography, published in 1781, mentions a like stain in the fortress of Coburg, where Luther had tarried."

Father Grisar has not written for us a history of dogma, much less a controversial or theological treatise. His avowed purpose has been to give an exact historical and psychologic picture of Luther's personality, which we fear will ever remain an enigma from many points of view. That the author has succeeded where so many have failed is due in part, no doubt, to the winnowing process to which the documents bearing on the life of Luther from his infancy have been subjected, but most of all to the honest endeavor to do full justice to the man who spent his great strength, not in building up, but in endeavoring to pull down the Church of God.

Much of the success attending Luther's preaching was due to the comparative ignorance of most people regarding Luther, his antecedents and his aims. Eminent men and his own contemporaries knew practically nothing of the whole arsenal of letters, tracts and reports which to-day are being read, compared and annotated by industrious scholars. No one has done this work more successfully than Hartmann Grisar. His "Life of Luther" is one for Protestants to read, as well as Catholics. It gives us not the Luther of legend, but the Luther of history.

EDWARD SPILLANE, S.J.

In days of old it was for the purpose of taking meals that men and women entered restaurants. But that is all changed, for they now go there chiefly to dance, if press reports are true. Eating and drinking are made quite subordinate. The New York Times for November 13 assures its readers that:

"Anybody who made a round of the restaurants late yesterday afternoon would have found the 'teasers' dancing more energetically and far more numerous than ever and in more places than last year, while several restaurants that last season frowned upon the craze have succumbed and now have cleared spaces during supper where the patrons may tread a tuneful tango or a one-step or the 'ultra-modern' dances that now are so numerous they can be spoken of only as a class."

No one appears to be seer enough to predict the time that people will return to sanity and decorum in this matter of objectionable dances, so there is but one thing for true Catholics to do: keep away.

CORRESPONDENCE

Mexican Catholic Party's Platform for the Presidential Elections

MEXICO CITY, October 1, 1913.

Early last August the National Catholic Party held a convention in this city, for the purpose of renewing its own central staff of officers, and likewise to nominate its candidates for the Presidency and Vice-presidency of the Republic. The convention lasted three days and was a model of order and discipline, though delegates from all parts of the country met and freely expressed their views on the delicate questions at issue. As regards the candidacy for the supreme offices, the convention by an overwhelming majority decided to put off its discussion to a later period. The chief reasons for this were the yet unsatisfactory condition of our international affairs and the international crisis pending with the United States of America. But after the publication of Mr. Lind's instructions from Washington and the notes of the Mexican Government answering these as well as of President Wilson's message to the American Congress, the Centre of the Catholic Party called a second convention for the 20th of September.

This meeting which lasted until the 25th, was perhaps one of the most solemn and deliberate affairs in this country's history. On the one hand, the intricacy of the Mexican situation both at home and abroad; on the other, the unique and unprecedented prestige acquired by the Catholic Party, excited the attention and expectancy of the whole country, and brought home to the delegates themselves the necessity of preparing in earnest for the coming elections, seeing that neither time nor patriotism could allow any further delays. It was understood that the convention's decision might be the turning point in our situation and help to restore peace and prosperity in Mexico, or it might again plunge her into a sea of doubt and trouble. No one failed to see the impending perils, but the Catholic delegates were resolved, as far as depended upon them, to sail clear of all extremes and to help their country to avoid the shoals of anarchy and military despotism, which like the classical rocks of Scylla and Charybdis lay on either side.

The ticket "Gamboa-Rascón" at last selected by the National Catholic Party, is thus referred to by its organ "La Nación": "In the first place it must be stated that the fixed and accepted idea which from the start was paramount in the debates of the assembly of the Catholic Party, without cavilings or untimely divisions of opinion, was the choice of a national candidate, possessing the necessary qualifications of sagacity and tact for the solution of our delicate external problems; of justice, manhood and prudence for the adjustment of our internal difficulties; and of honesty and high reputation to allay excitement, to restrain impatience and to win over men's minds with the consoling promise of fair play and a hope of better days. Far removed from the delegates to the convention were ambitious and egolatric sentiments; and with a single-minded desire to contribute by their lights, by the impulses of their love of country and of their own consciences as upright men to the speedy solution of our knotty national problems, they singled out two persons who, in their opinion possess the necessary qualifications for the task to be accomplished, not seeking herein any advantage to the party but merely the salvation of our country. Federico Gamboa, the cultured diplomat, the unspoiled newcomer into public life, who placed our flag at so great a height by defending with sagacity and skill our national rights and our wounded dignity, and General Eugenio Rascón, brave to temerity, an essentially punctilious and honorable soldier, formed the ticket selected to solve the appalling problem which confronts us."

Neither Señor Gamboa nor General Rascón had previously to their nomination the slightest connection with the Catholic Party, but they accepted at once, expressing publicly their motives for doing so, which are identical with those which moved the Catholics to name them, that is, love of their country and a desire to see it once more in peace. Both candidates in expressing their thanks spoke of the Catholic Party in terms of the highest praise. "I am among those," says Gamboa, "who recognize the fact that the National Catholic Party, among our various political aggregations, is one of the most powerful, of the greatest scope, and the best disciplined; and still more, it represents the views of a great part, the greater part perhaps, of the people of sound judgment of the republic. Personally, furthermore, I gladly subscribe to the eight bases of its program, in which there are discernable according to my interpretation, loftiness of aspirations, soundly conceived liberalism and, what is very pertinent to the case which we have under consideration, complete absence of sectarianism."

The "Carranzists," as is well known, are planning to form a separate republic with the Mexican States of Coahuila, Chihuahua, Sonora, Durango, Sinaloa and Morelos.

On the other hand, there is no reason to doubt that General Huerta's conduct in the matter of the elections has been sincere and patriotic. We know only too well that the Freemasons and Jacobins, appealing to the general passion for power which gnaws our public men, have been round Huerta whispering in his ears, like the witches in Macbeth, "All hail, thou shalt be king hereafter," but to no effect. He complied with the law in convoking the elections for October 26th, and has repeatedly assured the public that they will take place and be strictly respected, as well as impartially guaranteed by him. The following cablegram was sent on September 27, by his acting Minister of Foreign Affairs to all the Legations: "The revolution has been crushed. Military operation against northern rebels properly so called are no longer of importance. The only thing lacking, and the Government has already taken the matter up, is the permanent stationing of troops necessary to control the northern states which were in rebellion. The elections will be held because that is the promise of Government made to the nation on April 1st. The Government is resolved to afford guarantees to all candidates. The two tickets already in the field are 'Díaz-Requena' and 'Gamboa-Rascón,' and there is talk of others, among them that of 'Calero-Flores Magón.'" (Signed A. de la Peña y Reyes.)

This document does not give one the idea that the President would defer the elections on the plea of internal unrest or any other. However, it may not surprise the readers of AMERICA to hear, as indicated above, that certain maneuvers are in hand to baulk completely the elections. The group in Congress called "Renovadores," and who are only the sympathizers and ill-disguised agents of Carranza, Maytorena, and their parties, are now trying to introduce a bill postponing the elections. If this does not succeed, they will try to create disturbances at the polls, or to have them declared null under any pretext after the event. In so doing, one must not imagine that they are acting out of interest towards General Huerta. Their intention on the contrary is to overthrow him, and their method is pretty transparent. Though they style themselves "Constitutionalists," they know only too well that the elections can never favor them, and so their plan is to thwart them and force Huerta "nolens volens" to remain in power and appear more and more in the light of an usurper and tyrant. They hoped thereby to secure for themselves the sympathy and, if possible, the recognition and assistance of the Washington Administration, rendering thus deeper the prejudice they have already caused against the actual provisional President of Mexico.

In the meantime, the Catholic Party will have done its duty. It will have manifested its truly patriotic and democratic spirit in choosing candidates for the Presidency and Vice-Presidency that can rally both Catholics and Liberals, and represent with dignity our nation abroad. It will have fallen too into line with the ideas and suggestions of President Woodrow Wilson, not because dictated by him, but because they coincide in essentials with its own views, and are clearly well meant and beneficial to Mexico. But what the Catholic Party may not succeed in doing is to satisfy the cravings of those whose gain has ever consisted in kindling and fanning revolutions in this country and who, abetted and helped out by sundry individuals and unscrupulous concerns north of the Bravo, are the efficient cause of all our misfortunes.

The Catholic Party thinks that Mexico can work out her own destiny; it has faith in her Christian traditions, in the patriotism of her sons, in her natural elements and economical vitality—and if, as a party, it raises aloft the banner of Catholicity, it does so only because it is the symbol of that ordinary honesty and justice which it proclaims for all, itself of course included.

EMMANUEL AMOR.

[The above belated letter which has just been received will possibly throw some light on the conditions that prevailed in Mexico prior to the elections which failed of any result, and will also help to an understanding of the attitude of the Catholic Party in that country.—Ed. AMERICA.]

Reawakened France Viewed by an Englishman

PARIS, October 31, 1913.

It is sometimes curious, even rather sad, to observe how difficult it seems for foreigners living in a country to penetrate much below the surface of its interior life. We have been ourselves surprised that English and American men and women, for instance, should, after some years' residence in France, depart with so vague and incomplete a knowledge of the current of thought and feeling that make up the home life of the country. When difference of faith is added to difference of race and language it is still more difficult for the visitor to understand certain aspects of French life. In this respect the article of M. Chatterton-Hill, in the Nineteenth Century and After, is a pleasant surprise. It has, from a French Catholic standpoint, certain limitations to which we will refer, but taken as a whole, it is an excellent and most impartial picture of the "Reawakening of France," viewed through English spectacles. The writer traces back this "reawakening" to the year 1910, and the severe strictures that he passes on the state of things that made a "reawakening" necessary, give the measure of his perspicacity and right thinking. He attributed the degeneracy of France to the lack of discipline and authority in high places, to the absolute power possessed by "a gang of political jobbers and adventurers," to the "organized brigandage covered by the specious name of anticlericalism," not to speak of minor causes.

In his opinion the first, faint signs of a revival might be observed in the general elections of 1910, that "manifested the disgust felt in the country for a political system that represented nothing else but the organization of jobbery and corruption—for a Parliament whose sole achievements were the hunting down of defenceless monks and nuns." True it is, that the 1910 elections were by no means a complete triumph for the party of order and liberty, but at any rate, they represented the partial defeat of the Radical and Radical-Socialist tyrants. Then came, in 1911, the alarm of Agadir which, instead of striking terror, fanned the patriotism of the country into a flame. This has had a permanent effect; the enthusiasm for aviation, the generous acceptance of the three years' military service, the increased popularity of the army, are some of the signs that reveal the existence of a new spirit of patriotism and self-sacrifice among all classes of Frenchmen. Again, the pessimism and scepticism of the intellectual youth of a quarter of a century ago, of which that acute observer, M. Chatterton-Hill, gives many striking examples, is, thank God, superseded by another healthier spirit. The leading writers of to-day are not pessimistic and many of the most illustrious, M. Paul Bourget, for example, in "Le Disciple," "le Divorce," "l'Etape," lead their readers to the "historical and indestructible part of the Catholic Church." M. Maurice Barrès, one of the most influential writers of the day, although not a practical Catholic, recognizes the value of the Catholic Church as a disciplined force and, as M. Chatterton-Hill justly observes, his influence "has been immense." He is also a believer in the strong and happy influence exercised by love of the soil, and together with M. Henri Bordeaux, M. Barrès has done much to develop the movement known as "régionalisme," or "local patriotism," that is based on the "extraordinary depths of the roots that bind the individual to the native soil." M. Henri Bordeaux's best-known and most popular novels: "Les Boguevillard," "La Neige sous les pas," and lately "La Maison," carry as their message to their readers lessons of the love of home, love of the native province, of respect for family traditions; and the fact of M. Bordeaux's ever-increasing popularity proves that his message is duly recognized and valued.

Another characteristic of the French youth of to-day is a vigorous practical spirit. The attention of the readers of AMERICA has been drawn more than once to this feature of the "religious revival" in France. It has impressed M. Chatterton-Hill; he recognizes that the youth of to-day "does not waste time and energy in vain metaphysical disputations," but that it seeks a logical system of intellectual and moral beliefs which shall furnish an adequate basis for action." To these eager and sincere searchers, Catholicism appears as the logical result to which their efforts have led them. Hence, the increase of practical Catholics in the public schools: at the Ecole Normale, for instance, there are now over forty practical Catholics, whereas ten years ago there were two or three. It is the same in the chief Lycées of Paris, and here M. Chatterton-Hill's observation is fully confirmed by the testimony of the chaplain of one of these Lycées. He has told us of the interest that religious questions excite among the pupils, of the ardor and sincerity with which they study them and how, more than once, vocations to the priesthood have, in consequence, blossomed on university soil. This practical spirit, this desire to put into action the beliefs that have been accepted as a rule of life, have suggested the foundation of many associations that within the last few years have sprung into existence among the young men of France.

Mr. Chatterton-Hill touches upon some of these associations. He tells us of l'Action française, whose spirit and action are royalist above all things, and whose prophet is M. Charles Maurras. To the Action française the Church is an "indispensable auxiliary," whom its members respect and admire, in whose dogma many of them believe, but their direct object is purely political. He speaks also of Le Sillon, which since its condemnation by Rome has more or less merged itself into les Semaines Sociales; its object is at once social and religious; it is supposed to have a democratic tendency, that in some measure militates against its winning universal approval. Here, with all our admiration for M. Chatterton-Hill's able and comprehensive paper, we must needs regret that the most important and active of the associations formed by young Frenchmen has escaped his notice. He ignores the Association Catholique de la Jeunesse française, familiarly called the "A. C. J. F.," founded forty years ago, which now numbers one hundred thousand disciplined and active workers, who are united on the simple standpoint of religion. The "A. C. J. F.," groups together young men of every social rank; they are free to hold whatever political opinions they please, but they are forbidden to bring them forward in their work, which is wholly social and religious. Only lately a deputation of these ardent young workers was received at the Vatican, where their association meets with warm approbation. Their absolute submission to their spiritual chiefs makes them the efficient helpers throughout the country of the harassed or over-worked clergy, and their enthusiastic, yet well-balanced activities, do honor to their leaders. M. Chatterton-Hill's article is so thoughtful, so fair-minded and generally comprehensive that it is all the more to be regretted that the strongest and most interesting of the groups that are working for the "reawakening of France" should have been given no place in his valuable paper.

Bishop Currier Takes Possession of His See

CIENFUEGOS, November 6, 1913.

The most important of recent happenings in the island of Cuba has been undoubtedly the entrance of the Bishop of Matanzas, the Rt. Rev. Charles W. Currier, D.D., into the possession of his episcopal See. The entire city of Matanzas took part in the solemn act, and if one may judge from the press notices Bishop Currier can be well satisfied with the enthusiasm shown by the authorities of the city as well as by the whole populace in the welcome extended to him. There were present on the occasion the bishops of Havana and Cienfuegos, and sixteen automobiles went out from the city to receive the new prelate. In his journey down from Havana he had been accompanied by a committee of the Knights of Columbus and by the bishop and other distinguished personages. On the day of his solemn entry (Nov. 4th) the new bishop published his first pastoral letter in which he gives splendid evidence of his apostolic zeal and of his desire to reestablish the kingdom of Christ in the souls of men, the thought of our Holy Father which has met with such a general response throughout this country. "Providence" said Bishop Currier, "has called me to Spanish America, a land glorious in its memories and splendid in the history of its heroes, and to Cuba one of the cradles of civilization in the New World. This same providence called me to the great Pio Latino College to receive there in the midst of the sons of Latin America the plenitude of the sacerdotal power. This circumstance will not fail to inspire me in increasing the ardent love which I feel for Latin America, for Spanish America in particular, and above all for the Island of Cuba."

No news has come to us as yet regarding the nomination for the new diocese of Camagüey, nor regarding the successor of the Archbishop of Santiago de Cuba, Mgr. Barnade, who died a few months ago.

While in Matanzas the Bishop of Havana received a cablegram which announced the appointment as Apostolic Delegate of Cuba and Porto Rico of Mgr. Nouel, Archbishop of Santiago de Cuba.

Your readers will not be averse to some little information regarding the spirit of interference shown by certain Protestants here within the last few months. Every one in Cuba knows that the wife of the former President of the Republic, Senor José Miguel Gomez, is a very distinguished lady who has worked in every way to advance Catholic interests and who has given many evidences of charitable zeal in favor of her co-religionists. Recently her intense Catholic spirit inspired "Señora America Arias, with the idea of building a shrine in Havana in honor of the Virgin of Charity to whom many in Cuba cultivate a very special devotion. She knew that the Church formerly consecrated to Our Lady under this title, in the Village of Cobre in the Province of Santiago de Cuba, had fallen into ruin. To achieve her purpose she wrote to the authorities of the republic not officially but as a private person to beg of them to give her some assistance in constructing the new temple. There was no particular motive other than her piety prompting the distinguished lady.

However, certain Protestants, the same, by the way, who talk so freely of the interference of Catholics, of religious liberty and of the spirit of tolerance, presented a protest to the authorities of the state based on article 26 of the Constitution whose spirit, they said, Señora America Arias was about to violate.

I quote the answer of the Secretary of the Government to those meddlesome Protestants. "Answering your letter I have the honor to inform you that since the lady in question has acted solely in a private capacity and has been inspired solely by sentiments of piety, so far from this secretariate being empowered by the article you quote to take action in the circumstances, the very constitutional principle of liberty of worship you invoke prohibits its interference in the matter. Meanwhile this answer will not prevent you from taking any other action which you believe necessary in the case, if you judge that the local authorities have in any manner been negligent in the exercise of their duties."

I may add that the Protestants are not showing any special signs of life in Cuba, if we except certain efforts on the part of their missionaries. The various sects are but little thought of here in Cuba.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

The "Candid History" Once More

Strange to say, Joseph McCabe's "Candid History of the Jesuits" continues to be taken seriously by some of the leading reviews. The Spectator is the latest periodical we have found passing judgment on the book. The review grants that "the candor of his history is of the kind which exhausts itself in a devoted exposition of the vices, and has no strength left for the virtues, of the object of its attentions," and that he is so intent upon the "dressing up of the Jesuit bogey" that "he has no eyes for the great mass of honest, enduring, and courageous workers whose austere toil built up the gigantic structure of Jesuit power during the first two hundred years of the Society's existence," "he never does justice to the Jesuit work in education," nor to "Jesuit achievement in theology," and "his treatment of the missions suffers from the same partiality." But the Spectator, whose literary criticisms are often influenced overmuch by its well-known political predilections, seems to consider Mr. McCabe's indictment of the Society fairly just, and on the whole "accurate enough." "One must not blame him," we are cautioned, "if where evidence is ambiguous, he generally takes sides against the Society." Indeed! Why not? In such cases is not even a "candid" historian bound in justice and charity to suspend judgment?

In the Spectator's opinion, when all has been said, the Jesuits' "great and irrefutable condemnation is this—that every enterprise which they attempted has ended in failure," and since "the days of Ignatius, Fabre, Xavier and Bellarmine, there has hardly been one Jesuit of first-class mind." Let us see. Cardinal Bellarmine died in 1621. Nevertheless, Father Sommervogel—we wonder if the Spectator ever heard of him—has managed to fill ten large volumes with merely the titles of works written by Jesuits who lived for the most part after "the days of Bellarmine." To name but a few, there is De Lugo, Petavius, Lessius, Franzelin, Ballerini, Palmieri, Boscovich, Secchi, Bourdaloue, Hunolt, De Ravignan, Segneri, Roothaan, De Smet, Coleridge, Bartoli, Pallavicino, Bayma, and many others whom it is needless to mention, especially those who are still living. On perusing this list, however, the Spectator's reviewer would probably protest: "But I do not consider a single one of these men a 'Jesuit of a first-class mind.'" So much the worse for the Spectator's reviewer.

As for the capital charge that every enterprise the Jesuits "have attempted has ended in failure," to meet that accusation modestly, briefly and effectively is not an easy task. This, however, may be said, Him whose name the Society is privileged to bear, the world has always called a failure. The Church, too, is seemingly vanquished daily in her battle with wickedness and unbelief. Christ reigns, however, and the promise made to Peter will never be broken. Strong in this belief, the Jesuit labors to extend the Kingdom of Christ and to make the Church more widely known and more dearly loved. The Jesuit must strive, according to his Institute, to give no offence to any man, that his ministry be not blamed, but "in chastity, in knowledge, in long-suffering, in sweetness, in the Holy Ghost, in charity unfeigned, in the word of truth, in the power of God, by the armor of justice on the right hand and on the left," to seek always and in all things the greater glory of God. If he fails in this, as fail, of course, he often will, it is because he is a man. But if he occasionally succeeds, and history says he has, it is only because Almighty God graciously deigns to use him as His instrument.

Church of England and the Bible

In common with all other Protestant sects, the Church of England set itself up as a champion of the Bible. The Catholic Church, so the fable ran, was the enemy of God's Word: the open Bible was the watchword of the Established Religion. But no lie can stand: only truth endures. And so to-day, were it not for the Catholic Church, the Bible, as the revealed Word of God, would not be far from the dust-bin.

"Do you unfeignedly believe all the Canonical Scriptures of the Old and New Testament?" the Church of England asks candidates for deaconship. "I do believe them," is the answer; and as to what that answer meant there never was a question until within the last few years. But, not being founded on the Rock, the Church of England has no definite faith, but is a prey to the shifting opinions of its members. The old loyalty to the Bible has vanished; and last year the Dean of Westminster asked the Convocation of Canterbury to sanction the proposal of the Committee for the revision of the prayer-book, that the question should be changed into: "Do you unfeignedly believe that the Canonical Scriptures contain all things necessary to eternal salvation through faith in Jesus Christ?" This would have thrown overboard inspiration, it would have left very vague the question, what things are necessary to salvation, but would, on the other hand, have restricted them very considerably. Convocation laid the proposal on the table by a vote of 40 to 30, which shows that the ideas contained in the proposal have a strong hold in the Establishment.

Now the theological faculties of Oxford and Cambridge have taken the matter up. The Church of England hates outspoken definitions and loves compromises. The Cambridge theologians have proposed to the Archbishop of Canterbury that the question should run: "Do you believe in the Holy Scriptures as given by inspiration of God?" This has the advantage of retaining the idea of inspiration, but it leaves to the young men who answer it the right to settle each for himself what inspiration is, and how much of the Scriptures are affected by it. The theologians say as much in urging that, so couched, the question leaves the ministers free to avail themselves of the precious fruits of modern criticism. They add, as a practical reason for the change, that it will allow men, who otherwise would feel themselves excluded, to enter the ministry and be profitable workers in it. The Oxford theologians state that they agree substantially with their Cambridge brethren.

Sound doctrine, then, is to be no longer necessary in a minister of the English Church. If he be a good worker, organizer, etc., he will be profitable. What an absurdity to claim that such a body has anything in common with the Catholic Church;

"Mount Carmelite Nuns"

In the Survey for November there is a story by Margaret E. Rich, entitled "Holy Water," which the Catholic readers of that periodical cannot but find very offensive. The tale is about "Ellie," a young Irish woman whom her husband treats so cruelly that she is advised by a neighbor to get "some Holy Water from the Nuns of Mt. Carmel," for "that always sets everything right." When Ellie found the convent after a long search (the marvel is that she found it at all!) she was richly rewarded by being allowed to look up "into the face of the Mount Carmelite nun," who came presumably to the door. Real Carmelite nuns, of course, do not come to the door, and no mere visitor sees their faces, but the Survey's "Mount Carmelite Nuns" belong apparently to a new Order unknown as yet to Catholics, or to anyone else. For "Mount Carmelite Nuns" apparently support themselves by practising simony. The Survey's contributor says as much when she tells us Ellie's request for some of the precious "Holy Water" that "would set all right," was answered by the "Mount Carmelite Nun's" inquiry: "Have you money to buy it with?" "Ellie shook her head—she dared not trust herself to speak. She ought to have known, she thought bitterly, that here one gets nothing without money." However, the thrifty "Mount Carmelite Nun" softened a little, took an empty "whisky bottle" Ellie was clutching, half-filled it with Holy Water and gave it back with the pious prayer: "May the Blessed Virgin bring you your desire!" On her way home, we are told, Ellie was run down by a vehicle and killed, so "the Holy Water had set things right" after all.

There is no need of our dwelling longer on the offensive absurdities of the Survey's story. We will merely offer the editor a little friendly advice. It is this: Don't accept a contribution touching on Catholic life or practices without first giving the manuscript to some competent person to look over. Otherwise, Catholics who would enjoy reading articles like that on "Industrial Paganism in the Black Hills," which appears in the same issue of the Survey in which "Holy Water" is printed, will bravely deny themselves the pleasure of reading the one, in order to avoid the insult to their religion contained in the other. Otherwise, too, lovers of accuracy will laugh immoderately at the editor who allows his contributors to write in all seriousness about "Mount Carmelite Nuns," who display "kindly faces" at the door and dispense for a consideration "Holy Water" that "sets everything right."

The "Veiling" of Statues

Mr. Augustine Birrell wittily remarked not long ago in a speech he made at the unveiling of a statue, that the time may soon come when an orator, instead of unveiling statues, would be busily employed in veiling them. On such occasions it would be his duty to prove to the people that the bronze or marble image of this public man or that had been set up too hastily, and without weighing adequately, owing to the influence of grief or enthusiasm, the true merits of the statue's subject. While a dirge, perhaps, was played the orator would then let fall, with the people's consent, a veil that would screen the offending image from public view, and his chastened and enlightened hearers would thoughtfully retire to their homes.

There is a deal of wisdom in Mr. Birrell's clever suggestion. In New York, Washington, and many other American cities, there are numerous statues that a keen and eloquent orator should thus persuade his auditors to have covered. What had Jacob Leisler, for example, ever done that he should deserve to be immortalized by the citizens of New Rochelle? If the idea underlying the veiling speech should be widened a little in its scope, the countless statues in our parks and squares that flagrantly violate the canons of true art, would also have to retire from view. Who can behold without emotion of a certain kind, for instance, the image of Fitz-Greene Halleck, that stands in Central Park, New York? Then, too, there is another class of statues, happily not so very numerous as yet in this country, that might well wear a thick veil for another excellent reason. Really, Mr. Birrell's suggestion is an admirable one, and should be pondered well by American Park Commissioners and Art Leaguers.

Cardinal Merry del Val's Letter to Lord Rothschild

Now that Beiliss has been acquitted, and the world is settling down again to its ordinary work, we may be allowed to say a word on how the Holy See was exploited in his defence.

Lord Rothschild wrote to the Cardinal Secretary of State, enclosing a copy of the letter of Innocent IV to the bishops of Germany and France, and another of a report made by Ganganelli, afterwards Clement XIV, while a consultor of the Holy Office. He commented at length on these two documents cleverly enough to draw an expression of opinion from the Cardinal. Cardinal Merry del Val, confining himself to Lord Rothschild's formal request, assured him that his copies were substantially correct, commenting neither on them nor on Lord Rothschild's interpretation of them.

Nevertheless, the daily press told us that the Cardinal had written to Lord Rothschild, denouncing as baseless the assertion that Innocent IV had not only not condemned trials for ritual murder, but had approved them, and informing him that other Popes had also condemned them.

This is not to treat the Holy See with the respect it deserves. We are not altogether surprised at such insincerity, when we remember that on a similar occasion in 1883, a letter said to have been written by Cardinal Jacobini, Secretary of State at the time, in which he was made to say that from his intimate acquaintance with the Talmud, he was convinced that the charge of ritual murder had no foundation, was circulated in the press. The letter never was written.

The present so-called Republican Government of Portugal is becoming alarmed at the growth of emigration. It is well known that the best of the Portuguese are coming to the New England coast, where they have a freedom and an opportunity to earn their livelihood and remain in their Faith, which they do not have in Portugal. These figures, taken from a Portuguese journal, give some idea of the serious side of the situation:

In 1900 the population of Portugal increased by 55,000, while the emigration was only 20,000.

In 1911 the population increased 100,000, and the emigration rose to 75,000.

In 1912 the increase in population was less, while emigration increased to 89,000.

For the present year (1913) the number of Portuguese emigrants is expected to reach 100,000.

It is said that agriculture is becoming paralyzed, whilst material for army service has been reduced at least ten per cent. It is the strong, healthy and able-bodied person who leaves the Republic to try his fortune abroad, whilst the weak, incapable and helpless are left behind to form the citizenship of the Republic.

The following is from the London Guardian:

"We hear a great deal about conversions from the Anglican to the Roman Church, but the number and significance of conversions to the Anglican Communion from Rome, of which we hear practically nothing, is, nevertheless, very substantial. In America there is continuous progress in this direction. The Bishop of New York recently received Father Milletello and the Rev. Thomas Walsh, a prominent member of the Paulist Order."

"Recently" means "about two years ago." This is hardly "continuous progress." But Anglican notions of continuity have always been peculiar. We could say a good deal on the "Significance of the conversions from Rome." But this is too well understood to make it worth while.

LITERATURE

Shakspeare as a Playwright. By BRANDER MATTHEWS. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.00.

It is a difficult task to make teachers of literature teach literature. The professor of Latin will dilate in Cæsar upon geography and tactics, not upon the art of history; in Horace upon mythology, not poetry; in Cicero upon Roman history, Roman law and the ground-plans of the Roman forum, not oratory. The latest handbook to Latin studies, Sandys' "Companion to Latin Studies," will help you to build a Roman road or erect a Roman mint, but has no distinct treatise on Roman eloquence, an art which Rome brought to perfection, which it taught all succeeding generations and by which it has made a lasting impression on the world. Shakespeare was going the way of Homer and Dante, growing into an index for encyclopedic information, and a dictionary of antiquities. Teachers were making of him, as of all literature, instead of a work of art, rather a pigeon-holed casement to file a thousand sciences. They forgot that the birds of Shakespeare or the law of Shakespeare or the botany or entomology of Shakespeare will be interesting only to one who is already an enthusiast for Shakespeare, but that such infinitesimal specializations will not awaken for the first time enthusiasm in a new-comer. Professor Matthews rightly states that Shakespeare has been much studied in every other way but little studied in the only way he ought to be studied. Shakespeare wrote plays and, as a playwright, he has been least studied.

Professor Matthews has taken the incoming tide at its flood. His book would not have been written a few years ago. Shakespeare's character had been discussed in many books; Shakespeare's poetry had been studied from every angle by every essayist of note in the English language; Shakespeare's grammar, language, life, religion, antiquities, had been investigated and tabulated in hundreds of dissertations, but Shakespeare's works as plays were treated of but rarely.

Professor Matthews avoids some abuses of the artistic study of literature. He has not catalogued a number of vague, subjective impressions or given us a gush of invertebrate ecstasy. He has a body of principles, in large part due to Aristotle, and that keeps him from amorphous enthusiasm. Again Professor Matthews is not mastered by a theory, although he is very, very diligent in exemplifying one or two principles. Neither does he fall into the excesses of Professor Moulton, whose excellent criticism is hampered by a too ready generalization and by an excess of technical terminology. Incautious readers will rashly presume that they are supposed to believe Shakespeare had all this scientific technique before his mind, and they will spurn the solid facts of judicious study because set forth in newly-invented terms. Professor Matthews has avoided this snare. His language is not overtechnical, and he is not dogmatic in asserting his conclusions.

The original contribution which Professor Matthews makes to Shakespearian criticism is found in his insistence upon the practical side of Shakespeare's genius. Others have shown how Shakespeare borrows and transforms his materials. Others again have traced his development in language, meter and dramatic art. All this Professor Matthews does supremely well. But no one else has shown so fully or so satisfactorily as he how Shakespeare met two conditions which confronted him as a practical manager. He had a stock company fitted for certain parts; he had an audience which liked certain kinds of plays. His plays were composed for his own actors and to satisfy his audiences. Perhaps Professor Matthews may stretch these pet principles of his too far, but he is modest and guarded in his statements and makes out a good case, pointing out in every play the influence of actor and audience on Shakespeare's art. Every reader can be thankful that these practical considerations which made Shakespeare prosperous as a business man kept his critic's feet on the ground and his critic's head out of the clouds.

Teachers of literature who wish to treat literature as literature, and not as a peg upon which to hang a varied assortment of historical, biographical, geological or archaeological facts will be glad to read Professor Matthew's work. They would be especially pleased if the main features of dramatic art had been indexed for rapid consultation, but they will find that the chronological order of the plays is followed for the most part, and they will not be disturbed by the little confusion which results from the abandonment of that order in some of the closing chapters. Teachers will especially rejoice in "Shakspeare as a Playwright" because its effect will be to induce readers to take up Shakespeare's plays. Professor Matthews inspires enthusiasm, yet he is discriminating in his brief but satisfactory appreciations of the plays as plays. The worst plays of Shakespeare from a moral standpoint are fortunately shown to be the worst from an artistic standpoint as well. What Professor Matthews says of Shakespeare may be said of himself: "He is steadily sane, rarely bitter and never desperately misanthropic." Arnold's phrase about Sophocles merits a well-earned vacation from quotation, but we may use it once more in a new application concerning Professor Matthew's criticism. He sees Shakespeare "steadily" and sees him "whole," as all art should be seen. It must be appreciated in detail but only in order to be grasped as a whole. Therefore, for a disregard of pretentious scholarship, for steering safely between sublimated sentimentality and pedantic technicality, for a saving sense of humor and a pertinent actuality of expression, for a discriminating admiration which is not too blasé or shamefaced to be enthusiastic, or too conventionalized to detect and point out defects, for a very interesting and helpful work, we beg leave to give our heartiest thanks to Professor Brander Matthews. May his tribe increase!

F. P. DONNELLY, S.J.

Three-Quarters of a Century (1807 to 1882). A Retrospect Written from Documents and Memory (1877-1882). By the late Rev. AUGUSTUS J. THÉBAUD, S.J. Edited by CHARLES G. HERBERMANN, LL.D. Vol. II. Italy. New York: The United States Catholic Historical Society.

This publication completes the set of three volumes in which the United States Catholic Historical Society gives us the very interesting record which the venerable Father Thébaud has left of his experiences from 1807 to 1882 in France, Italy and the United States. He went to Rome in 1835 to enter the Society of Jesus and his reminiscences of his stay of two years there fill the pages of the present volume. He deals with men, events, social and political conditions in the same vigorous snappy style that made the two other volumes so entertaining and at the same time so valuable, because of the unusual pictures of the era which they place before the reader. Italy at that time was beginning to feel the influence of the forces of irreligion and materialism the sad results of which are so apparent in the present day. Father Thébaud clearly foresaw and foretold the consequences of those social, religious and political upheavals. His journeys to Florence, Leghorn and Rome give us glimpses both of the city and country life of those times. He visited the Sacro Speco of the famous Monastery of St. Benedict at Subiaco, and incidentally sketches for us the personality of the great Dom Guéranger and his work in restoring the Benedictine establishments in France. Other notable personages who figure in the story are Napoleon's uncle Cardinal Fesch, Lacordaire, Cardinal Patrizi and his brother the Jesuit, Fathers Bresciani, Zuliani, Soderini, de Vico, Perrone and the Father General Roothaan. The life of the Novices at St. Andrew's Novitiate, and the classes at the lectures at the great Roman college are set before us in the same vivid fashion in which Father Thébaud describes all the incidents of his journey. He was a remarkably keen and careful observer of everything that passed before him. Much of the pleasure and value of the volume is due to the careful editing of its contents by Dr. Herbermann, who, as he states, took from the MS. diary "only Father Thébaud's personal impressions and recollections, omitting various lengthy chapters on Art and Literature mostly based on reading." A fine portrait of Dom Guéranger and several other appropriate illustrations enhance the interest of the text.

Soteriology. A Dogmatic Treatise on the Redemption. By the Reverend JOSEPH POHLE, Ph.D., D.D. Translated from the Fifth German Edition with Added References by ARTHUR PREUSS. St. Louis: B. Herder. $1.00.

Each volume of the Pohle-Preuss series of dogmatic text-books is a valuable contribution to Catholic theology in the vernacular. The present is the fifth volume of a series which offers an admirable opportunity to form or renew an acquaintance with the whole field of theology.

The principal points treated in this volume are: The work of the Redemption, its nature and possibility; Christ's vicarious atonement, death and resurrection; Christ as Priest, Prophet and King. The more important questions are dwelt upon at some length, as for example, that Christ died for all men without exception, that His death was a true sacrifice, etc. In the interesting question, "Would the Son of God have appeared in the flesh if Adam had not sinned?" the author sets forth the two opposite opinions with their arguments and does it well. While this question will never be solved in this world, yet its discussion has not been without fruit, for it has thrown much light on other points of doctrine. Readers would have liked the author's own valuable opinion on this question. He is too modest. The last few pages of this volume, where it is shown that Christ's Kingship is spiritual and that His Church is not a political power, should furnish soothing reading to those who are worrying about what may happen when Catholics are elected to high offices. The translation of "Soteriology" has been excellently done.

P. R. C.

The Holy Father has deigned to direct the following letter to Father Chiaudano, S.J., new director of the Civiltà Cattolica:

"It cannot be unknown how highly We and Our Predecessors have esteemed the Civiltà Cattolica, a truly learned work compiled by chosen members of the Society of Jesus and most useful to the Church. Recently when the sixtieth anniversary of this periodical was being celebrated We wrote to congratulate them on having bravely continued to maintain their proposal of illustrating, according to the occasion, Catholic institutions and doctrines, and defending them against the outburst of error with complete devotion and religious obedience to the Vicar of Jesus Christ. These praises for the same reasons We now renew with pleasure.

"Such is the esteem that We justly have of your learning, piety, and wisdom that We consider you most worthy to preside over so illustrious a College of writers, and, therefore, We rejoice at seeing you made their Superior, and We do not doubt but that you will correspond fully with Our expectations. These writers will continue under your guidance to faithfully defend, as they have done so far, the cause of the Church and the Roman Pontiff, and preserving their obedience to the prescriptions of the Pope in the midst of so great and general a relaxation of faith and morals they will always so act that in this their periodical all sincere and thoroughly Catholic writers of journals will have an example, help and encouragement."

The Holy Father closed by imparting the Apostolic Benediction to Father Chiaudano and the other writers of the Civiltà Cattolica.

The latest number of this important review has the following remarks on Our Holy Father's letter:—

"To mention all the feelings that the paternal voice of the Pope awakens in the hearts of us, his children, is not a matter to attempt here. . . . He is the Father and at the same time the Sovereign, the most august, the master of souls, the supreme leader and head of the family of God, Who deigns to comfort a humble band of children, a little group of soldiers who are working for His cause, the cause of God and His Church.

"This voice is for us sacred. It is the sweetest comfort, the most powerful incentive, the prize most sought for here below amongst the strifes and pains of our fatiguing ministry.

"To the Father and Sovereign, Master and Leader, we dare then to renew, with the most profound reverence, our humble thanks, and with them our desire that the praises attributed to us be a stimulus in the holy battle for the glory of God, His Church, and His Vicar on earth."

Among the children's books we have lately received is Stella G. S. Perry's "When Mother Lets us Act." (Moffat, Yard & Co., 75 cents.) The author gives children who would like to take part in home or school theatricals of every description, such a quantity of valuable information and council that parents and teachers will be glad to know of this book. From Benziger Bros. come two "Juveniles," "The Children of the Log Cabin," by Henriette Eugénie Delamare, and "The Little Marshals at the Lake," by Mary F. Nixon-Roulet. The first tells of the adventures some Catholic children had in the Rocky Mountains and the second how an equally Catholic group of boys and girls enjoyed a summer by a Wisconsin lake. (85 cents each).—"The Railroad Book" tells what Bob and Betty saw from their home near the track.

E. Boyd Smith tells the story and furnishes the pictures, many of which are in colors. This latter fact, no doubt, explains why the book costs $1.50. (Houghton, Mifflin & Co.)

In "Franciscan Tertiaries" Father William, O.S.F.C., has provided the secular followers of the Poverello with a volume of readings designed to meet their spiritual needs. "Tertiaries and Dress," "Tertiaries and Amusements," "Tertiaries at Home," "Tertiaries, Books and Papers," titles selected from the forty-four chapters in the book, indicate how practical the volume is. The Archbishop of Simla contributes the introduction. (Benziger Bros., $1.10).

The Rev. Henry C. Schuyler, S.T.L., author of a popular series of devotional books on the virtues of Christ, has now written "A Divine Friend," which Peter Reilly of Philadelphia publishes in a library edition with attractive pictures in color. ($1.00). After an introduction in which he examines the nature of friendship and dwells on the advantages of having Our Lord as a friend, Father Schuyler devotes seven chapters to showing the character of the Saviour's friendship for St. John the Baptist, Nicodemus, Judas, St. Peter, Lazarus, Martha, Mary Magdalen, and St. John the Evangelist. The reader's attention is called from time to time to the lessons to be drawn from the life of each of these privileged friends of God, and the beauty of Our Lord's love for them is well brought out. In the copy of this book that we received, the binder has put the last eight pages in twice.

Here are four books from Benziger Bros. for youthful Catholic readers: "By the Blue River" is the title of a story I. Clarke has written about an English woman and her little son who go to live in Algeria. The boy is addicted to having ecstasies, is revered as a Marabout by the Arabs, is kidnapped and tortured. He bravely refuses, however, to renounce his faith, is rescued from his captors and subsequently becomes a Carthusian, while his widowed mother finds a new husband. There are good descriptions in the story of life in French Africa. The book would gain by compression. ($1.35).—"In Quest of the Golden Chest," by George Barton, is a seafaring tale of adventure that will delight the twelve-year-old boy. Paul of course succeeds in securing possession of his dead father's treasures finally, but not till the twenty-seventh and last chapter. ($1.50).—Vira Riccardi-Cubitt's "Pearl of Great Price," is a conventional tale of the Elizabethan persecutions, a theme that is being overworked of late by Catholic novelists. (45 cents).—"Dame Clare's Story Telling" consists of ten pious tales which a fifteenth century Benedictine nun is supposed to be telling a group of little alumnae. Children will probably think the archaic style rather tiresome. When they read, for instance, "her brother eke," they will wonder why the last word is not spelled with a capital. (80 cents).

Admirers of John Boyle O'Reilly will be glad to hear that a volume of "Selected Poems" has been made from his works by a capable editor. Is it the poet's daughter? It was a keen pleasure for the reviewer to read again old favorites like "In Bohemia," "The Cry of the Dreamer," "The Useless Ones," "Wendell Phillips," "The Exile of the Gael" and many another musical lyric that the gifted author left us. P. J. Kennedy & Sons, the publishers are to be congratulated on the attractive appearance of the volume. It will make an excellent Christmas gift. ($1.25).

F. Pustet has out an "Epitome e Vesperali Romano" which contains all the Gregorian music of their larger Vesperale, but omits the commemorations of the minor feasts. The size of the volume is reduced thereby about one-half, but the printing and binding are of the same excellent character as in the larger edition.—The same firm publishes "A Vision," a romantic operetta in five acts, the words by Rev. Andrew Klarmann, the music by Chas. A. O. Karz. The events described are supposed to have occurred about 1100, during the reign of Henry IV of Germany. While the play is written in blank verse, the story is unfolded with dignity. Let us hope the stage carpenter can manage the frequent apparitions of the "Vision." The music is sincere and carefully worked out, but the lyrics of the play are lacking in spontaneity both as to words and music. From Pustet too, comes a primer of orchestration in German by Franz Höfer which contains a synopsis of lectures given by the author on the orchestra and its application to church music. With the primer is published a booklet of excerpts, principally from Masses, to illustrate the text.—A new "Vesper Psalter" (modern notation) of the psalm-tones according to the Vatican Version is issued from the press of J. Fischer & Bro. The psalter is edited by Emile Dethier, father of Gaston and Edward Dethier.—From the same firm we received a very excellent and effective Mass for three male voices "In Onore de Santa Agata," composed by Rev. P. Branchina. Director of the Schola Cantorum, Syracuse, Italy.—Thos. Anderson of Hamilton, Ontario, has issued a simple and devotional setting of the OSalutaris, by Rev. P. J. Donovan.

"The Odyssey," "The Divine Comedy," "Faust," "The Arabian Nights," "Don Quixote," "Pilgrim's Progress" and "The Book of Job" are seven of "The Greatest Books in the World," (Houghton, Mifflin Co., $1.25) which Laura Spencer Portor has selected as subjects for a volume of interpretive studies. The masterpieces chosen, the author tells us "are books concerning whose greatness there is no dispute": A rash statement that, particularly as we are not informed what the criterion of "greatness" is. Are "Faust" and "The Arabian Nights," for instance, "great" for reasons as strong as those that make "The Divine Comedy" and "The Book of Job" deserve that epithet? And does not "Pilgrim's Progress" owe its "greatness" less to its literary value than to the venerable Protestant tradition? Good summaries are given of the contents and character of the seven books discussed, and there are also valuable counsels on reading. But the author's dogmatic way of expressing her opinions is not always justified and betrays the schoolma'am. In writing about Dante, she has an irritating way, not uncommon in writers of her kind, of loftily assuming that the religious tenets held by most Europeans of the thirteenth century are now obsolete among educated people, whereas the Catholic Church is of course teaching doctrine to-day that is essentially the same as that she taught 600 or 1,600 years ago, and her most gifted children must profess it now as whole-heartedly as do her humblest.

Some of the Spectator's correspondents have been supplying the readers of that review with amusing examples of palindromes and aphaereses. The following sentences, for instance, whether read forward or backward, have the same meaning: "Able was I ere I saw Elba." "Snug and raw was I ere I saw war and guns." "Egad, a base tone denotes a bad age." "Do good's deeds live never even? Evil's deeds do, O God." And the Latin, Subi dura a rudibus. ("Undergo hard knocks at quarterstaff"). One correspondent found in an old book this clever amplification of Sir John Phillips' aphaeresis, Amore, more, ore re:

"Ques: Wherein doth principally consist y^e love of God?
Ans: In one word God is to be worshipped: viz, Amore:

Amore summo:	with all y ^e love
More vero:	wth y ^e right manner
Ore fideli:	wth faithful mouth
Re omni:	wth all affection."

The Spectator uses the following strong language in a review of A. C. P. Haggard's "Louis XI and Charles the Bold," a recent "historical work," which seems to be a fair specimen of the worthless or salacious trash so common now, masquerading as history:

"Thankless as is the part of Canute rebuking the waves, it is time to raise a protest, however vain, against the endless multiplication to-day of memoirs and semi-scandalous studies of notorious periods which show the appalling measure of our literary decline. If there is any way of debauching the intellect more profoundly and more infallibly than by the reading of inferior novels, this host of third-rate histories supplies it. The centrifugal triviality of their inexhaustible anecdotes ends by rendering all concentration impossible, since breadth, perspective and judgment are sacrificed without a qualm to the flickering animation of rag-time and the cinema. What makes the mischief really serious is the self-righteous satisfaction engendered in the votaries of this particular form of reading, who beguile themselves with the illusion that it represents a meritorious intellectual exercise, in contrast to the doubtful relaxation of the novel, which as a rule they 'don't read.' So long as this unwarranted nimbus is cast about these gilded dustbins of history—for their price is as pompous as their pretensions—so long may we despair of producing a vigorous contemporary literature."

Once upon a time there was a godly druggist who displayed this sign in his window: "Please do not ask me what any old patent medicine is worth. for you embarrass me, as my honest answer must be that it is worthless." Samuel Hopkins Adams, the author of "The Health Master," (Houghton, Mifflin Co., $1.35) is of the same opinion. He inveighs against nostrums of all kinds, denouncing by name some of the most widely advertised. He is equally earnest about the peril that lies in such germ disseminators as common cups, towels, etc., and has great faith in fresh air and exercise as the best promoters of health. He would have us employ our doctors on the "Chinese plan": that is, pay them just as long as they keep us well. The moment we fall ill their salary ceases. This is a clever plan, no question. But we are informed by a Catholic prelate who passed many years in China, that it is a practice altogether unknown in the Celestial Empire, or rather, Republic. No four-year-old could understand a person who talked as the Health Master talks to little Bettikins. We regret to find Mr. Adams a victim of the "sex hygiene" delusion, for he favors the introduction into schools of lectures on that subject and seems to think "publicity" the panacea for all immorality.

Encouraged by the favor with which their "Child's Rule of Life" was received, Mgr. Robert Hugh Benson and Mr. Gabriel Pippet have now prepared the text and illustrations for "Old Testament Rhymes." On two dozen big pages around the edges of which kings and prophets trail in red, are jingling verses and spirited pictures that the little ones are sure to enjoy. Familiar scenes from the history of the Chosen People inspire Mr. Pippet's pencil and here is a specimen of Mgr. Benson's rhyming.

"Well all the rest, I think, you know.
But first read, if you please,
The tale of Israel's later woe.
And how Rome came, so long ago,
And how they fought both high and low
(It's all in Maccabees.)
Until at last when years were gone
A Greater came than Solomon,
For he who came was God's own son;
And well you know what he has done
To save us all from Babylon—
That is, our miseries."

With the multiplication nowadays of books like these Santa Claus should not be at a loss about what to bring tiny Catholic children. Longmans, Green & Co. Paper covers 40 cents, Cloth, 75 cents.

THE DRAMA

Denatured Dramatists

A certain objectionable demoiselle of the footlights insists that her peculiar style of dancing, though generally condemned as immoral, is, on the contrary, very modest, the reason being that it is "acrobatic." "The same twists and turns occur in it," she says, "as acrobats use in their tricks; certainly the same as done by hundreds of other dancers. If I do them with more brio than most, it is because I am enjoying the fun of it as well as the audience."

Terpsichore would doubtless frown on such a definition of her art, but this festive nymph who "enjoys the fun of it" has taken the cue for her aberrations from present-day conditions. Thus it is announced in the daily press that "there is a rush on the part of the moving picture manufacturers to get out the first 'vice' play on the films, and the moving picture theatres will soon be overrun with the style of play much in vogue in the legitimate theatres this season.

"Next week, at the West Side Y. M. C. A., members are to get the first view of the three-reel drama called 'A Victim of Sex Sin,' which, it is said, will point out in a startling manner the physical and mental decay of some men and women. This picture was taken abroad and won the first prize in the Hygienic Exposition in Rome last year, but the promoters never thought of letting it become public until there was a 'demand' for that type of entertainment this season."

Here we have a body of professedly Christian men to whom millions are being continually given by the benevolent public to keep them out of temptation, and for whom friends in New York are at present intent on securing a clear $4,000,000 for a suddenly manifested need, now "demanding" for their "entertainment" what their elders would consider a very positive violation of the Sixth, or as they would figure it, the Seventh Commandment.

Surely the "times are changing and we are changing in them." Nor are Americans singular in this respect. Similar ethical contortionists are exhibiting themselves in England. Thus when Doctor Ingram, the Bishop of London, proclaimed himself as "the champion of all Christian people of the metropolis to lead a campaign for a purer moral standard in music halls and theatres," G. Bernard Shaw, the apostle of the abnormal, rises in his wrath to resent the suggestion "that gratification of sexual emotions is one of the main uses to which the theatre is put. If the taste for voluptuous entertainment is sometimes morbid, the taste for religious edification is open to precisely the same objection. If I had a neurotic daughter I would much rather risk taking her to the Palace than to a revival meeting. Nobody has yet counted the number of homes and characters wrecked by intemperance in religious emotion."

To this fulmination His Lordship replies:

"This man of the world contends that no absolute standard of purity exists and that there is no such thing as positive morality. If that is so we are going back to a standard not only below that of Plato and Aristotle but below that of many savage tribes."

On the side of Dr. Ingram is the Bishop of Kensington, who complains that whenever he tried to fight impurity he found he was up against the dead wall of men's apathy, as there is a double standard of morality in England, a very high one for women and a low one for men. Parodying Longfellow's Psalm of Life, he asked if it was always going to be true that

In the world's great field of battle,
In the bivouac of life,
You will find the Christian soldier
Represented by his wife.

Nor is it only in the matter of evident morality that the canons are upset. The common mind no longer discriminates between vulgarity and refinement. Thus while Sir J. Forbes-Robertson declares that "the English stage was never in a better state," Henry Arthur Jones insists that the drama in England is really in a despicable plight, and is a national disgrace. "I am not an alarmist," he says in a letter to his friend; "I am not a pessimist, and I gladly allow that thoughtful drama and comedy is being written for the English stage. And I believe it will ultimately prevail with the great public when they are sufficiently instructed and when it gains vogue and prestige.

"But for the present this better, more thoughtful work is disregarded or misunderstood by the great body of playgoers. It is trampled under foot in a blind rush for senseless amusement. A night or two after reading your valedictory outburst of optimism I saw a packed theatre rocking with laughter at antics that were below the level of harmless nonsense, and scarcely above the level of imbecility."

An eminent American critic describes the present-day theatre as "a playhouse from which reason has fled and in which sensuality and silliness hold sway." Still another declares that the average modern theatre "is reduced to the level of a sort of glorified brothel, swindling and insulting and defrauding the public by the absurd cavortings of shameless creatures, and the studied deceit and deliberate misrepresentation of the managers. There is no longer any protection for theatregoers in the character of the theatre they patronize, nor in the reputation of the local manager. The present booking system has made our leading theatres dumping places for anything and everything and turned the local manager into a mere janitor. An actor of the character of Otis Skinner or E. H. Sothern may be booked between an idiotic 'sex' play by a second-hand buffoon and a filthy musical comedy. There is scarcely a 'first-class' theatre, so-called, in the whole United States, to which an intelligent person may go in confidence week after week. Within a month after he sees the best that our stage has to offer he is practically certain to be disgusted by some witless nastiness, or driven out of the house by childish playwriting and barnstorming acting."

Unhappily Catholics cannot be too vociferous in denouncing this condition of intellectual, aesthetic and moral anarchy. They themselves are somewhat smirched, for it is not an uncommon thing to see parish societies present very vulgar plays, and when the purpose is ultra-parochial, personalities are sometimes advertized as attractions whose names are associated with the most objectionable theatrical displays, while performances which make the scoffer smile are organized for charitable purposes and even for the furtherance of piety. The alleged necessity of money seems to have dulled the sense of propriety and distorted the appreciation even of fundamentals.

The much heralded vice play of Roland B. Molineux is another example of the art of the destroyer. It is entitled "The Man Inside," which does not mean the man inside the room, or inside the cell, or inside the den, but inside the man, which is a fine example of physiological or psychological acrobatics. The press tells us that "the play itself has all the absurdities and sentimentalities necessary to popular success. It has its thrills and its sermons. There is, besides, a riot of crime and thieves argot, during the first seven-eighths of the drama, there is reformation all around at the end and one hardened criminal goes to prison with a halo of righteousness and a smile of satisfaction in a sense of duty well performed that could not have been excelled in the case of a Christian martyr marching contentedly into the arena."

"The first act is an opium den in Chinatown. Wonderfully realistic scene revealed on the stage to an audience sitting in inky darkness. Victims of the habit gathered about on the berths built alongside the walls. Chinese proprietor and assistants grunting assent and complaint, peering cautiously through the peephole in the double door and bullying their compatriots smoking in another compartment. Hop pipes passed about. Women rave in their delirium to be hushed up by their neighbors. Thieves, young and old, plan their labors uptown. One unidentified young man suspected by the regulars."

We spare our readers the rest. The play is summed up as follows: "It was a powerful doctrine and it imparted to the closing minutes of an altogether shameless crook play the moist piety of an experience meeting in a Salvation Army barracks."

The playwright was too modest to appear.

The only refreshing and wholesome play of this week was

Canon Hannay's "General John Regan." The complaint of an English correspondent and subsequently of the Tablet about the travesty of the Irish priest as it was staged in London has in the presentation of the little comedy in New York, no foundation. The story is about a grand monument to be erected in Ballymoy, the birth place of "General Regan" who was never born at all, anywhere. The play is full of good clean fun which no one can find fault with. Incidentally it is an excellent satire on many of the fictions of history which at times make men great, who have no claim whatever to distinction. It recalls, though the Canon probably never heard of it, what came near happening in a bigger place than Ballymoy. The Commissioners of the St. Louis Exposition had resolved to erect a statue in honor of "Father Laclède, S.J." who was supposed to be connected in some way with the early evangelization of St. Louis. Requisition was immediately made on the Jesuits for a picture of the apostle and a view of the garb in which members of the Order were usually attired. But it turned out that there was no such person as "Father Laclède, S.J." The only individual of that name was a rough old trapper who was not unduly given to works of piety. It is true that Laclède's Village was the early name of St. Louis but the people of the modern city would have been as much puzzled to see a statue of the old hunter in priestly attire, as were the people of Ballymoy at the apparition of "General Regan."

The Canon deserves the thanks of the public for giving them a chance to go to the theatre without violating the Commandments. He is one of the class of dramatists who are not denatured.

EDUCATION

Productive Scholarship

Lord Chief Baron Palles presided on Oct. 28, in the Shelbourne Hotel, Dublin, at a meeting which took steps to commemorate the centenary in 1914 of Clongowes College. There was a large and influential attendance of past students of Clongowes and Tullabeg. In opening the proceedings, Baron Palles said he had upon the requisition to summon the meeting the names of Sir Michael O'Dwyer, one of the Lieutenant-Governors of India; Mr. Crowley, Commissioner of Inland Revenue in England; Mr. Kent, ex-Minister of Justice in Newfoundland, and also former American students.

Founded in 1814, nearly mid-way between the passing of the Catholic Relief Act of 1793 and the fuller Emancipation Act of 1829, many of the Clongowes students, rapidly became identified with the politics of the day, and especially with the raising of Catholics to equality with the other denominations in Ireland. Amongst the College's first students were some of the great O'Connell's sons, the O'Gorman Mahon, and Sir Richard Terry, friend and historian of Canning. There was also at Clongowes the great classical scholar, the Rev. Frank Mahoney (better known as "Father Prout"); Thomas Francis Meagher, Sir William Butler, Richard D'Alton Williams, John O'Callaghan, Denis Murphy, Thomas McNevin, Sir Francis Cruise, John Naish, Frank Power and the present Irish leader John Redmond.

Without State aid or endowment and in spite of many difficulties and much opposition, the College has for close on a century held its lead and maintained its world-wide reputation. The past pupils of Clongowes are to be found at the head of the learned professors and of great commercial enterprises at home and among the most distinguished men in the Colonies and in the United States. Clongowes has been the parent of several Jesuit foundations in Ireland and also in Australia, and every one of its former pupils proud of his old college will heartily support the movement which was started to found a permanent and distinctive memorial recording the centenary of Clongowes. In this city they will be joined by the past pupils of Tullabeg College, and, indeed, by all who have learned to appreciate the great educational work which the Jesuit Fathers have for a century carried on so unselfishly and so successfully in Ireland.

Evidently Clongowes Wood has not degenerated into that condition of inefficiency, which Dr. Murray Butler, the President of Columbia University has lately declared to be the result of the modern craze for "vocational training, and which is now being steadily pushed down through the secondary into the elementary schools and will presumably soon reach the cradle."

"The basis for any true vocational preparation," he says, "is training to know a few things well and thoroughly, and in gaining such knowledge to form those habits of mind and of will that fit the individual to meet new duties and unforeseen emergencies.

"No such result has been obtained, and no such result need be expected, from a school and college training which is a quick smattering of many things. At the bottom of the educational process lies discipline, and the purpose of discipline is to develop the power of self-discipline. When discipline is withdrawn dawdling quickly enters, and the habit of dawdling is as corrupting to the intellect as it is to the morals. The patience to be thorough, the concentration to understand, and the persistence to grasp and to apply, are the three traits that most clearly mark off the truly educated and disciplined man from his uneducated and undisciplined fellow, and they are precisely the three traits which are most overlooked and neglected in the modern school and college curriculum.

"Productivity of the highest type," he continues, "is checked by the excess of facilities. This is true both of books and of physical apparatus. We could get along well with far fewer books and far less apparatus, and we should be likely to get more ideas and a higher type of human being. The universities of the world search restlessly for truth, but too often they overlook the indubitable which lies at their feet."

And yet the general impression is that Columbia is particularly proud of its "facilities." Its "physical apparatus" is wonderful and its books long ago called for a million dollar structure to house them. Its "restlessness," too is continually in evidence and only the other day in spite of the fabulous sums that it is continually receiving from its friends and admirers, an urgent call was made for "at least $2,500,000 unless it is to begin a process of retrenchment and curtailment which will ultimately have a very serious effect on the development of its educational plans." And this vast sum, be it noted, is not to perfect any of its numerous departments but merely to pay the interest on the debt of the institution. If this is not "restlessness," what is?

Of such educational "restlessness" there is absolutely no trace in the comparatively insignificant Irish college to which we have called attention; nor has it any wonderful physical apparatus, nor does it possess a million dollar library building, nor has it unlimited money at its command. Nevertheless, it has, according to Mr. Butler's test, scored a splendid success in the work of education. For he tells us that "the real test and measure of a university's efficiency are not the number of students enrolled, the size of its endowment or the magnificence of its physical equipment. The true test and measure are to be found in the productive scholarship of the university's teachers and in the quality of the men and women who go out with the stamp of the university's approval upon them."

It has not, it is true, as far as we know, any special claim to the first of these tests, namely, "the productive scholarship of the teachers," but it has an undoubted claim to the second, which is the only true test, namely, "the quality of the men who went out with the stamp of the college on them." Nor does it need the first, for after all, the "productive scholarship of the teachers" is only a by-product, and may, at times, be not only no test at all, but most harmful to a college or a university. Thus, for instance, Mr. Oscar Morrell Heath, of Englewood High School, Illinois, has published a book which he calls the "Composts of Tradition," in which he describes marriage as "a restrictive device," and advocates a shameless promiscuity of the sexes along with a handing over all the children from such disgraceful unions to the care of the State. Would such "productive scholarship" be a test of the efficiency of a school? Columbia itself was credited with having had an avowed Socialist on its staff. Would his "productive scholarship" be a test of efficiency? Other examples of such "productive scholarship" might easily be cited.

Nor should professors and presidents of universities because of their "scholarship," productive or otherwise, presume to constitute themselves advisers or censors of public policy as the press informs us Professor Barrows, now acting as President of California University has done, when he harangued the Berkley Chamber of Commerce as to the right policy to be pursued by the President of the United States in his dealings with Mexico.

Nor is the multiplication of courses, or the addition of a vast army of professors, or the expenditure of millions a guarantee of educational success; nor above all, is the scheme which has been so often advocated, and is again to the fore of establishing a gigantic national university to which all other institutions of learning will be tributary, calculated to achieve the great purpose of education.

It is true that Mr. Edward J. James, President of the University of Illinois informed the National Association of State Universities over which he presides, that "a great National University at Washington would do more to raise the level of university education than any other means that could be employed." But the very reverse would happen, and such an establishment would be an educational calamity. It would introduce into republican America the discredited political device of that imperial despot Napoleon Bonaparte, who ruined education in France, and imposed an intolerable tyranny on the nation. Similar results would ensue in this country if any such educational plot were carried out. Very soon, and perhaps that is its purpose, it would be a formidable political agency or machine; it would crush out of existence every smaller institution; it would impose its own teachings in philosophy, ethics and religion, no matter how impious or absurd they might be. It alone would find some advantage in the arrangement for its hand would be continually in the national treasury. It might further "productive scholarship" by the help of such large resources, but it would not educate.

ECONOMICS

Nationalization of Railways

We hear from England that a Royal Commission is to consider the advisability and, if necessary, the practical way of nationalizing the railways. There are many in favor of state ownership in this country as well as abroad. Some see in it a possibility of revenue for the Government. If officials, bondholders and, sometimes, shareholders draw a handsome income from railways, why should not Government do the same? Others, who imagine that every capitalist is a public enemy, think the nationalization of railways will reduce the number of capitalists or at least, reduce the amount of capital they own or control. Others again have an idea that if the roads are owned by the State, they will be controlled by the railway operatives; while others take just the opposite view, that State ownership will bring about a much stricter discipline as regards the men, and justify their conclusions by recent happenings in France and Italy. Others think that nationalization will bring about a general reduction of rates, or a more equitable schedule; and there is a residue who would have it on the abstract principle, that public utilities should be owned and managed by the public. Should nationalization be brought to pass, probably all its advocates would be more or less disappointed except the last. These would be satisfied, as doctrinaires, that their principle had been reduced to practice: as for economic results, they would not trouble themselves about such.

That the State may acquire the railways, should the general good demand it, is generally admitted. In England the question is settled by the law of 1844 which empowers it to do so for a sum equal to twenty-five years purchase at the average dividend of the three preceding the transfer. But it also provides that should the average be less than 10 per cent. the company shall have the right to demand arbitration to settle the value of its property with regard to its prospects of better earnings. One cannot complain that such a law favors the companies unduly, unless one be so far advanced in modern economic theories, as to demand confiscation, rather than purchase. Should a similar measure be passed for the acquisition of the railways in this country, one can see that the task of estimating the prospective earning capacity of the roads during the next twenty-five years would be a very difficult one; but, however it were solved, the price to be paid would be enormous.

One may be allowed to doubt whether the acquisition of railways by the State would be worth that price to the nation. The management of a great system so as to satisfy the reasonable demands of the public, and at the same time to pay dividends to shareholders and provide for the interest on bonds and for their due redemption, is a task calling for extraordinary qualities. This is seen in the history of the great railways. Under a certain management they have languished. There has been no question of dividends; the chief care has been to keep them out of the receiver's hands. Then a change of management has come, and with it an increase in efficiency, a general improvement of the property and dividends for the shareholders. The task is made more difficult by the demands of an unreasoning public. Wages must be increased, employees must be multiplied, equipment must be replaced by something newer, tracks must be raised or sunk, but rates must not be touched except to lower them. There have been accidents on the Hartford and New Haven road lately, too many to be explained by mere misfortune. There was something wrong, and it was most important to find out what that was, and to correct it. On this the public had the right to insist. But instead of doing so, it began to clamor for steel cars and to speak of the road's equipment as fit only for the scrap heap. Yet a very few years ago the wooden car, Pullman or ordinary, satisfied every demand for comfort and safety. Its efficiency was not changed by the occurrence of accidents. It is right that a railway should keep up with modern improvements embodying these in its new rolling stock. But to suppose that the introduction of steel cars should be followed by the immediate abandonment of all the old cars and by an equipment entirely new, is absurd. The steel car, as now constructed, has its defects. The fact that the wooden car could yield, enabled it to take up a good deal of the shock of a collision. This the rigid steel car can not do; and one can easily foresee an accident, in which the passengers will be severely injured though the train may be unshattered, to be followed by an outcry for shock absorbers on every car. No company can comply with such demands.

Now it seems highly improbable that the qualities of a great railway manager will ever be found in a congressional railway commission, or in the officials of a Government railway department, any more than those of a great general will be found in a staff-college or in the office of the Secretary of War. On the other hand, once the railway comes under legislative control, legislators with their eye on coming elections will vote for increased wages, increased staff, the introduction throughout the whole system of every new fangled safety device, reduction of rates. In a word, they will seek to gratify the public whim, though unable to grasp the least part of the problem of railway management.

But public ownership succeeds in Europe. In the first place, success is a relative term. What satisfies there would hardly please here. Secondly, the European railways cannot be compared with our great American systems, which not only serve the public, but develop the country. Third, though under Government control, they are not under popular control. Lastly, the chief reason for Government ownership in Europe, is the necessity of subordinating the management of the roads to the requirements of the army, a condition which, we trust, will never obtain here.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

The patronal feast of the Missionaries of St. Charles Borromeo was celebrated with special and elaborate ceremonies, at their Church of St. Joachim, in Roosevelt Street, which is the centre of the Italian colony of the lower East Side. His Eminence Cardinal Farley presided and the solemn pontifical Mass was celebrated by his Excellency the Apostolic Delegate Archbishop Bonzano. The sermon in Italian was delivered by Mgr. Ferrante of the Cathedral, who spoke of the work done for the past twenty-five years in this city of the Missionaries of St. Charles among the Italian immigrants. He also paid an eloquent tribute to their founder the illustrious Bishop Scalabrini of Piacenza, the Apostle of the immigrants.

The installation of Bishop Joseph M. Koudelka, as second Bishop of Superior, took place November 5 in his procathedral church of the Sacred Heart. On the preceding evening he had been escorted to the auditorium of the cathedral parish by a procession of ten thousand men, with fifty automobiles for himself and his guests. Mayor J. S. Konkel spoke the opening words of welcome in the name of the city of Superior and was followed by Congressman J. L. Lenroot. Addresses were then made by Archbishop Messmer, Bishop McGolrick, Bishop Trobec, Bishop Fox, Bishop Rhode and prominent representatives of the clergy and laity. When finally Bishop Koudelka himself greeted his flock in eight different languages, he was received with enthusiastic rounds of applause. At the installation on the following day Archbishop Messmer delivered the sermon, preaching upon the apostolicity of the Church, as the foundation of the present ceremony. In conclusion Bishop Koudelka once more addressed his new diocesans in his own hearty way. "As long as Moses held aloft his hands," he said, "the people of Israel conquered; but when he permitted his arms to fall the victory wavered. You, my clergy; you, my people, are my supporters when like Moses I lift up my hands to heaven that we may triumph over the enemies of our salvation. You, my clergy; you, religious; you, my people, are my glory and my joy. I bless you that you remain my glory, my joy and my consolation to the hour of my death!"

The commemoration by the Particular Council of Brooklyn, Society of St. Vincent de Paul of the fortieth anniversary of the election of its president, Mr. Thomas W. Hynes took place last week. On Sunday morning a solemn Mass of thanksgiving was celebrated at St. James' Pro-Cathedral, which was attended by delegates from the various local conferences. A sermon on the object and work of the Society was preached by the Rev. Dr. James J. Higgins. On Tuesday evening the music hall of the Academy of Music, was crowded by the friends of Mr. Hynes for the civic celebration. The meeting was presided over by Bishop McDonnell. Addresses were made by the chairman of the arrangements committee, James J. Greene; the Society's spiritual director, the Very Rev. Francis J. O'Hara; Justice of the Supreme Court William J. Kelly; James E. Doherty, vice-president of the Superior Council of New York; the Very Rev. John W. Moore, C. M., president of St. John's College; Joseph Keany, vice-president of the Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum Society, and Francis X. Carmody, all eulogizing Mr. Hynes' character as a public spirited citizen and a faithful self-sacrificing Vincentian. Bishop McDonnell was the last speaker, and after paying a tribute to the splendid personal traits of Mr. Hynes, and the work for charity he had accomplished during his administration, he said that when the celebration was first proposed he had given it his hearty approval and cooperation and at once wrote to Rome telling the Holy Father of its purpose. In answer he had received an official letter in which the Pope congratulated the Society of St. Vincent de Paul on the magnificent showing the records of forty years presented and imparted his special blessing to its members and its president. As a further mark of his pleasure and desire to honor Mr. Hynes the Holy Father announced that he had bestowed on him the distinction of a Knight of St. Gregory. This pleasant surprise was received enthusiastically by the large audience and Mr. Hynes modestly thanked all who had participated in the celebration for the encomiums they had showered on him.

Mr. Hynes' splendid work in the executive office is evidenced by the excellent condition of the Society, and its increase from twenty conferences to fifty-six. During the forty years that have elapsed since his election to the presidency, his time has been largely given to charitable and philanthropic work, and he is well and favorably known in charitable circles throughout the country.

The late Cardinal Aguirre, Primate of Spain, shortly before his death, addressed a letter to the American Federation of Catholic Societies in which he said:

"The prolific vitality of Catholicism in the United States is well known to all the world and we are happy to accept the present opportunity of expressing to you our personal admiration. We likewise send our loving greeting of Christian brotherhood in the name of all the Catholic societies of Spain—whose direction the Holy See has kindly commended to us—to those brave and active Catholics, true apostles of the Church, who with heroic perseverance have given to your country such excellent and numerous Catholic societies. We have no doubt that the American Federation of Catholic Societies will splendidly prosper, and we are in sympathy with your labors to the end that all the National Federations may one day be united into an International Federation, and we pray that the day will soon come when this ideal will be realized."

The golden jubilee of the Very Rev. Canon J. B. Bogaerts was celebrated at New Orleans, on November 4, at St. Ann's Church, of which he is pastor. The clergy of the archdiocese and the most distinguished civilians of the community united in paying honor to a priest who for fifty years has so faithfully served his Church and his country. The Holy Father sent him a special blessing and messages of congratulation were received from Cardinal Gibbons, Archbishop Glennon, the bishop of the province and many other notable admirers and friends.

"The supposed high rate of illiteracy in Spain," says the Southern Cross, of Adelaide, Australia, "has been shown time and again, to be largely due to the manner in which the statistics are compiled. They include children under ten, and class as illiterate all those who cannot read and write the official Castilian language, though many can read and write the Catalan and Basque dialects, which are also used by large portions of the population. It was the same in Ireland in penal times, when distinguished scholars, who could read, write, and speak Gaelic and Latin and other languages, were returned as 'illiterate' because they refused to learn the tongue of the Saxon invader. As a matter of fact, Spain is better off than England and other Protestant countries as regards higher education, having no less than ten Universities and fifty-eight 'institutions,' or middle-class schools, of which there must be one in every province. It is a gross exaggeration to say that 70 per cent. of the population of Spain are illiterate. as the 'Statesman's Year Book,' an English Protestant publication, gives the figures for 1900 as 58.9. Doubtless the last census showed a further reduction in illiterates, as there were in 1910 35,000 public schools and 8,000 private schools, with over two million pupils, in a population of under 20 millions. That is not such a bad showing for a poor country, which is largely agricultural."

OBITUARY

Father Joseph M. Caruana, S.J., one of the last survivors of the heroic band of missionaries, who, following the example of the pioneer De Smet, planted the Catholic Faith among the native tribes of the Rocky Mountains, died on October 29, at Spokane. Born on the island of Malta, on August 24, 1836, he received his early education at the Jesuit College of the Island, and finished his studies at the Roman College, where he was raised to the priesthood at the age of twenty-two and a half years. He was received into the Society of Jesus in 1860 and before the completion of the customary two years' novitiate was sent at his own request to the Indian Missions of the Rocky Mountains. He reached Santa Clara, California in 1862, where he completed his novitiate. He was first stationed at the "Old Mission" above the Coeur d'Alène River, Idaho. In October, 1863 whilst accompanying his superior, Father Giorda, on an excursion to some Coeur d'Alène families, who were fishing for salmon in the Spokane River, he administered Baptism for the first time on the site of the city of Spokane, receiving into the Church five adults and seventeen children. The following year was spent in studying the Kalispel language at St. Ignatius Mission, Flathead Valley, Montana. During his stay there he erected the first Catholic chapel in the State of Montana. The next year he returned to the "Old Mission," Coeur d'Alène, where he labored efficiently for the conversion of the Coeur d'Alène tribe, persuading them to give up their nomadic life. He organized the League of the Sacred Heart amongst his flock and so deeply did he inculcate the devotion that even to-day one may see from two hundred and fifty to three hundred Indians approach the Holy Table each First Friday at the Mission.

In 1870 he was appointed first superior of the Yakima Mission; but before setting out for his new field of labor he had the consolation of dedicating himself to God by the solemn vows of the Society in the "Old Mission," Coeur d'Alène. After laboring successfully at Yakima and later at Colville, he returned in 1896 to Coeur d'Alène, established now at the new De Smet Mission, near Tekoa, where he spent the remaining years of his long and useful life. On October 19th, he was the central figure of the impressive golden jubilee celebration, held in Spokane in memory of that first Catholic Baptism mentioned above. Gazing upon the two thousand Catholic men passing in review before him, how the zealous heart of the aged missionary must have rejoiced and thanked God for the marvelous growth of that tiny seed of Faith which he had planted on the banks of the sunny Spokane half a century before. He returned to De Smet on October 27. The following evening he was seized with an attack of heart-failure and calmly passed to his reward on the morning of October 29. He was buried, as he had often requested, under the altar of the Blessed Virgin in the Mission Church.

CHRONICLE

Mexico.—The week has been marked by the usual sensational and misleading reports regarding the Provisional President and the Government of Mexico. The final announcement that a diplomatic reception would be given at Chapultepec Castle, by Señora Emilia de Huerta, the wife of the President, came as the explanation of the statement in the American press that General Huerta had fled for safety to the Fortress of Chapultepec, that he was hiding in the fortress, and that Vice-President Blanquet was planning the overthrow of his chief. Minister Aldape, it was rumored, had broken with the President, and was summarily relieved of his office. The fact is, that Aldape is now on his way to France, presumably on a secret mission for the Government. Increasing success is reported of the rebellion in the North. At Victoria, the capital of the State of Tamaulipas, about 350 miles north of Mexico City, the entire Federal garrison of 2,500 men was killed in the rebel assault on the town. The wholesale slaughter of prisoners is said to have been appalling. The Hon. Jacob M. Dickinson, President Taft's Secretary of War, at a dinner in Washington made the subjoined remarks on the mission of "Special Envoy" Lind: "It is a violation of all international laws and precedents. Nothing like it before has been attempted. . . . I am obliged to state that the experiment has been a failure, not only in the effort of the President to accomplish his purpose in Mexico, but in its effect upon foreign nations. It has weakened our standing as a nation, and has threatened our good name with disgrace." The New York Sun calls attention to a like failure on the part of President Wilson's "Personal Envoy" to Carranza, the Rev. William Bayard Hale, "already as busy as a wind-buffed devil in Mexican affairs long before Mr. Lind was thought of." "The singular goings and comings of the Rev. William Hale constitute not the least perplexing and perhaps not the least distressing factor in the Mexican situation as it concerns the Government of the United States."

Mexican Congress Opens.—President Huerta, on November 20, drove from the Castle of Chapultepec to the Chamber of Deputies, where he read his message in person to the new Congress, the dissolution of which was one of the points insisted upon by the United States in the last communication made to Huerta by Special Envoy Lind. All the members of the Diplomatic Corps now in Mexico were present, with the exception of Nelson O'Shaughnessy, the American Chargé d'Affaires, who had received special instructions from Washington not to attend. The presence of the other members was commented on as an indication that Europe is not supporting the American policy. President Huerta's address was a brief explanation of his motives for dissolving the old Congress, most of the members of which are now in the penitentiary, accused of sedition. No allusion whatever was made by Huerta to the United States.

Mr. Taft on the Philippines.—William Howard Taft, in an address before 2,500 members of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Science, on November 19, warned President Wilson and Francis Burton Harrison, recently appointed Governor-General of the Philippines, against permitting political influences to direct their acts in administering the affairs of the islands. Passing from a scathing criticism of Mr. Harrison's first acts as Governor, Mr. Taft attacked and termed as ludicrous the legislation proposed for the Philippines by Representative

Jones, whose bill granting independence to the islands now is pending in Congress. Even a generation may be necessary, he said, before the Filipinos can be sufficiently educated to understand the burden, restraints and privileges of the liberty they so ardently seek. Representative Jones, he added, "has allowed the intriguing of the politicians of the Philippines, who have sought to exercise influence in Washington, completely to hoodwink him as to the circumstances in the islands and bring him to the advocacy of a bill which would be absurd in its operation and which would destroy the benefit of everything that has been done in the islands up to this time." The $7,000,000 purchase of the land from the Friars, who were the legal owners of the property and could have insisted on their rights, Mr. Taft said, was a political rather than a real estate deal, and he justified it by pointing out that the commission has already sold part of the land to the natives, who otherwise would have insisted upon their agrarian rights, and this sale has wiped out the expenditure. The remaining part of the land is rented to the natives, and agriculture, previously neglected, is being revived.

Court Stays Sterilization.—The New Jersey statute authorizing the sterilization of criminals, feeble minded epileptics and other defectives was declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the State. The act is held to be contrary to the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, guaranteeing equal protection of the laws and to exceed the police powers of the State. The opinion was given by Justice Garrison. He pointed to the danger of permitting legislatures to prescribe those upon whom the surgical penalty might be performed. If sanctioned it might be extended to include those regarded as undesirable by a majority of a prevailing legislature. We discuss this at length under "Sociology."

Canada.—Now that the Macdonald election has been annulled, the Liberals are protesting the Chateaugay election, in which Mr. Sydney Fisher, Minister of Agriculture in the late Laurier Cabinet, was defeated by the Conservative candidate.—The ultra labor organizations are determined to obtain the release of the convicted Nanaimo rioters. At two Conservative meetings in British Columbia a large number of the members got in and howled down the Attorney-General, Mr. Bowser, and the Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Price-Ellison, shouting the Socialist song, "The Red Flag," at the top of their voices. The police were summoned, but were unable to restore order, and the meetings were dissolved.—Much indignation is felt at the exaggerations that are being spread in Germany to prevent emigration to Canada. On the other hand, thoughtful people are beginning to realize that immigration as it has been going on for some years past is not an unmixed blessing, and in a series of articles the Devoir has given good reasons why there should be a Royal Commission to discuss the matter.—Much curiosity is felt regarding the course the Government will take in the approaching session with the Navy Bill. The general opinion seems to be that the Bill will be dropped, that the Government will proceed to the Redistribution Bill based on the last census, and will then dissolve for a general election. What will happen after that no one presumes to forecast.—It is said that the Niobe will be sent to the Pacific Coast to help the Rainbow to protect the fisheries. As the latter, for the lack of a crew, has been unable to do anything in the matter, it is not easy to see how the former can help her effectively.—The Liberals of Manitoba have taken advantage of the Roblin-Samuel fracas to renew vigorously their attack on the separate schools. They are supported by the Protestant press pretty generally throughout the Dominion.

Great Britain.—Mr. Winston Churchill states that the naval estimates will be larger next year. The number of seamen is to be increased considerably. Some of the Radical journals take it amiss and say that he remains at heart a Tory.—Sylvia Pankhurst has started a no-rent movement, in which a pledge is given to pay no more rent until women vote.—The question of Indians in South Africa is growing daily more serious. A thousand struck in the coal mines at Elandslaagte, in Natal, and marched down to Ladysmith, where they demonstrated with considerable disorder. As there are 140,000 of them in Natal, the danger of a general rising has to be weighed very seriously. Their fellow-countrymen in India are keenly interested in the matter, and are petitioning the Crown for justice. The whole matter comes down to the fundamental question: Is the British Empire a reality or not? If it is, the local interests of its parts must be subordinated to the general welfare, and so Canada must contribute to imperial defence. Great Britain must allow an imperial tariff. South Africa and Australia must admit the Indians. If it is not, the Indians may be excluded; but at the same time, Canada must be excused from contributing to imperial defence.—Larkin was released, it is said, on account of the Government's loss of 1,500 votes in Linlithgowshire. The workingmen caused it to be understood that, so long as he was in prison, they would support no Government candidate. The only thing giving a color of justice to the demand for his release was the question urged by his supporters: "Why should the seditious Larkin be in prison, while the seditious Carson is at liberty?" He is now fulfilling his undertaking of "carrying the fiery cross through England." He is making fierce speeches, denouncing the Government, Parliament, the laws, the police, the empire, and throngs hear him with enthusiasm. It is felt that the situation is very grave, that Larkinism is overshadowing Home Rule, the land question, and every other political issue, and that unless the Government can bring itself to act vigorously, no one can foresee where it will end.—The post office employees have demanded higher pay. Their request being refused, they are threatening to strike. The Postmaster-General says, that anyone doing so will be considered to have resigned.—The United States income tax is causing a good deal of anxiety to the holders of American securities; first, on account of the uncertainty of its provisions, which leads many of the companies to make deductions while paying coupons, in order to cover possible demands, and secondly, the fear that eventually income tax will have to be paid on both sides of the Atlantic.

Ireland.—The Nationalists do not propose to allow the Carsonites to monopolize the war-talk on the Home Rule issue and have adopted the same tactics. A circular has been sent to all members of the Nationalist organizations announcing that it has been decided to form a National Volunteer force "to secure and maintain the rights and liberties common to all the people of Ireland." At a meeting held in Cavan there were 20,000 Nationalists present, and in the speeches made and the resolutions adopted, a dominant note was the fixed determination of the Northern Nationalists to resist any attempt to sever their Province from the rest of Ireland when Home Rule is granted, or even to consent to any dismemberment of Ulster for self-government purposes. Reviewing the situation T. P. O'Connor declares: "I remain unshaken in the opinion I have over and over again expressed that the Tories will before the end of the struggle submit with relief to such a compromise as will save Carson and the Orangemen from themselves. What form the compromise will take is not yet certain, but it is some advantage that the cabinet ministers are no longer offering the exclusion of the four Ulster counties, which no Nationalist could accept and even many Orangemen do not demand."—Of the new Land Bill, John Dillon says: "A measure providing for universal and effective compulsion is now offered by the Government, and it is well that it should be clearly understood that the Irish party have no intention of sacrificing that portion of the Bill."—The Development Commissioners have practically solved the difficulties in the way of making grants for experimental tobacco growing in Ireland. The idea of the Commissioners is to stimulate as well as assist the growers and re-handlers to produce an article which will be able in a few years to compete with the regular commercial growers and manufacturers, and it is hoped, at the end of the experimental season to hold their own in the open market.—A census Blue Book just issued shows that the number of Irish-born persons enumerated in England and Wales in 1911 was 375,325. A large proportion of the natives of Ireland in those countries were enumerated in Lancashire and Cheshire, which together contained 129,587; in London, together with Middlesex, Surrey, Kent, and the large suburban towns in Essex, 84,532; in Yorkshire, 32,459; in Hampshire, 16,538; in Durham, 16,074; and in Glamorganshire, 12,875. Altogether nearly 78 per cent. of the total was found in these areas.

Rome.—More American bluejackets availed themselves of the chance of getting the blessing of the Holy Father and several of the officers assisted at Mass in the Sistine Chapel on the anniversary of the Pope's coronation. The great procession of twenty-five Cardinals and a great number of Patriarchs, Archbishops and Bishops and Generals of Religious Orders escorting the Sovereign Pontiff entered the chapel between two lines of privileged persons, among whom were seen many American sailors. The Mass was celebrated by Cardinal Merry del Val.—While the behavior of the American sailors for the most part has been exemplary, while seeing the city and surroundings, some of the newspapers complain because a few bluejackets at Naples engaged in fisticuffs. Several incidents are cited which caused a little annoyance. The Giornale D'Italia prints an open letter to Ambassador Page asking him to intervene on behalf of discipline or to have the warships recalled. Ambassador Page, whose attention was called to the reports, said things were not as bad as they had been made to appear. He was in Naples and the police there commended the sailors for their behavior. One policeman told him some of the men drank a little too much, but they were well behaved and always good humored. Mr. Page said he regretted that the roistering of a few was blamed on the entire party, who, he said, are as fine a body of men as can be found in the world.

France.—The possibility of a rupture with Italy is beginning to be mooted. The reason assigned is the growing strength of Italy. Its population is nearly as large as that of France and needs an outlet, but nearly all of the western half of North Africa is under the Tricolor except a small part of Morocco, while England has Egypt and Cyprus on the East. The concentration of the French fleet at Bizerta and Toulon under agreement with England is another cause of irritation. Moreover, France has taken Greece under its patronage, which of course galls the Italians.—More than 70,000 holders of St. Louis and San Francisco Railway bonds, amounting to 140,000,000 francs, were represented at a meeting in Paris. M. De Peyster, Inspector of Finances, delegated by the Government to report on their status, advised them to organize in defence of their interests, and to accept no reorganization scheme proposed from the United States unless it be perfectly satisfactory. The discussion following was very violent, especially with regard to the share of Speyer Brothers in the business. It seems that the bonds were represented as a real family investment and that 15,000,000 francs were placed last April, the proceeds of the sale being transferred by cable to New York only two days before the sudden revelation of the real condition of the company. The bondholders resolved to follow M. De Peyster's advice and appointed two defence committees, one for the 5 per cent. general bonds, and the other for the 4½ per cent. bonds of the New Orleans, Texas and Mexican divisions.

Spain.—Morocco is not yet peaceful, and a despatch from Tetuan says that Lieutenant Gil Rios and Captain Barreiero, of the Spanish army, were wounded by the Moors when passing over the enemy's position in an aeroplane. Lieut. Rios was wounded twice. Despite their injuries the military aviators managed to keep control of their machine and returned to the Spanish camp, where the aeroplane landed heavily. The two officers were scarcely able to move, and had to be lifted out of the machine. It is said that Lieut. Rios is seriously injured. —The Queen, on her journey, is reported to have fallen ill, but the extent of the indisposition was, of course, very much exaggerated. Meantime, General Valeriano Weyler, of Cuban fame, resigned the Governorship of the Province of Catalonia, on the ground that he was a Liberal in politics and disagreed with the policy of the present Conservative Spanish Government. The General is very popular in Catalonia, and attempts were made to induce him to withdraw his resignation, but without success. Whether this has any political significance is not yet apparent.

Germany.—Socialists are constantly suffering new reverses. Their defeat during the preceding year in Alsace-Lorraine, Würtemberg and Bavaria was followed by the great losses sustained in the recent elections in Baden. A crushing defeat has now been administered to them at Jena and similar results are expected from the municipal elections in other cities. The Centre is everywhere fighting a fearless and successful battle.—The Krupp works have realized during the past year a clear gain of over thirty-five million marks, nine million more than in the preceding year. Fourteen per cent. dividends have been declared as against the twelve per cent. of last year. The immense works have been taxed to the uttermost of their productive possibilities. The employees are participating in the results of the economic success. Two million marks were placed in the pension fund for the officials and laborers, and two millions in the workmen's holiday fund. Three millions are furthermore being expended in Christmas presents for the men.—The tango and similar dances are said to have been placed under interdict by the Emperor. According to this information, officers of both army and navy have been strictly forbidden to dance the tango, the one step and two step, while wearing their uniforms. The tango is discountenanced at court, and a court actress who wished to take part in a "tango feast" was seriously advised by the court director of plays not to participate in it. Officers are counselled to avoid intercourse with families where such dances are favored.—The Guelph Party still expresses its intention to continue the battle "for liberty, justice, and the independence of Hanover." On the recent occasion of the twenty-sixth birthday of the Duke of Cumberland, now ruler of Brunswick, the following message was sent to him: "With deep emotions of joy we look towards the lion-city, and true as the firm hills we await the hour when justice shall triumph likewise in Hanover."—A petition has been submitted to the Reichstag to induce the Government to reconsider its decision in regard to the Panama-Pacific Exhibition. The leaders of the different parties, and particularly of the Centre, had first been consulted, and it is thought that a favorable sentiment exists among the Representatives.

Austria-Hungary.—The nations of the Dreibund are to erect a monument in honor of Emperor Franz Josef, as the only living monarch who took part in the establishing of the alliance between Austria-Hungary, Germany and Italy, in 1883. The three royal representatives who in that year concluded the agreement which was to be known as the Triple Alliance were Emperor Franz Josef, Emperor William I and King Humbert. The Vice-President of the German Reichstag, Dr. Paasche, and the Italian Ambassador, Count Voltolini, have for this purpose held conferences with the parliamentary authorities at Vienna, and the funds are to be contributed by the three nations. The monument is thus to be a new pledge of unity.—The armament budget for 1914 demands 239 million crowns for the army and about 38 million crowns for the navy, including the extraordinary provisions. In addition to this the Minister of Railway Traffic, Dr. Baron v. Forster, announces that plans have been drawn up by the Government to expend 600 million crowns during the coming six years for the building of railways in Austria and Bosnia.—At a meeting held in Budweis more than a thousand German and Czech teachers of southern Bohemia have decided upon a campaign of "passive resistance." Their object is to obtain the increase of salary which had long ago been voted to them, but which, owing to the paralysis of the law, in consequence of the quarrels between Czechs and Germans, has never been given them.—The Slavic papers exult that the Nobel Prize for Literature was not given to the German poet and author, Peter Rosegger, whom they denounced in their protest made to the Swedish Academy as seeking to Germanize the Slav. They consequently attribute his defeat to their agitation. The German press, on the contrary, is calling upon the Academy to clear itself of this imputation. So the unhappy strife between Teuton and Czech, Pole and Ruthenian ceaselessly continues.

Balkans.—Rumors still circulate about the possible abdication of the Bulgarian crown by Ferdinand, but the Bulgarian Legation at Berlin stoutly denies any such intention on the part of the King. Moreover, the abdication would be against the policy of Austria, because Boris, the crown prince, who was given over to the Russian Church by his unwise father, would be evidently in complete union with the Czar. From all accounts he receives scant sympathy from the Kaiser, who is friendly to Greece. Ferdinand, meantime, is in retirement at Coburg, and Prince Boris is said to have left Belgrade.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

The Conspiracy Against Rome

Our alert contemporary, the Excelsior of Milwaukee, recently reprinted from the Freidenker, a rabid "free-thought" sheet of the same city, an article entitled "The Storming of Rome from Every Side." It offers an almost complete roll-call of the forces organized to fight against the Church of Christ. Our friend the enemy has again done us a real service, and we shall not hesitate to avail ourselves of it. We therefore briefly summarize the article in question as an authentic illustration which shows how far bigotry and intolerance have already advanced in our own country. It reminds us of a scene enacted nineteen centuries ago, when the hypocritical enemies of Christ and the ancients of the people gathered in the court of Caiphas and "consulted together, that by subtilty they might apprehend Jesus, and put Him to death." (Matt. xxvi, 4.)

Among the conspiracies formed for the destruction of American freedom and religious liberty the place of honor is rightly given to "the old and true American Protective Association," the A. P. A., which has now been reorganized, with its headquarters at Pittsburgh, Pa. "This society," we are informed, "is at present working in secret with feverish activity. Everywhere Catholics and the friends of Catholics are being closely observed and attempts are made to harm them in political and business life. The Menace, which champions its ideas, has more than 740,000 subscribers."

The second place is assigned to the brave and tried "Guardians of Liberty," who are to defend American citizens against Church politicians, to destroy the Catholic missions among the Indians and to prevent the acknowledgment of Roman delegates. They have a standing committee whose duty it is "to watch Catholics and those who are friendly to the Church, and to prevent them from obtaining any political or economic power." Stationed at the head of this noble militia we find General Miles, who has not hesitated thus to prostitute his influence, Rear-Admiral Baird and Mr. Edward. The headquarters are at New York.

Next follows the American Federation of Patriotic Voters, which claims the control of five million votes. Its president is D. J. Reynolds, of Minneapolis. It would prevent the influence of the Church upon the public schools (!) and the apportionment of any public funds for religious purposes. No less active, we are told, are the United Societies of Equal Rights, centred at Chicago. They are constantly "employing lawyers to investigate the scandalous interference of the outrageously shameless clergy in the rights of American citizens, and to make legal protest against them." It is interesting to note under what patriotic names and with what pretence of righteousness all these organizations strive to cloak their anti-Americanism. Yet for all their pains they find it difficult to hide entirely, even under the most spacious mantle, the horns and the tail and the cloven hoofs.

We next come to the American Secular Union and Freethought Federation, whose president is E. M. McDonald, of New York. Among the objects of the association we notice the following: churches and other religious institutions are not to be relieved from taxation; school books are to be purged from all superstition; religious holidays are no longer to be proclaimed by the President or other public officials; the oath in our courts is to be replaced by a simple threat of punishment, and all Sunday laws are to be recalled. Most delectable is the clause which reads: "We demand that all laws exacting a 'Christian' morality be abrogated, and that in their place a natural morality be substituted, with equal human rights and an unpartisan and true liberty." We presume that free love and similar practices belong to this "natural morality" in question, and we congratulate General Miles upon his new friends.

In the last place we may mention the Bohemian Free-thinkers' Federation of America, the Bohemian Guard of Freethinkers at Chicago, and an entire host besides of Ferrer Associations, Rationalist Societies, Freethought Societies and organizations of the Knights of Luther, whom respectable Protestantism is trying to shake from its skirts. "The Socialists likewise," our freethought informant continues, "are attacking the Church with greater energy and realize ever more fully that in her they must behold their most formidable foe, the chief hindrance to their propaganda. They therefore are indirectly combating this arch-enemy and watching all the friends of Catholicism."

It certainly would be difficult to find a more glorious vindication of the Catholic Church and of her claims to the respect and gratitude of all true American citizens than to be able to point to the long list of organizations we have here enumerated, and to be able to say, "Such are the enemies of the Catholic faith!"

The papers published in America to advance this campaign against American liberty and religious tolerance are the Menace, The American Citizen, The Truth Seeker, The Fra, The Liberator, The American Turner, Sokal, Amerikanische Turnzeitung, and the Freidenker. To this list must be added the three or four hundred Socialist, Anarchist, I. W. W. and Ferrer papers, which, though not founded primarily for this purpose, pursue it none the less relentlessly. The anti-Catholic trend likewise of a great portion of the so-called neutral, and even of the Protestant press is sufficiently obvious. So therefore we are happy to see realized in all its fulness the promise of our Lord:

"If the world hate you, know ye, that it hath hated Me before you. If you had been of the world, the world would love its own; but because you are not of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you. Remember My word that I said to you: The servant is not greater than his master. If they have persecuted Me, they will also persecute you." (John xv, 18-20.)

Such is the reason why as Catholics we rightly rejoice in all these signs of our time. They show that we are not altogether unworthy to be the servants and the followers of Christ, that in spite of defects and faults on the part of individuals among her children the Catholic Church has ever remained the faithful spouse of Christ. "Blessed are ye when they shall revile you, and persecute you, and speak all that is evil against you, untruly, for My sake: Be glad and rejoice, for your reward is very great in heaven. For so they persecuted the prophets that were before you." (Matt. v, 11, 12.) H. J.

Influence of the Church on Modern Music

In describing the centenary of Verdi, which has just been celebrated, a French writer calls attention to the remarkable influence exerted by the Church on the growth of modern music. Thus, beginning with Verdi himself, it was the church tower of the little village of Roncoli, near Parma, that saved the future musician's life when he was still a babe in his mother's arms. Italy was then French territory, and when the terrible Russians appeared there in the war with Napoleon, Verdi's mother fled with her child to the church and hid in the tower. Later on young Verdi was the organist of the little sanctuary that had saved his life in infancy.

If we run down the list of modern musicians we find that upon a great number of them the Church has set her stamp. Thus Palestrina began as a choir boy and ended by wielding the baton as choir director. A Cordelier monk taught Lulli the guitar in Florence; Rameau, who was a pupil of the Jesuits at Dijon, was afterwards an organist in that city. Handel, though a Protestant, learned his music from a Catholic organist; Bach sung in the choir of St. Michael's Church, at Luneburg; Gluck, who followed the courses of the Jesuit College at Komotau, played the violin and sang in the churches of Prague. He was the protégé of Father Czernohorski, and studied music at Vienna, under the organist Sammartini. Piccini, the famous rival of Gluck, was discovered by the Bishop of Bari, who had him educated in the monastery of St. Onofrio, in Naples; Hayden was the son of a sacristan and caught the attention of Reuter, chapel-master of Vienna, who was then hunting for choir-boys. The youngster became first violinist in the Church of the Fathers of Mercy, and afterwards the organist of the Count of Hangvitz. Paisiello was a Jesuit student at Tarento, and Cimaroso studied with the Minor Conventuals. We omit many others, for the list would be interminable; but these are enough to show that almost everywhere it was the clergy that developed the genius of these men and placed them in positions where they might have abundant leisure to meditate and produce their masterpieces.

Perhaps, however, it is worth while recalling the story of young Gretry, who when a child prayed that he might die on the day of his First Communion, if he was not to grow up "an honest man and a good musician." He did not die, but continued to sing as a choir-boy, and then was sent to Rome, where he was trained by the chapel-master Cavalli.

Every one knows that Mozart, whose full name appears on the baptismal register as Joannes Chrysostomus Wolfgangus Theophilus, was the son of the chapel-master of the Prince Archbishop of Salzburg, and that Beethoven was the son of a tenor who sang in the chapel of an ecclesiastical prince, the Elector of Cologne; that Von der Erden, the court organist, trained the boy, and that it was Padre Martini, of Bologna, the great church composer and referee of all musical disputes of the period who gave Mozart a position in the eyes of the world, and the Pope who bestowed on him his first decoration. But perhaps it is not generally known that Meyerbeer, though a Jew, was taught by the Catholic priest Vogl, who was organist of the cathedral of Darmstadt, with whom he lived for two years; Mehul received his lessons from a blind organist at Givet, on condition that he would exercise his talent first at the Recollect church at Givet and then among the Premonstratensians at Valdieu—God's valley, by the way. Spontini's uncle was a priest, and in consequence he had the advantage of being taught by two organists and two chapel-masters. Boieldieu and Rossini were choir-boys, one at the cathedral of Rouen and the other at Boulogne, and it was a monk, Dom Canedagni, who taught Rossini the violoncello. Schubert, after having been soloist in the church of Lichtenthal, was a singer in the imperial chapel. Gounod, who first thought of becoming a priest and for some time wore the soutane, was chapel-master in the Church of the Foreign Missions. Finally Wagner, the idol of the melomaniacs, was chapel-master for the Catholic king of Saxony, and was taught by Weinlig, the cantor of the Church of St. Thomas, at Leipzig. In brief, the very monotony of all this shows the important part exercised by the Church in developing musical vocations. Had there not been this array of church organists, chapel-masters, priest-uncles, monks, canons and prelates who interested themselves in the infant prodigies of the boys' choir, a great many masterpieces in music would never have seen the light.

It is true that many of these church-protégés emancipated themselves and took to profane music, but at all events, they owed their start in the world of music to the Church, which had discovered and educated them. Thus it was the organ-loft that served as a step ladder to the operas, and may we not say that the comic opera known as the "Chapel-Master" is an unconscious tribute to the great clerical Mæcenases of music. Finally, who was it that introduced the opera into France? It was the great churchman, Cardinal Mazarin. Of course it was not the best thing he ever did, but it ought at least to remind musicians and the musical world that the Church has done something for their art. L. C.

Ancient Labor Gilds

III—EVIL FRUITS OF STATE PATERNALISM.

The special privileges which we have seen were conferred upon the gilds by successive Emperors became in turn the occasion of abuses. Men often joined gilds with which they had no trade relations, purely for the sake of the proffered advantages, and even became members of many gilds at the same time. Hence stringent regulations followed, which led the way to State interference to such a degree that life in the gilds became almost intolerable.

Once assumed, the paternalistic attitude of the State was never to lessen, but constantly to increase. The result was a complete degeneration of the laborer, such as we might again witness, under another form, if Socialism should ever carry out its dreams. In return for privileges and immunities, the gilds were put into the service of the State. They were given special legal defenders at court and special judges, during the reign of Alexander Severus. Membership in them finally became compulsory by law.

Freedom of choice no longer existed, for men were born into their gild, which had become hereditary. Duties of every kind were imposed upon the members. The gilds were henceforth impressed more than ever into the service of the State. Most unpopular, however, were the sordida munera, or menial duties they were obliged to render to the public, and which had no relation whatever with the trades of the respective unions. They were to do chores of every kind. But the most oppressive imposition laid upon a great number of the gilds was the obligation of providing free grain or bread for the plebeian population of the capital. Such doles were not only given out at Rome, but were introduced at Constantinople by Constantine, and were offered to the people in Alexandria until the reign of Heraclius. Upon the gilds which were free from such service the State imposed high taxes in lieu of this obligation.

The principal unions at the service of the public were the gilds of the shipmasters, the bakers, the swine-dealers and the lime-burners. The members drew their salaries from the State, were not subjected to torture when accused, and were later even freed from military service, as well as from other public and municipal duties. Strict property and inheritance regulations were imposed in particular upon the shipmen, who were most necessary for victualling the Roman capital. When a shipman's family became extinct another was designated in its place by the prefect. (Cod. Theod. XIII, tit. 5.)

Duties which in earlier days had been rendered by free compact had now become entirely compulsory.

The statute books are full of penalties for men who dared to shirk their portion of the work. Fugitives from the unions, who sought to emigrate into the provinces in order to escape from this oppressive paternalism of the State, were to be returned like fugitive slaves by the provincial governors. A law to this effect was made in 391 A. D. and confirmed in 413.

So strict was the hereditary obligation of remaining in the gild to which a citizen belonged that even a cleric, when found to have escaped from his corporation, was obliged to return to it, according to the law of the year 445, if he had obtained a rank no higher than that of deacon. (Nov. Val. 15.; also Cod. Theod. XIV, 3. 11.) This makes plain how the Church herself was shackled by the State, and how difficult it was for her in this decadent civilization to fight her brave struggle for humanity and brotherhood, and to save what might still be saved.

Most deplorable everywhere was the condition of the Bakers' Unions. The hardships which membership in them implied made it most desirable to escape this thralldom. To render them less abhorrent special privileges were frequently granted, such even as the exemption from the sordida munera. The fact, however, that men were judicially condemned to such a gild tells its own sad story. Moreover, according to a regulation of Constantius, made in the year 355, any one who married a baker's daughter was compelled to enter the gild; and a law of Honorius, in 403, forbade any baker to marry a woman not belonging to the corporation. The penalty in the latter case was no less than confiscation of property and deportation.

The conditions under this form of State Paternalism may give some indication of what, in another way, might be expected if an entire nation were enslaved under a Socialistic State, such as is contemplated by the modern Social Democracy. The politician and ward heeler would practically possess complete control over the persons of the citizens. Those who would find least favor with them would be relegated to the most undesirable occupations. Unless the fugitive slave law would again be reenacted men could not be held to such a sacrifice of their freedom. If, as Socialists feebly argue, there is likewise little freedom under capitalism, it only follows that we must enlarge this to correspond to the true rights and duties of man, and not that we must enslave ourselves entirely. The struggle of Socialism against the Church shows the real nature of the tyranny the red International means to exercise. Its approval of the terrorism and confiscation practiced against the Church in Portugal and elsewhere are a sufficient confirmation of this attitude. Its animosity against Catholic education is relentless as death. Every attack upon the life and liberty of the Church is hailed with exultation in the Socialistic camp. Yet we know that with the passing of religious liberty the last hope of the laborer must likewise vanish.

What has been said of the development of the system of labor gilds in pagan times, even in its palmyest days, must not be permitted to leave the impression that labor was ever honored save under the Christian dispensation, where the influence of the Church could be duly exercised; or under the old Covenant, when the spirit of Jehovah was with His chosen people. A greater simplicity, it is true, prevailed in the earlier days of Greek and Roman paganism, before slavery had appeared in the vast proportions it was to assume in later centuries. Yet to pagan pride labor was ever a disgrace, and modern paganism, even where it apparently champions the cause of labor, is animated by the same spirit.

The system of slavery was a fearful clog upon the labor movement. Slaves were the living machinery of Greek and Roman capitalism. Thousands of human beings were often the possession of one man of fortune. They were the great body of the producers, whose labor was limited only by their physical endurance, if the master so desired it, and whose gain belonged to him entirely. They could, above all, be replaced at little cost. To wear out a slave in a few years was a policy often practiced as more profitable than properly to provide and care for him. With this system the poverty-stricken gilds of freemen and freedmen were compelled to compete.

A great portion of these latter classes, it must likewise be remembered, lived upon the doles of bread or corn which the State was constantly making, and upon the rich legacies and gifts which the Emperors and nobles at times left them. It was important for those in power to curry favor with the idle multitudes gathered in the capital. Their baskets, therefore, were filled by the rich whom they attended as their clients, and the day was pleasantly spent in lolling about the public baths or shouting in the theatre. Perhaps they were likewise indifferently prepared to turn an honest or dishonest penny as the occasion offered. The demoralization which such a life produced can readily be understood, and its reaction upon all classes of labor.

The position of the merchants was more favorable, since they were themselves slaveholders, and so could compete, by means of their gilds, with other capitalists. Yet it is none the less true that the merchant likewise was despised by the Roman patrician, unless he had amassed a vast fortune. Rome, like America, knew how to worship success.

Yet the fact that labor gilds existed through all the centuries of Roman history from time immemorial is a sufficient indication that the solidarity thus produced had its effect in preventing even a lower degradation than that into which labor had fallen under paganism. Free craftsmen, moreover, hoped to become slaveholders themselves in a modest way. That the gilds as such were at times in possession of slave labor is evident from the fact that the right of manumission—of freeing a slave—which could be held only by a juridical person, was granted to the gilds by the Emperor Marcus Aurelius. "The divine Marcus," we read, "grants the power of manumission to all gilds which have the legal right of union." (Dig. XL, 3, 1.) In fact, it was only through its slaves that the gild, by a legal fiction, could be considered an individual capable of acquiring or possessing goods; while its actions against debtors were carried on through a "procurator," who was to act in its place.

The convivial element was never wanting in these societies. Even slave gilds had their banquets and carousals. Fellowship likewise was to be fostered by the gildsmen. Members of the sodalicia, or fraternities, could not appear against each other in court. (Th. Mommsen, De Collegiis et Sodaliciis Romanorum.) Similar customs must have been practiced to some extent in the gilds. It is remarkable that in the funeral gilds slaves are known to have been admitted on an equality with other members. Most important was the practice which dedicated every gild to some divinity, whose feast was celebrated with great pomp and merry-making. Even when this religious instinct had been greatly lost, the statues of the god or goddess must still have held their station in the meeting places. Pagan religion, unfortunately, could do little to restrain the passions of men.

At the period with which we close our review the elements of dissolution were at work within the State. It is an absurd contention, put forth by the historian Edward Gibbon, and other atheist authors, that the decline of the Roman Empire was due to the introduction of Christianity. Only the preconceived purpose, that they must write to disprove the divinity of the Christian religion, could lead to such extravagant misconceptions or misrepresentations.

"The material decline of the Empire is not correlative with nor parallel to the growth of the Catholic Church," says Hilaire Belloc, "it is the counterpart of that growth, and, as one of the greatest of modern scholars has well said, the Faith is that which Rome accepted in her maturity; nor is the Faith the heir of her decline, but rather the conservator of all that could be conserved."

It was the Catholic Church which from its very beginning worked among the laborers and the slaves of the great pagan empire. As she grew in strength, she still sought, as her divinely entrusted mission, to impress upon poor and rich alike the maxims of the gospel with their great twofold doctrine of the love of God and the love of man. It was her task to lessen by every means in her power the evils which she could not prevent, and to save for a new civilization whatever was good and noble in the old. She has no economic doctrines, no political creed; but her mission is to strike at error wherever she sees it affecting the faith or the morality of mankind, wherever in her wisdom—which is of God and not of man, which is of all the yesterdays and not merely of the passing moment—she beholds endangered the supreme law of the love of God and the love of man.

The Catacombs of Susa

For some years past nothing has been heard from the northern coast of Africa but the clash of arms, and the crash of the little sultanates that were toppled over by the European invaders. Spain and France and Italy have been fighting bloody battles in Morocco and Tunis and Tripoli; Agadir and Algeciras are now familiar names for us; and we know all about the Moorish chiefs and their tribesmen who have been flitting like so many shadows across the scene. Hence it is almost a surprise to hear that in those unknown and barbarous and war-swept countries, numbers of people are going in solemn procession to certain wonderful catacombs that have been unexpectedly found there and that just as in the early days of Christianity, the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass is offered in those subterranean chambers where thousands of Christians lie buried, some of them martyrs perhaps, who have been slumbering there unknown for centuries.

These catacombs are in Tunis, near the ancient city of Hadrumetum which is now called Susa and which antedated the famous Carthage of ancient times, and had already a long history when Carthage attracted the eyes of the world. Hannibal used it as a base of military operations against Scipio at the close of the Second Punic War, but later under the Roman Empire it prospered, and Trajan gave it the rank of a colonia. At the end of the third century it grew to be the capital of the province of Byzacena. When the Vandals came, however, they devastated it, but Justinian restored it and called it Justinopolis. Then the Arabs ruled over it and the Normans held it for a time, but at last in 1881 the French flag floated over its walls. To-day it has 25,000 inhabitants, 1,100 of whom are French, and another 5,000, mostly Italians and Maltese.

Its marvellous cemeteries which had been completely forgotten were discovered by the merest accident. A French colonel who was roaming over the Sabatier plain, outside of Susa looking for ruins, thrust his cane into a little hole in the ground and found that there was an empty space beneath. With the spades of his soldiers he soon discovered a solid well-built Roman tomb and under it a vault. When that was broken into, the excavators came upon a long gallery partially filled with earth which they immediately began to clear, and found on either side of it chambers or loculi for the dead all closed with huge tiles or slabs. Soon three galleries were found, but an unfortunate crumbling of the earth along with a failure of funds put an end for a time to any further search.

It was not until 1901 that work was resumed, chiefly through the Abbé Leynaud who had been the secretary of Cardinal Lavigerie in Carthage. He was named Curé of Susa, and he immediately determined to resume the interrupted work of the French colonel. With the help of a distinguished archæologist Dr. Carton, an archæo-logical society was formed in Susa and on November 17, 1903 the Abbé himself was at work, digging in the underground galleries. To his delight he soon came upon a marble slab on which was written the name Veneria. It was the tomb, he concluded, of a converted pagan. The name suggested the pagan, but the words in pace which were cut in the stone showed that she had evidently been won to the Faith.

From that on success followed success. The soldiers of the garrison gave their help and in a few years five catacombs were uncovered containing two hundred galleries whose long lines of sepulchral chambers arranged one above the other were estimated to contain 15,000 dead.

Let us enter one of these subterranean cemeteries. Starting at the foot of an iron cross which stands, in the midst of a clump of olive trees you descend a flight of seven steps which lead down to two chambers, almost quadrilateral in shape and are separated by a passageway from each other. They are crypts in which Mass was formerly celebrated. You enter a long passageway. It is as black as night and crossed and recrossed by a bewildering net work of little streets and alleys forcing you to keep close to your guide. These passages are only a little more than three feet wide and about twice as high. The mortuary chambers placed one above another as in Rome, are rectangular in shape and the interiors are all coated with lime. The bodies of the dead are enveloped in linen cloths, the head is bare and the hands are outstretched. The little chest or chamber is sealed with plaster and tiles.

The perfect preservation of those catacombs is marvellous. They seem to have been made only the other day. Nevertheless at the slightest touch of the finger, skeletons which appear strong and well knitted, crumble immediately into a pile of dust. They are as fragile as the wing of a butterfly. Unfortunately some of the sightseers are anxious to handle these human remains, although the result is that what fifteen or sixteen centuries had kept intact falls to pieces to satisfy a childish curiosity. It sometimes happens that while the bones disintegrate, the plaster in which they were encased remains intact.

Some of these chambers are open, others closed. In the catacomb of Hermes alone, you may pass by on your journey, over 8,000 of them, in half an hour. While you are threading your way there you almost hear at each step you take, the never ending refrain: "Dust thou art and unto dust thou shalt return." On the bricks or mosaics, or occasional white marble slabs that close the entrance of the loculus you read inscriptions here and there in Latin. Only three or four have been found so far in Greek, but oddly enough, they are Latin words in Greek letters.

These inscriptions are usually very simple; consisting merely of the name and age and the date of burial. You have Paula, and Saturnius, and Victor, and Felicissima and Perpetua and then the formula: In pace, but most frequently the one that was in special favor in Byzacena "Dormit in Pace," he or she sleeps in peace. There are no eulogistic epitaphs. African asperity forbade them. However, there is an occasional one such as "Austyce, dulcis anima," "O Austycus, sweet soul!" or again. "To the excellent master of a bad tempered servant." Once when the skeleton of an old Roman centurion of the second Parthian legion was discovered, six officers of the garrison determined to pay him proper honor, and so on March 2, 1912, they went down into the catacombs and stood a few moments at attention, before the open tomb. It was very French; but they thought it the right thing to do for an old soldier.

As you grope through the passages of this venerable necropolis, your steps do not disturb the peace of the place. Your footfall evokes no sound from the tufa on which you walk, nor does the noise of modern Tunis come down from above. And even on the upper earth when everything is asleep in the white glare of the mid-day sun, or during the unchanging and luminous nights of the Sahara, the silence is disturbed only by the chirp of a cricket, the yelp of a dog, the howl of a jackal, or perhaps the prayer of some pious Mussulman offering his orisons to Allah. You can almost hear the throbbing of your heart as you emerge from the silence of the tombs into the hush of the upper air.

At a conference in Tunis, M. Leynaud informed his audience that you find palm leaves cut on the tombs, and occasionally a pelican, an ark or a dove, all symbols of Our Lord. Perhaps also there is an anchor, the symbol of hope. When there is a cross it is sometimes like the Greek letter tau, or one of modern form. The ichthus, fish, is there also with its symbolical letters signifying Jesus Christ, the Son of God, the Saviour. In one case an exquisitely carved figure of the Good Shepherd was discovered, evidently the work of an artist of great merit.

These catacombs do not enjoy the celebrity that they deserve, but doubtless, they will soon come into their own. At present the zealous priest is doing his best to call the attention of his people and the world at large to the sacredness of this resting-place of the primitive Christians of Africa and incidentally to the enormous value of the find for archaeologists. In the interests of piety and instruction he always leads the children of the place down into those depths the day after their first communion and then explains to them what their ancestors suffered for the faith. In 1910, he availed himself of the visit of Mgr. Combes, the Primate of Africa and Archbishop of Carthage for a more solemn ceremony.

In one of the open places of the excavation the illustrious prelate celebrated Mass. The snow-white beard and the ascetic countenance of the bishop made him seem like a presbyter of the early days as he stood in his robes at an altar stone that had doubtless been used for the same purpose by the early bishops of Byzacena and there in the shadows he offered the Holy Sacrifice.

Around him crowded in the narrow galleries were the clergy in their white surplices that gleamed through the darkness, and as they united in singing the Credo tears filled the eyes of every one; even the most hardened sceptics wept, and they were not ashamed. No doubt the souls of the dead gathered around the altar on that occasion, and revived in the souls of their somewhat degenerate descendants some of the ancient thrill of a self-sacrificing faith.

When the throng ascended to the surface, their eyes were dazzled by the light. Before then was a ragged Bedouin astride of his donkey saluting the priest as Marabout and singing his plaintive song as he wended his way to the desert. Here and there on the plain squads of soldiers were going through their maneuvers, and the wild tribesmen were being broken into the tactics of modern fighting which were so unlike their own. Beyond was Susa with its narrow white streets guarded by crenellated battlements. Here and there a palm tree projected its motionless branches from the walls and above were the golden crescents on innumerable minarets scintillating in a sky that seems like a turquoise. But higher than the palms and higher than the minarets, rose the slender steeple of a little church over which glittered the cross and below it the tricolor. Was it a prophecy?

A Supposed Raphael

During the Missionary Congress at Boston Mr. P. E. Duffee, of Ryan & Duffee, 500 Boylston street, invited the delegates to view a very beautiful Madonna and Child he had on exhibition. About the beauty and excellence of the picture there can be no question. It is an expression of affection, of filial affection responding to maternal love. These two, so different, yet with a common origin, may be read in the depth of feeling the artist has succeeded in portraying in the countenances, and especially in the eyes of the two persons. In the Infant Saviour the expression is arch and confiding; in the Blessed Virgin it is tenderly responsive. Moreover, the composition is worthy of note. One may suppose that in a simple two-figure picture with no accessories there is hardly room for composition. But such is not the case. Even there one looks for harmony, dignity and unity. These are obtained by means of the pyramidal construction familiar in the works of the great masters: it is heightened in this picture by means of the oval effect obtained by the placing of one foot of the Child resting lightly on the hand of the Mother.

Who is the artist? Mr. Duffee maintains that it is a work of the great Raphael himself. Some speak of it as "the lost Raphael." This is, at present at least, an exaggeration. Such an expression implies that a well-known work of the master disappeared, and has now been found. Thus we used to speak of "the lost Gains-borough," after the "Duchess of Devonshire" had been stolen. But there is no evidence as yet that this picture was ever generally known, or included in the catalogues of the master's works. On the other hand, it is certain that, before the French invasions of Italy during the Revolution, there were many Madonnas in private collections of that country, attributed to Raphael by their owners, which were carried off by the invaders. Most of the great masters taken by the French Government from well-known galleries, such as the Vatican or the Pitti Palace, were restored in the general European settlement following the fall of the Empire. But those of private owners in private hands were often carried away by the Bonapartists going into exile after the restoration of the Bourbons.

Such, it is supposed, was the lot of this picture, which was discovered, a few years ago, in an attic of an old house in the suburbs of Boston. In considering the question of its authenticity, one may say, first of all, that it is certainly Raphaellesque. The light, sure touch, the long oval eyes set rather far apart, the exquisite treating of the hair, in which every thread is shown, the finely modeled hands of the Virgin Mother with their long, delicate nails, the gracefully posed head and neck, all testify to this. But there is something else to remark. The Child has the cruciform aureole which, as far as we are aware, is, of all Raphael's works, seen only in the Madonna della Sedia. At first sight this is the only thing the two pictures have in common. In the Boston picture the Child is in perfect repose; in the Madonna della Sedia He is in action, turning away from the artist yet looking back, half curious, half shy, with His dress, which in the former picture is arranged decorously, in confusion. In the Boston picture the Mother almost faces one: in the Madonna della Sedia she is turned from the observer. In the former she wears the Madonna's conventional dress: in the latter, that of a contadina. Yet if we begin to examine the two pictures more carefully, beginning first with the Child, and attempt to compare His features as they appear in the Madonna della Sedia, we shall see, perhaps, that the results will be not very far removed from the Child of Mr. Duffee's picture. There is, too, a likeness in the disposition of the hair. The same result will follow the attempt to repose the Madonna herself. One will say that in the Boston picture there is no St. John. This is true; but, as Lanzi tells us, there is more than one example of the Madonna della Sedia, all claimed to be authentic, and in them St. John does not appear always. It might be worth while to compare the Boston picture with such a two-figure example. And here it is worth while to remark that the Madonna della Sedia is not the only picture of Raphael's with its variants. This is explained in various ways. One is that while engaged in his great work in the Vatican the master, either to fulfil commissions, or to rest his faculties, often turned to the production of his cabinet Madonnas. Some of these he would paint throughout with his own hand, others he would sketch and then turn them over to one of his fifty pupils, especially to Giulio Romano, often adding himself the finishing touches. But it is generally held that the long oval eye is a mark of the master's hand.

We are, therefore, inclined to believe in the relationship of the Boston picture to the Madonna della Sedia. Whether it be a work of Raphael's or of a disciple under his guidance, drawn from the same models, or of a later hand imitating the master's style, we leave to experts. The question must be settled by them after a careful study of the technique, the coloring, the pigments, the drapery, even the canvas, a task to which no mere amateur is equal. But we may conclude by asking, what later artist capable of such a work as this would have left it unsigned, or have contented himself with mere imitation? On the other hand, one must confess that the Child is a weak point. In all Raphael's Infant Christs there is an individuality which here seems to be missing. We hope to see the problem solved definitely.

Protestant Episcopal Orders Seventy Years Ago

Among the interesting things in the biography of Henry Livingston Richards, just published under the title "A Loyal Life" not the least is the story of his rebaptism as an Episcopal minister. Like more than one English archbishop, Mr. Richards was born in Presbyterianism. While attending the General Convention in 1844, he began to have doubt regarding his Presbyterian baptism, of which the result was that he was rebaptized by Bishop Whittingham; and it gave him great joy to believe that he was "now a member of Christ's Holy Church." But the question whether he could have received holy orders in that Church while unbaptized, seems never to have occurred to him or to Bishop Whittingham, who was quite active in this matter of rectifying doubtful baptisms. Nothing is said of reordination; and apparently he continued to the end of his ministry without any supplying of the defect, as did also the other clergymen Bishop Whittingham rebaptized.

From this one learns the very loose ideas held on the subject of orders by even the High Church Episcopalians. As to the Low Church Episcopalians, we know what their ideas were. They were definite enough, but not such as would give one any confidence. The ministers of to-day can not change such facts by putting on Roman collars and vestments, nor even by wearing birettas and calling themselves Fathers.

Every now and then things come up to tell us that we are growing old and that a new generation is in control. The Montreal Star has a column headed, "Thirty Years' Ago," in which it tells of ancient happenings in Montreal, and gives the pictures of the actors in them. The other day it told how the Rev. Samuel Massey preached a sermon on Martin Luther, and, as usual prints his portrait. We had not the pleasure of Mr. Massey's acquaintance, yet his picture seemed quite familiar. Mr. Massey may have been a great man in Montreal: the picture given as his presents one who was great throughout the world—Edwin Booth. So a generation has arisen that knows not Edwin Booth. Truly, we are growing old, and the world is running away from us.

CORRESPONDENCE

The "Order of the Star in the East"

LONDON, October 31, 1913.

In a former letter I gave some account of the latest development of Theosophy, and the preparations the leaders of the sect—or some of them—are making for presenting a Hindu youth from Madras to their followers as a reincarnation of the Saviour. In this connection I mentioned that an association had been formed in India, under the name of "The Order of the Star in the East," to prepare for this "Second Coming." Founded two years ago, the Order now claims to be a widespread international organization, and it has this week held its first general Congress in London.

The gathering was not a large one, but those present claimed to be the delegates of 15,000 members, belonging to twenty-nine different nations and to various creeds. The English delegate was a titled dame, Lady Emily Luytens. The Order puts forward as one of its principles the statement that no matter what race or religious denomination a candidate for membership belongs to he will be accepted if he professes the belief in the coming of a great religious teacher, and is willing to prepare for this new revelation being made. But within the organization no secret is made of the belief that the destined teacher, the new Messiah, is no other than the young Indian student Krishnamurti, who presided at the London meeting, and in connection with whose name the blasphemous theory already mentioned is being propagated.

The Order has a depot for the sale and distribution of its publications in the West End of London. In a brief statement of principles which it circulates, ideas and practices taken from the Christian code of faith and devotion are boldly applied to the coming teacher. In fact, the unfortunate dupes of the movement are taught to cultivate an attitude of prayerful devotion, not to the true Saviour of Mankind, but to this promised false Christ. Here are the essential points of this statement of principles and practices:

"1. We believe that a great Teacher will soon appear in the world, and we wish so to live that we may be worthy to know Him when He comes.

"2. We shall try, therefore, to keep Him in our minds always, and to do in His name, and therefore to the best of our ability, all the work which comes to us in our daily occupations.

"3. As far as our ordinary duties allow, we shall endeavor to devote a portion of our time each day to some definite work which may help to prepare for His coming.

"4. We shall seek to make Devotion, Steadfastness and Gentleness prominent characteristics of our daily life.

"5. We shall try to begin and end each day with a short period devoted to the asking of His blessing upon all that we try to do for Him and in His name."

One does not so much wonder at disciples for such a strange delusion being recruited in India by an alliance of European cranks and Hindu dreamers, but it is strange to find that it has won so many adherents in England and Scotland, in France and in the United States. It is one more proof that there is no folly of which men and women are incapable once they turn their backs on the light of Christian revelation and go groping in the darkness of their own shadows. That there would be such delusions our Lord Himself has warned us. "There shall arise false Christs and false prophets," He said, and here is a fulfilment of His prediction.

"Joan of Arc" and Mr. Chesterton's "Magic"

LONDON, November 8, 1913.

Last night we had Mr. Gilbert Chesterton's firstling as a playwright, "Magic," at the Little Theatre, and a few nights earlier Mr. Raymond Roze's grand opera in English, "Joan of Arc," at Covent Garden. The latter having been first in the field, I must accord it pride of place.

The clever son of Madam Marie Roze had long been known as composer, musician, and chef d'orchestre, but this opera on the fascinating subject of the Blessed Maid is out and away his most ambitious undertaking to date. It is understood that in several matters essential to an elaborate production he has been indebted for the co-operation and advice of his famous mother, who—a circumstance not known, I fancy, save to the cognoscenti—resided in her native Paris throughout the terrible siege of 1870-1, and received from Thiers the gold medal for her heroic conduct. Her son's ambition in presenting "Joan of Arc" is a more than laudable one. "I composed it," he says, "because English must not be ignored in opera. To-day English still dominates the letters, the science, and the commerce of the earth—opera alone ignores it." He adds that it is his intention subsequently to stage—always in English—not less gorgeous productions of "Tannhäuser," "Lohengrin," "Tristram and Isolde," "Faust," "Carmen," "Hansel and Gretel," and the ballet "Narkiss." And, in addition to numerous native artists of the first rank, he has been successful in inducing some of the most famous continental stars to sing for the first time in English.

Not less than £14,000 has been expended in staging "Joan of Arc" at Covent Garden, including £1,000 worth of old arms and armor for one scene, and a grand organ built into the Opera House at a cost of £2,000. Only Sir Herbert Tree and the late Sir Henry Irving, in fact, have ever "produced" in this country on a scale of such magnificence. But the setting should be worthy the picture, more especially when that picture happens to be Blessed Joan, of whom one of the most rabid of anti-Catholic authorities has felt compelled to say: "Thus perished the most pure, noble and remarkable heroine in history, for the crime of saving her country, when little more than twenty years old."

The first-night audience for "Joan of Arc" included the Princess Marie Louise and several other "Royalties," and, among contemporary composers, Sir Alexander Mackenzie, Sir Frederic Cowen, and Mr. Josef Holbrooke. The reception was enthusiastic, but seeing that the opera lasted for four hours, there was a consensus of opinion that the blue-pencil would have to be freely employed. Mr. Raymond Roze has imposed on himself an extraordinary task, for he is his own composer, librettist, conductor and producer! I should have mentioned that portions of the score had been heard before, "Joan" having been done as a cantata at Queen's Hall some two years ago. There is nothing particularly original about the music, and Mr. Roze has by no means got the better of the Wagnerian influence by which he has been obsessed for years. Thus, Joan's "farewell" to her native Domrémy is rather obviously inspired by Elizabeth's prayer and by Elsa's ecstatic vision. As for the book, the dialogue is in many respects over-diffuse. The rôle of the Blessed Maid herself was sung by Miss Lillan Granfelt, but in pursuance of Mr. Roze's repertory plan, it was allotted to Madam Marta Wittkowska at the second performance of the opera. Miss Granfelt sings and looks nicely, but her pronunciation of English is faulty, and moreover, she presents the part just as the young and ingenuous country girl, without for a moment being able to introduce the element of mysticism into her impersonation. Moreover, there are one or two anachronisms. Thus the critic of the Daily Telegraph:

"Is the introduction of the 'Ave Maria' into this scene (between Joan and Philip of Burgundy) historically accurate? Surely, the hymn as now commonly used and as sung by Joan first came into universal use only in the days of Pius V, more than a century after the events depicted in the opera. Further, since very great stress has been laid on historic accuracy, the term cannot be used strictly in the matter of the 'ornaments' on the High Altar in the coronation scene, unless we are very much mistaken."

For the rest, the Dunois of Mr. Raoul Torrent was quite admirable, both as to singing and acting. Mr. Mott made an excellent Philip of Burgundy, Mr. Rabke an adequate King, and Miss Gibson a charming Isabeau. Spectacularly, the opera presents a series of magnificent tableaux, whereof the most striking illustrate Charles VII's coronation, the Maid's capture, trial, devotions, martyrdom, and apotheosis. The scenery has been painted by Mr. Lyndhurst, the wonderful dresses designed by Mr. Percy Hurston, and the "historical" accuracy vouched for by the York Herald.

"Magic," last night's première at the Little Theatre, the first essay in stagecraft by one of our most brilliant men of letters, Mr. G. K. Chesterton, is in a prologue and three acts, and is admitted by its author to have been written in three weeks. (It has been waggishly advanced, having regard to the generous dimensions of "G. K. C.," that he might experience some difficulty in negotiating the portals of the "Little" Theatre!) The gifted author prepared us for something a little unusual by stating that "Religion in this play is treated seriously, spiritualism quite sanely, and comedy in its relation to the modern theatre."

So far, good. Mr. Chesterton does his "Magic" with only half a dozen principal characters, one feminine and the rest masculine. But Mr. Chesterton strikes no particular note of originality in so concentrating his action in a few characters, as a dramatic author well known to America, Mr. Haddon Chambers, does the four acts of his brilliant "Tyranny of Tears" with a cast of only five principals.

In some sense "Magic" is a brilliant piece of fantastic imagery, and is hardly, I think, the kind of fare that can attract much money to the twentieth century theatre. Briefly, its story is this: Patricia Carleon has inherited a family habit of "seeing fairies." On a mountain-top one fine day she comes upon a Stranger whom she mistakes for a fay, but who is in reality a conjuror. Patricia's old uncle, the Duke, engages the Stranger for a conjuring entertainment, but Patricia's brother scoffs at the Stranger's art and won't have him at any price. Whereupon the Stranger proceeds to perform "real" miracles, whereat the brother is so quickly convinced that he is stricken with delirium. So, to save the situation, the conjuror invents a false rationalist theory of the tricks or "miracles" he has performed, which satisfies the brother, whilst Patricia, already deeply in love with the Stranger and his art, falls into his arms. How's that for a plot as plots go nowadays?

"Mystical philosophy and epigram" is how the Daily Telegraph's critic defines Mr. Chesterton's curious work, and such a description is neither unfair nor inaccurate. Mr. A. B. Walkley, in the Times, is more cavilling, and in the course of a silly notice pokes fun at the author and the formlessness of his effort. Oddly enough, one of these two critics finds that Mr. Chesterton's Duke is a kind of "ducal Mrs. Nickleby" in his conversation, and the other finds him reminiscent of the Squire in George Eliot's "Middlemarch." This rôle was splendidly played by Mr. Fred Lewis, who kept the audience convulsed whenever he was on the stage. The Stranger, in whom the whole essence of the drama concentrates, could not have been more finely acted by Mr. Franklin Dyall, who brought just the needed touch of weird inspiration to his assumption. Miss Grace played very charmingly, Mr. Wm. Farren made much of a delightful old doctor, and Mr. Heggie interpreted with consummate gravity a curiously interesting type of the Anglican clergyman (he is not uncommon!) who is not particularly clear as to what his beliefs are. A smaller rôle was entrusted to Miss Faith Celli, who is a niece of Mr. Herbert Standing, the once well-known comedian.

If Mr. Chesterton's comedy is comparatively formless, it is always interesting, and that is fifty per cent. on the right side in the theatre. His wit is spontaneous and unforced, and his humor never offends against good taste. If he has had to call in the aid of Messrs. Maskelyne and Cook for his, or rather his Stranger's, conjuring feats, that was inevitable. You never knew what was coming next, and that again is on the right side in play-making. A brilliant first-night audience was vastly pleased with "Magic," and "G. K. C." has made all London talk.

PERCY CROSS STANDING.

In common with other Continental countries, Spain is suffering from the evils of an increasing emigration. A society has now been formed under the patronage of St. Rafael, who watched over the young Tobias on his journey, and it has set itself a twofold purpose: first, to prevent emigration as far as possible; and, secondly, to care for the spiritual and moral interests of those who are determined to go, before setting out, during their journey, and on their arrival.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

"Sad Condition of Mexico"

The marvellous capacity manifested by some American women in absorbing instantaneously a vast amount of information without any visible help, is insisted on at least indirectly by the Boston Herald of November 19, in an article entitled "Sad Condition of Mexico." Mrs. John Lind, the wife of the extraordinary United States Envoy to Mexico, informs the world that "she never saw anything so abject as the condition of women in that country, and that "it is a common report in Mexico that well-to-do Mexicans keep harems." The Herald then proceeds to unload some of its own discoveries about the peons and the illegitimacy of the Mexicans in general.

Now there are several reasons why it is more than likely that the lady in question never made the remarks attributed to her. In the first place, while she was with her husband in her brief visit to Mexico, she had no time to learn anything about the conditions that prevailed there. Even he has so far learned very little. Secondly, as like her distinguished spouse, she did not know a word of Spanish, all her knowledge must have been second hand. Thirdly, she could not have had any acquaintance with Mexican women. For we have it on the best authority that even the most cultivated and charming foreigners, among whom Mrs. Lind of course must be counted, might be a resident for years in the country without ever being able to penetrate into the houses of the wealthier Mexicans. Had she been able to do so, she would not have found their condition "abject," but, as one of her Protestant countrywomen says, "she would have seen them educated, graceful and beautiful, and cultivating the virtues of love, charity and self-denial taught to their ancestors by the old Franciscan missionaries four centuries ago."

Again, we refuse to admit for a moment that such a delicate subject as the "harem," was ever discussed by her with the reporters. It is, however, possible that she read carelessly a passage of Carson's "Mexico" in which he speaks of the Mexican household as a harem, not, however, because it was a seraglio; far from it; but, because it was considered a veritable sanctuary which he and other outsiders and particularly Americans were not permitted to enter. Or perhaps the information came from some hotel clerk who foresaw a tip. For although the desire for knowledge manifested by foreigners about social and political affairs makes as much impression on the average Mexican as a pocket-knife on the sides of Popocatepetl, on the other hand, a thriving trade is carried on in relating fairy stories to satisfy inquirers.

About the oppression of the peons, we Americans should not be too vociferous, when we face the industrial slavery that disgraces our own country. On the whole the peon is having a fairly good time of it, and will continue to enjoy himself unless Carranza drafts him into the ranks of the revolutionists.

The charge of illegitimacy is more serious, for the Boston Herald informs us that: "The official statistics of the Mexican Government show that in one year there were 204,327 illegitimate children born, almost as many as of legitimate children. But as many illegitimate children are not recorded the probability is that more than one-half of the children born in Mexico are illegitimate."

The record looks pretty black, at first sight, but as the United States very discreetly keeps no official records of such things, we are unable to find out how much more virtuous we are than the Mexicans. Perhaps the statistics are withheld, just as were those of divorce which were particularly shameful.

Moreover, there is always a difficulty even for statisticians to determine what constitutes illegitimacy. In Italy, for instance, only civil marriages are considered valid by the State and such is the case in Mexico. But the question naturally arises are the offspring of church marriages to be stamped as illegitimate, because a few rancorous anti-Christian politicians who have seized the machinery of the State will have it so? Evidently not.

The gibe implied in all this, is of course prompted by the common desire in what are called Anglo-Saxon and Teutonic countries to drive into the public mind the conviction that the Latin races are decayed and corrupt. A very unsafe assumption, for the "Encyclopædia Britannica" very boldly states that there is a higher rate of illegitimacy in Sweden and Denmark than in Spain and Italy. But independently of all that, it must be borne in mind that there are far greater sins than that which results in illegitimacy, and in such transgressions of the law of nature, the United States is heinously criminal.

Pan-American Thanksgiving

Mutterings that have been heard privately for seven years against the increasingly official nature of the solemn high Mass celebrated in St. Patrick's Church on Thanksgiving morning in compliment to the Pan-American Union found expression in formal resolutions of protest by various Protestant organizations in Washington, says the New York Times for November 19. And that journal adds: "Particular exception seems to have been taken to the President's acceptance of an invitation to the Mass, though in the seven years of its institution, members of the Supreme Court of the United States, Senators, Representatives, and diplomats have regularly made part of the distinguished audience at St. Patrick's."

The protest against the Thanksgiving service in Washington, comes from Episcopalians, Baptists, Lutherans, and Disciples of Christ. The resolutions of the Episcopalian clergy as printed in the Times seem directed rather against the official character given to the celebration than against the Thanksgiving service itself. Exception is taken not to the religious service, but to the use that in some quarters is made of it. Even Episcopalians, so many of whom claim to be priests and to be empowered to offer the sacrifice of the Mass, recognize no doubt that the Mass, which is synonymous with the Eucharistic or Thanksgiving Sacrifice, is the most appropriate public expression for Catholics, especially for American Catholics, of their gratitude for the great blessings which during the year have been conferred on the Nation by a bountiful Providence.

The first paragraph of the preamble to the formal resolutions recites that: "For the last three or four years there has been celebrated in St. Patrick's Church, in this city, on Thanksgiving Day, a solemn high Mass at which the President of the United States and some members of his Cabinet, the Chief Justice, and several other Justices of the Supreme Court, with a number of Senators and Members of Congress have attended as the guests of honor."

This statement is accurate and needs no comment except to call attention to the fact which is stated by the Times that the "Pan-American Mass was begun in President Roosevelt's time. Under President Taft's administration, Secretary Knox asked the Right Rev. Mgr. William Russell, rector of St. Patrick's, to make the Mass an annual celebration." The initiative therefore, so far as the public character of the celebration is concerned, is due not to Catholics, but to Secretary Knox, a Presbyterian, holding the highest office in the Cabinet of a Unitarian President.

The preamble also states that: "This service is now called in the public press 'the official celebration of Thanksgiving Day,' and is described in the bulletin of the Pan-American Republics as having an 'official character,' and every effort is made by the Roman hierarchy to give this Roman Mass the color of an official function, as if it were recognized as a national service, and as if the President and his Cabinet by their presence wished it to be so recognized, which we are sure is not the case."

Of course, if the public press calls the Catholic service

"the official celebration of Thanksgiving Day," the public press is grievously in error, and there is no one who will not deplore such loose use of terms and trust that the public press will mend its ways. But is it not correct to say that it is the "official celebration of Thanksgiving Day" by Pan-Americans? Lutherans, Episcopalians, Disciples of Christ and Baptists need scarcely be reminded that the representatives of the twenty Latin-American Republics are either Catholics themselves or come from countries 95 per cent. of whose population is Catholic. It should not be surprising that they accept the one external act which is in common use for public celebrations at home and naturally the one in which they can all unite in Washington in publicly thanking the Giver of all good gifts for the blessings conferred on their Big Brother, the United States of America. Is it not far more appropriate and significant than a banquet or a bull-fight?

That "every effort is made by the Roman hierarchy to give this Roman Mass the color of an official function," we seriously question. We know of no member of the hierarchy, Cardinal, Archbishop or bishop who has so designated the service or has instructed others to do so. AMERICA would be a likely paper to be approached on the subject and yet we frankly declare that no one has instructed or recommended that we represent the Washington celebration as something "official," nor have we done so on private initiative.

A few weeks ago, as is customary, the Veteran Corps of Artillery of the State of New York and Military Society of the War of 1812, held its annual commemoration service in the Chapel of St. Cornelius the Centurion, on Governor's Island. Among those who reviewed the parade and presumably attended the religious service, besides many distinguished army men, were the Mayor of New York and several heads of the city departments. Catholics on that occasion expressed no fear that Episcopalians were making capital out of the incident or that they were attempting to foist their religion on State or country.

If "this fact [namely, the solemn high Mass celebration on Thanksgiving Day] has been understood, both in the United States and foreign countries, to give the Roman Catholic Church a prestige and prominence over all other churches," this is due entirely to the nature of the fact itself and seems to be irremediable. When the twenty Catholic Republics all become Baptists or Episcopalians or Lutherans or Disciples of Christ, the same prestige and prominence over all other churches shall undoubtedly accrue to Protestants. Meantime we trust that the President of the United States, the Justices of the Supreme Court, the Senators and Representatives of the United States will not feel that any religious scruple should prevent them from attending the Thanksgiving Mass unofficially, thus showing their wonted courtesy to the Representatives of the Pan-American Republics.

The Fate of Novels

"You call your novel a masterpiece in March," a critic complains, "100,000 copies are sold by the end of April; in May it is the greatest novel of the age; 300,000 copies are sold by the middle of July; it is immortalized as a classic in August; 500,000 copies are sold before the end of September. By November it is dead and forgotten." About three months is the average life of a novel nowadays in the opinion of a contributor to the London Times Literary Supplement. In 1897 the old three-volume novel finally went out of fashion, and ever since, the annual output of one-volume fiction has been constantly increasing. Some 12,000 books of all kinds, it is estimated, are published annually in England, a large proportion of them being fiction. Mr. Andrew Lang used to reckon that out of every hundred who wrote novels only one was fortunate enough to get his work printed, and as he calculated that about nine hundred secured a publisher, that would leave some 100,000 manuscripts that were rejected. An American publisher writes that only about two per cent. of the books submitted are accepted and the Times states that a British firm takes on an average but thirteen out of every nine hundred manuscripts they receive. Bad or worthless, therefore, as is a large portion of the fiction that now gluts the market, we are greatly beholden to the much abused publishers that the deluge is not worse.

As for the ultimate fate of the novel that is actually printed, it is consigned, after its short life on the shelves of the book-store, to the "condemned cell." There it rests for a year or so and is finally sold by the cartload to those who supply works of fiction, for whatever they will bring, to seaside libraries, colonial book buyers, etc. "One other fate reserved for the unfortunates—perhaps the kindest fate of all—is to be sentenced to the paper mills and reduced once more to pulp, to serve, like some palimpsest of old, as material for a new text."

Converts to Rome

"Events are moving rapidly in the troubled waters of Anglicanism," says the London Universe for October 31. It is only a little more than three years ago since the Brighton disturbance brought seven or eight High Anglican vicars and curates with more than 200 of their people into communion with Catholic Unity. Then in March last, came the remarkable manifestation of God's grace in the reception into the Church of seventy chosen souls at Caldey and St. Bride's, who are acting as magnets to many distressed Anglicans. The Universe is authority for the statement that close upon one hundred of the pilgrims to the Welsh island have already found the gift of Faith, and letters are pouring into Caldey from clergymen in high position in the Church of England whose bitter cry may be expressed in the words: "We can not long remain as we are. Pray for us." Seven former Anglican ministers have made their submission to Rome within the past few months. They are all celibates, and several of them have decided to enter at once upon the usual course of study for the priesthood. This is the list: (1) The Rev. Reginald T. Elkins, M.A., Lincoln College, Oxford, formerly curate of St. Augustine's Kilburn, N.W.; (2) the Rev. Arthur Dudley, A.K.C. Curate of St. Stephen's, Upton Park, E.; (3) the Rev. Percy Gateley, curate-in-charge of St. Saviour's, Saltley, Birmingham; (4) the Rev. Ronald Alexander, a grandson of the first Anglican Bishop in Jerusalem; (5) the Rev. Ewart Hillyard Swinstead, B.A., St. Edmund's Hall, Oxford, formerly curate of All Souls', Clapton Park, N.E.; (6) the Rev. William Anderson, B.A., Emmanuel College, Cambridge, curate at St. Cyprian's, Cardiff; (7) the Rev. Leonard Allan Corsbie, of St. Lawrence's, Northampton. The first four started together the last week in October from Charing Cross Station en route for Rome, where they have been accepted as students of the Beda College. It is probable that the remainder will proceed thither before the close of the year. The reason for this defection from the Church of England is not far too seek. These clergymen with many others who are held back by the sacrifices they would be compelled to make have become dissatisfied with the lack of authority and unity in the Anglican Church. In the matter of doctrine within the Church of England, the evident policy is that of "go-as-you-please." The formal teaching of fundamental error as well as the connivance at such teaching shown by those who are supposed to be the guardians of the truth goes on without let or hindrance. The realization that only in obedience to the See of Peter can be found the authority and unity so wanting in the Anglican Church explains "in a sentence, why those seven men, of widely differing dispositions and intellects, have come to the same solemn and definite conclusion."

The great convention of Protestant Episcopalian representatives held recently in New York, which said so much and did so little, is proof that the American daughter is not unworthy of her Anglo-Saxon Mother.

"Circulos De Obreros"

Buenos Aires witnessed a remarkable demonstration by Catholic workmen on October 12. On the return of the Workingmen's Clubs (Circulos de Obreros) from a pilgrimage to Lujan, the men marched in procession through the city and assembled in one of the principal squares to arouse public interest and to petition Congress for legislation in behalf of the workingman. At the head of the marchers were Mons. de Andrea, well known in Buenos Aires for his eloquent lectures against Socialism. With him were two prominent Catholic Deputies, Dr. Bas and Dr. Cafferata, as well as several distinguished Catholic lawyers. Along the line of march the Catholic Deputies were loudly cheered. Sixteen thousand persons gathered in the Plaza Congreso where the speakers made their addresses from an improvised platform in front of the Hall of Congress. Enthusiasm was at its height when the great throng broke out into the national anthem: "The Argentine Flag is Our Flag" which was sung over and over again. The only disturbance was caused by scattered groups of Socialists wearing red buttons who sought to interrupt the proceedings, but their attempts were quickly suppressed by the mounted police. The demonstration had no political significance as it was not arranged under the auspices of any political party, but was a spontaneous manifestation by worthy citizens who sought by constitutional methods to obtain the recognition of their grievances. "There was no violence of word or deed on the part of the demonstrators," says the Southern Cross of Buenos Aires, "no insults were thrown at any man or any class, rich or poor, and the flag of the country, emblem of Argentine independence and nationality was honored. The men who marched to Congress were earnest men; they were determined; they were the supporters of law and order, of society, of justice and fair play, of Argentine sovereignty, of constitutional government." There is no Catholic party as such in Argentina, and it is claimed that for this reason Catholics have not had the representation due them in framing the laws of the country. As an outcome of the demonstration on October 12, perhaps some action looking to a general organization of Catholics to protect their rights may be formed in the near future.

Caldey Again

"Quidquid delirant reges, plectuntur Achivi" may be translated freely: "whatever Episcopalians may say about Caldey, the monks are bound to suffer." We mentioned lately some disgraceful comments on the way these settled the petty quarrel over their property. A gentleman, getting the idea that the most disgraceful of them reflected on Lord Halifax, wrote to the periodical that published it, and incidentally attempted to justify Dom Aelred and his brethren. According to him, the Committee to which the monks entrusted the disposition of their property decided that they should pay "£3,000 to a similar movement in the Church of England," and that Pershore Abbey should be returned to the donor if he so wished. "Hence," he concluded, "this abbey has been placed at the disposal of the Rev. Brother Denys, as a freewill offering to a good cause, by those leaving it, for what appears to them to be a better one."

It is hard upon the poor monks that a defender should treat them worse than do their enemies. These accuse them of theft only: he would make them formal co-operators in establishing a false worship. They could not in conscience pay £3,000, nor 3,000 pence, to help on a Benedictine movement in the Church of England; nor could they make a freewill offering of Pershore Abbey for that purpose. As regards the £3,000, they returned it because it was held that those contributing it would like them to do so. Lord Halifax and his friends may think that it ought to go to Protestant Benedictines, and may undertake to dispose of it in that way; but the Caldey monks attached no such condition, still less did they contribute it to such a purpose. They merely gave it back to the subscribers. Should it be given to the Salvation Army, it will be no affair of theirs and they will make no complaint of breach of faith. As to Pershore Abbey, they simply restored it to the giver. That he was able to dispose of it again, was due to their charity: whether he did so by giving it to "Brother Denys," or by turning it into a place of exercise for territorials, did not concern them in the least.

The result of the Committee shows that there was a good deal of worldly wisdom in those who held that the monks might as well keep what was their own, in spite of the distress of Lord Halifax and others over the "loss of pence," foreseeing that, whatever might be done in the way of propitiation, the monks should not escape misunderstanding and abuse. Fortunately for themselves Dom Aelred and his brethren were not moved by worldly wisdom, but by supernatural charity; while as for misunderstanding and abuse they had learned that they are part of the Christian heritage.

Commenting favorably upon the success with which the Jews of the civilized world aroused public opinion against those who tried Mendel Beiliss for ritual murder, Mr. Arthur Preuss pertinently observes, in the mid-November issue of his Fortnightly Review:

"In our own enlightened country certain newspapers and lecturers are and have been for a long time circulating against the Catholic Church, her clergy, her institutions, sisterhoods, etc., outrageous calumnies and libels which are not one whit less cruel or baseless than the charge of ritual murder raised against the Jews. Have we enlisted the great secular press in our cause as the Jews have enlisted it against the Russian Government and the Anti-Semites, in the Kieff trial? If not, why not? Are we not far more numerous in this country than the Jews? Are we less powerful than they in public life? Do we not love our religion as dearly as they love theirs? Why does the secular press of America unanimously and eagerly defend the Jews against the ritual murder charge, while, on the other hand, it is absolutely callous and apathetic in regard to the awful libels circulated with such venom against the Catholic Church and her priests and religious, who are bone of our bone, flesh of our flesh—our brothers, sisters, children? Surely these are questions worth pondering."

Well worth pondering, indeed! One reason we will hazard is this: Too many of the Catholics prominent in our political, social and commercial life are of the invertebrate type. They fancy they display their "broad and tolerant" spirit to best advantage by showing a studied indifference when questions come up which bear upon the Church's progress and well-being.

LITERATURE

"Color-Hearing" in Francis Thompson's Poetry

An article in the November issue of The Month, entitled "Two Color Poets," deals with the works of Martin Armstrong and Mr. Compton Mackenzie. Reference is made in it to that association of ideas which connects the perceptions of color with the most various sensations, but in particular with the sensation of hearing. The term "Color-Hearing" has not inaptly been invented to express this blending of subtly related impressions received through different senses. Dilating upon the changing effects of the sun's light Mr. Armstrong thus runs through its "scale of colors" in a phraseology borrowed from the art of music:

"ringing sharps
Of scarlet, blue and orange; rich concords
Of mellow flats, deep-rosed or golden noted,
Or murmuring evening-hushed, soft-muted down
To warm and dusky violet."

(Merchant from the East.)

Nowhere perhaps has this association of ideas been more perfectly expressed than in the works of the poet Francis Thompson. For illustration we can do no better than to take the same subject developed by Mr. Armstrong and study its treatment in the poetry of Thompson.

The sun in its rising and setting, in its full noontide splendor and in the countless modifications in which it appears to the human eye, has been a constant subject of wonderment and song for the Catholic poet. It is in this connection therefore that we find some of the most remarkable and beautiful examples of "Color-Hearing" that can be gathered from his verse. Beginning with the sun in its "Eastern pomp inaugural" we shall follow it through its course to the final decline of the "down-stricken Day," noting constantly the poet's translation, as we may call it, from color into sound, or his interpretation of sight through hearing.

The sun in its first effulgence, pouring forth its radiance over the earth, is described in his "Orient Ode." In the poet's sight it is a splendid angel setting to his lips his "flagrant trumpet" and the streams of light are blasts which he sends forth proclaiming to the world the glory of its Maker.

"God hath given thee visible thunders
To utter thine apocalypse of wonders."

As the sun proceeds upon its course, towards its zenith of unbearable brightness, it suggests to the poet another figure. It is now a roaring lion before whose "inassuagable chase" the planets fly in their frightened orbits. So from "the puissant approaches of his face" they have fled "since the hunt of the world begun." No word indeed could better describe the dreadful glare of a fiery summer sun in a blazing cloudless sky, than the one expression the poet has found.

"Thou as a lion roar'st, O sun,
Upon thy satellites' vexèd heels,
Before thy terrible hunt the planets run."

It is, however, in the "Ode to the Setting Sun" that we realize to the full the poet's pomp and power of language, the riot of color in sound and sound in color. It is the supreme, unstudied achievement of color made audible to the ear, of sight transformed into hearing. The sun, in the throes and transports of its dying, is now a stricken king who draws his royal splendors round him in his fall.

"High was thine Eastern pomp inaugural:
But thou dost set in statelier pageantry
Lauded with tumults of a firmament:

Thy visible music-blasts make deaf the sky,
Thy cymbals clang to fire the Occident,
Thou dost thy dying so triumphally;
I see the crimson blaring of thy shawms!"

Words, it would seem, can accomplish no more than this. We wonder whether, like Browning's "wise thrush," the poet can again recapture his "first fine rapture." We are not left in doubt, however, as we turn to "A Corymbus for Autumn." We here come upon his marvellous description of the last tranquil trances of the closing day. The sense of religious reverence, so intimately connected with this solemn moment seizes upon the master. To his vision the Eastern sky has suddenly become a great silent sanctuary, on whose stairs the cowlèd Night is kneeling, while slowly, like a censor, the earth is swung by some invisible Spirit before the Throne of God. Through all this scene we hear the floating mellow tones of light struck from "yon golden gong," the great convex of the setting sun. Though only the first three lines bear directly upon our theme, yet we quote the passage entire, for through it all the same rich, wondrous tones are heard that summon evermore to worship in our inmost souls.

"The calm hour strikes on yon golden gong,
In tones of floating and mellow light,
A spreading summons to even-song:

See how there
The cowlèd Night

Kneels on the Eastern sanctuary stair.
What is this feel of incense everywhere?
Clings it round the folds of the blanch-amiced clouds,
Upwafted by the solemn thurifer,
The mighty Spirit unknown,

That swingeth the slow earth before the embannered Throne?"

There remain many other passages which we are tempted to quote in writing of the Catholic poet's perception of the sublime and mysterious nature of the glorious manifestations of God in this luminary, set as "a greater light to rule the day." We have purposed, however, to deal only with his keen sense of "Color-Hearing," which is perhaps best illustrated by the instances here given. If in Milton we find "darkness visible," Thompson has made color audible.

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

The Coming Storm. By FRANCIS DEMING HOYT. New York: P. J. Kenedy and Sons, $1.25.

"The Coming Storm" is a study of social problems in novel form. A simple story of friendship and love links together continuous discussions carried on in private conversations, in orderly club meetings and in a riotous public assembly,—all turning upon the central theme of Socialism. The perverse and anti-Christian nature of the Marxian doctrines is sufficiently laid bare, while the I. W. W. supply the story with its villains and conspiracies. The weaknesses, errors and faults of Socialism are strongly emphasized, and the dangers to which it leads are pointed out. Capitalism, however, is ordinarily viewed in its brighter aspects, except when attacked by the champions of the revolutionary movement. To have brought out more clearly the distinction between the two classes of capitalists, those who are seeking only their own profits and those who are truly keeping in view the common good in preference to their own selfish gains, would have considerably strengthened the argument of the book. It is a distinction which of course the author does not entirely neglect, especially since he insists throughout upon the need of social reform. Liberalistic capitalism, with its pagan principles, has bred and still is breeding Socialism, and must be regarded as one of the prime factors preparing for the coming storm. The general statement, made by one of the characters, that if the capitalist receives anything more than a small margin of profit we "may be sure he has earned it," should not have gone unquestioned. The abuse of special privilege and the practice of sweating are only too common. In Alfred Drayton and his sister Gertrude the author has placed before us noble Catholic ideals of true social service.

The Fairy of the Snows. By FRANCIS J. FINN, S.J. New York: Benziger Bros., 85 cents.

For the past dozen years or so, Father Finn, the "discoverer of the Catholic boy," has been so busy with the management of a big parish school in Cincinnati that he has had little leisure for writing. His youthful admirers, who are numbered by the thousands, have besought him repeatedly to continue his series of school life stories, and at last he has been persuaded to take up his pen once more and has given us the tale of Alice Morrow, a poor little girl of the tenements. Many of the experiences, which a priest in active charge of a parochial school in one of our cities is sure to have, are cleverly woven into the story, and the author brings home with his well-known adroitness the spiritual lessons that have made his other books so valuable. As the boys and girls Father Finn tells are very real, their wit and humor may not always prove amusing to older readers. There are passages in the book that are hardly in the best of taste, and slang is freely used. But episodes like little Elsie's First and Last Communion, and Alice's wonderful success as a stenographer are in the author's happiest vein. The "Fairy of the Snows" described on page twelve is a much nicer child than the one pictured in the frontispiece. W. D.

Memoirs of Baron Hyde de Neuville. 2 Vols. Translated and Abridged by FRANCES JACKSON. St. Louis, Mo.: B. Herder, $6.00 net.

These memoirs form not only an extremely interesting autobiography but are replete with very valuable information about a great epoch in the history of France. Hyde De Neuville, as his name indicates, was of English origin. He was born in France in 1776. He was always a wildly enthusiastic royalist and when only a slip of a lad was bold enough to penetrate into the very court room where Louis XVI was being tried; he was in the streets of Paris after some of the early massacres and in spite of his youth figured for years as one of the leading conspirators for the restoration of the monarchy. He was absolutely devoid of fear and took the most madcap risks in carrying out his plans. When Napoleon became First Consul, de Neuville was willing to accept the situation because it gave promise of a return of tranquility but he refused to promise any more than fidelity to the new régime. For that he was banished to the United States. After a stormy voyage of fifty days he landed in New York on June 20, 1807. His sketch of American life and his appreciation of the character of the people is of course colored by his enthusiasm at finding himself in a land of liberty. General Moreau, Napoleon's rival, was in New York at the same time, and in spite of the danger of associating with him the reckless de Neuville did not hesitate. He succeeded, finally, in making Moreau a royalist.

Seven years before he came to New York the French refugees from Santo Domingo and Cuba had been coming to the United States. Their destitution of course awakened the sympathies of de Neuville and he succeeded in founding a school for the children which in 1810 had two hundred pupils. We are not aware if this bit of pedagogical history has so far caught the eye of searchers in the records of the metropolis.

When the Restoration seemed assured de Neuville hurried back to France, and on the 4th of July sighted a pilot boat off the English coast which gave the news: "Napoleon in Elba, Louis XVIII in Paris." After Waterloo de Neuville was made Minister Plenipotentiary to the United States. Madison was then President and Monroe Secretary of State. Subsequently he became Ambassador to Portugal. The revolution took place in that country shortly after his arrival. He was closely united to Charles X but was heart-broken when Louis Philippe ascended the throne, for de Neuville saw no hope for France except in a hereditary monarchy. His declining years were spent in retirement. Impulsive, and even reckless in advocating his political views whether it was in conversation with Napoleon or Fouché, or in his speeches from the tribune, or in his counsels to the two monarchs whom he supported, as well as to the infatuated mother of Henri V, the Duchesse de Berry, he was nevertheless esteemed and respected by friend and foe alike. He died in Paris in 1857, with the famous preacher of Notre Dame, Father Felix at his bedside to assist him in his agony.

Codex Rehdigeranus. The Four Gospels According to the Latin Manuscript R. 169, of Breslau City Library. By HEINRICH JOSEPH VOGELS. New York: F. Pustet. $2.50.

This is the second volume of Pustet's "Collectanea Biblica Latina." The first volume of this collection of monographs on the Old Latin and Vulgate text of the Bible appeared in 1912, and the whole set of works was then announced to be under the editorship of the Benedictines, Dom Gasquet and his confrères, who are preparing materials for the revision of the Vulgate. It will probably be years before the work of revision is completed. Meantime various monographs and texts will be issued as by-products. The first by-product of the sort was "Codex Casinensis," 557 in part. Three of these forms were already known and commonly used. The fourth has never before been printed. Abbot Amelli, O.S.B., thinks this translation to have been the work of Rufinus. The issue of the new Old Latin Psalter is most important to text-critics.

Almost equally important is Dr. Vogels' reprint and study of "Codex Rehdigeranus." This valuable manuscript is of the seventh century and has the complete text of the Gospels, except John xvi, 13; xxi, 25. The text is that of the Vulgate of St. Jerome; but many of the Old Latin readings,—those that preceded the revision of Jerome,—have infiltrated into it. Hitherto the only extant reprint of the whole manuscript had been that of Haase (Breslau, 1865-1866). This edition was so rare, that Dr. Wordsworth, in his critical edition of the Vulgate, makes little use of the "Codex Rehdigeranus," and tells us, in his Prolegomena, that his few references thereto are second-hand and depend upon Tischendorf's edition of the Greek New Testament. All critical students of the Latin Vulgate will be obliged to take notice of the scholarly work of Dr. Vogels. In view of such work it surprises one to find some scholars still so biased against the Church as to take for granted the falsehood that textual criticism ended in the Catholic Church with the issue of the Clementine Vulgate of 1592. That falsehood smirches the pages of even a scholar like Dr. Kirsopp Lake, Professor of New Testament Exegesis in the University of Leiden.

WALTER DRUM, S.J.

Aus Zeit und Leben. Ein Buch noch nicht edierter zuverlässiger Beispiele und Zitate für Prediger, Konferenzredner, Katecheten, Schriftsteller und Erzieher. Gesammelt und herausgegeben von OTTO HÄTTENSCHWILLER. New York: Fr. Pustet & Co. $1.65.

The author, as the long explanatory title of his book indicates, has collected illustrations and brief quotations intended to be of service for the priest, the public speaker and the writer. The work is distinguished from many others of a similar nature in that the editor has confined his selections to incidents and citations which, except in rare cases, have never before appeared in such collections. He has in particular searched with great care through the twenty-two volumes of the famous World History by Dr. John Baptist Weiss for authentic anecdotes and examples. His object has been to offer nothing that has not been accurately substantiated. In every case the reference to his authority is given. The various indexes are almost confusing in their variety, and occupy about a fifth of the entire volume. In binding it is durable and attractive. This literary quality of the work should likewise serve as a recommendation.

Roma, Ancient, Subterranean, and Modern Rome in Word and Picture, by Rev. ALBERT KUHN, O.S.B., D.D. With Preface by His Eminence CARDINAL GIBBONS. Part I. New York: Benziger Bros., 35 cents.

The forty pages comprising this first section of Dr. Kuhn's valuable work, which the publishers are getting out in eighteen parts, are filled chiefly with a historical survey of Pagan Rome from the days of the Seven Kings through Republican times, to the downfall of the Empire. These periods are treated quite briefly, as the author doubtless means to devote most of his book to the story of Early Christian and Medieval Rome. We catch glimpses of the sturdy heroes who were the admiration of our school days, such as the Horatii, Curius Dentatus, and Regulus, to say nothing of the vigilant geese that saved the city, and the changes that took place under the Consuls, the Triumviri and the Emperors, are well summarized. The work is richly illustrated. The frontispiece is a portrait in colors of the Holy Father and there are half-a-dozen full-page illustrations in this section besides numerous smaller pictures.

The Panama Canal Illustrated in Color. By EARLE HARRISON. New York: Moffat, Yard & Co., $1.00.

As there are said to be some Americans who hardly have the leisure and others, it is whispered, even lack the means, for journeying to Panama just now to inspect our "big ditch," they will be glad to know of Earle Harrison's handsome book about "The Panama Canal." Opposite each of the seventeen pages of descriptive text there is a fine reproduction in color of the author's original autochrome photographs of the Canal and its surroundings. We have seen no pictures that give a better idea of the work our engineers have accomplished at the Isthmus. The magnitude of the enterprise may be gathered from facts like these: Since the United States Government began to dig in 1905, 90,000,000 cubic yards of rock and earth have been removed from Culebra Cut. This "Grand Canyon of the Canal" is 500 feet deep at Pedro Miguel and a half-mile wide. The forty-six gates to the lock chambers are steel structures seven feet thick, eighty-five feet high, and each consists of two "leaves" weighing 700 tons apiece. The concrete lock chambers are 1,000 feet long and 110 feet wide. To protect the Atlantic entrance to the Canal there has been constructed a breakwater fifteen feet wide, rising ten feet above high tide, and extending out to sea for two miles. Mr. Harrison's beautiful pictures give a good idea of what all these figures mean.

Grace Keon's "Life on Earth of Our Blessed Lord for Little Catholic Children" has proved such a popular nursery book that a second edition of the work has recently come from the press. The author's experience with tiny boys and girls has taught her that they learn most readily what is written in simple rhymes and sung to an easy tune. So she takes the main events and incidents in Our Saviour's life, devotes to each a jingling stanza of eight lines, adds a prose paraphrase and furnishes the book besides with thirty or more attractive pictures that it will do the children good to remember. Mothers and teachers when shopping for Christmas, would do well to examine this book. (B. Herder, 50 cents. Kenedy is the New York agent.)

In "The Barbary Coast" (The Macmillan Co., $2.00) we have some sketches of French North Africa, by Albert Edwards, who boasts that he can dress the part of a native, though he cannot speak his language. It is therefore a collection of an outsider's impressions, some of which were received, not from the natives of the Coast, but from the Europeans who frequent it. We are sorry to have to say that some of these impressions are, both objectively and subjectively, by no means edifying.

The Rev. George A. Gordon dedicates a volume entitled "Revelation and the Ideal," (Houghton, Mifflin Co., $1.50) to "those who believe that the ideal is the shadow of God in the mind of man." From this one can gather very easily what his idea of revelation is. He says many pretty things which we hope may be useful in some way to his disciples; but as he has built his house upon the sand, its fate, as well as that of all who trust themselves to it, is certain to us, who are not of the number of those to whom he offers its hospitality.

Herbert Quick, the author of "On Board the Good Ship Earth" (The Bobbs-Merrill Co., Indianapolis, $1.25) tells us that this book is a survey of world problems. True to his name, he has lost no time in the survey and the solution of them. Unfortunately his solutions depend, not upon accepted principles, but on his own mode of viewing the problems. Mr. Edward Alsworth Ross, of the University of Wisconsin contributes an introduction, in which he tells us that Mr. Quick is "unique" as a social problem solver. We are glad to hear it, and hope, though by no means blindly, that it is true.

The New York Sun satirizes thus the "literary notes" with which the publishers of best-sellers nowadays supply the Press.

"Who is Throbba Sniffleoff? That is the question which the public is asking and which is also inflaming court circles, both in the United States and Europe. Two continents and a number of large islands have been thrown into a furore by the brilliant new novel 'Oozing Hearts,' to which the nom de plume Throbba Sniffleoff is signed. Messrs. Stringer & Co., publishers of this amazingly brilliant work, deny all information as to the identity of the authoress, but in London literary circles it is whispered that the pseudonym disguises a certain beautiful and adventurous Princess of the Russian royal family, who is famous throughout Europe for her purple hair and her collection of emeralds. American readers of this thrilling book—we refer to 'Oozing Hearts,' by Throbba Sniffleoff, published by the Stringers—especially those Americans familiar with the inside workings of the Russian court, seem to favor this theory as to the identity of the authoress. Who but a Russian princess with purple hair and emeralds could have written those passionate and vivid scenes between Dimitri and Vodka on the back stairs of the Winter Palace? And who but a woman with purple hair and emeralds could write with a frankness so nearly approaching rankness? Again we ask with bated breath: Who is Throbba Sniffleoff, author of that superb novel 'Oozing Hearts,' published by Messrs. Stringer & Co.?"

The writer of "Topics of the Week for the New York Times Review of Books, has these words of praise for John Ayscough's recent volume of stories:

"It is scarcely a matter of opinion that 'Gracechurch' is a good book which cannot fail to benefit its readers. . . . It is not a satirical or ironical book, but it denotes human foibles with unflinching accuracy and kindly humor. It is, in short, a true picture of life without a suspicion of 'modernity.' England was inhabited by people like the Gracechurch folks when John Ayscough was a boy, and they have not all been driven out yet by any means. They are not the people Mr. Bernard Shaw encounters and portrays, but they are not less lovable for that reason. 'Gracechurch' deserves to be read by all persons who like to get out of modern rush occasionally."

P. J. Kenedy & Sons, publishers of this city, have added to the Board of Directors of their corporation three of their employees, William J. Hirten, who has been closely identified with the general management of the business for several years past; James F. Doonan, manager of the Book Department, and well known for many years to Catholic book buyers throughout the United States, and Joseph H. Meier, who for the past ten years has been the Editor of The Official Catholic Directory. Robert J. Culhane, the attorney for the company, has also been made a Director. The business was established in 1826 by John Kenedy, the grandfather of the present proprietors.

THE DRAMA

The Taint of Paganism

There is one class of plays offered to the public at the present time which, as every one knows, openly teach immorality. Thus, for instance, the latest abomination of Bernard Shaw ends with a supposed declaration of the Empress Catherine of Russia, that the man who does not accept every chance to indulge his passion ought to be put in a museum as a curiosity. The press reports that although this shocking production which had no right to be called a drama displeased the critics, it pleased the audience. Evidently such people are beyond hope. Nor are the plays which profess to be written for the purpose of suppressing vice by exposing it, much better. For besides pandering to a prurient curiosity, intentionally or otherwise, they are conspicuous for their lack of common sense, as well as for their ignorance of human nature.

Thus, for instance, the play called "Ourselves" is intended to assail the assumption which no sober person ever maintained, that there is one kind of morality for a man, and another for a woman. Far from proving that this double code exists, it shows the very opposite. It installs a street walker in the house of a benevolent but silly social worker and surrounds her with all the comforts of home which are undreamt of luxuries for the recipient. They are to show the prodigal how nice it is to be good. After a month of this agreeable method of moral regeneration, the "cadet" whose property she had been appears on the scene. Of course he is repelled, for the hawk has sighted another quarry: a member of the household and a married man. The inevitable happens; the two offenders are equally depraved, the woman as bad as the man. Moreover, the whole plot reveals an amazing intellectual simplicity in the playwright. A month's ticket of leave in such surroundings where there is not the slightest suggestion of any religious influence in the work of reformation, would never have resulted in making a creature of untamed passions turn such a sudden somersault into exalted virtue. Indeed, during her sojourn in this model home, the poor wretch has not received the slightest suggestion of the sinfulness of her life, or the spiritual help she needed to rise from her sin. When sent out into the streets again, she merely expresses her regret that she has caused such unhappiness in the family, and promises to warn her girl friends not to be guilty of such ingratitude. How the man arranged matters with his wife is left to the imagination of the audience. Perhaps, however, "Ourselves" is meant to be a revelation of the irreligion or unreligion which prevails in the family life of the upper classes to-day, and which is as great a menace to society as the immorality of the slums. Incidentally it disposes of the illusion that vice is necessarily connected with poverty. There was as much sin in the fine family, where the drab was harbored, as in the back alley where she usually lived.

Another example of the family decay in Christian life is presented to us in what is called "The Strange Woman." Inez Pierrefond, whose patronymic sounds like a French rendition of "bottom rock," which she has most decidedly struck, is a foreign divorcée who takes up with a brilliant architect in the town of Delphi, Ia., dispensing, however, with the superfluous preliminary of marriage. The irregularity is discovered by John's precise and proper mother who of course is shocked at this violation of the traditions, but not overmuch; so she proceeds to initiate the erring Inez into the secrets of cooking and other household activities, and ends her work of conversion by showing the frail creature John's picture as a baby, in a red plush album. The hard heart of the hitherto rebellious Inez melts; she consents to marry John and every one is happy. The red plush album did it.

It is hard to determine whether this is a sneer or an aggravated case of preternatural simplicity. It is just possible that it is a modified representation of an event that occurred a few years ago not in far away Ia., but in nearby N. Y. It is a village idyl. The mother of a twelve-year-old son left her willing or unwilling spouse to step across the road and begin housekeeping with another individual. "Anyhow," she said, "I was never married to Number one." The neighbors were not startled; not a bit. On the contrary, the village never saw a costlier holiday when every one turned out to celebrate the nuptials and approve of the proceedings.

A few years ago such happenings would have been impossible in a self-respecting Yankee village, proud of its connection with the good old colony times. So too, would it have been unthinkable a few months ago, that a number of Catholic ladies could imagine no other means to raise funds for a shrine in honor of one whose name we would not like even to mention in this connection, except by a performance and a dance which are not associated in the public mind with the furtherance of piety. Staid old Catholics with conservative tendencies must have shuddered when they read in the public press that the "young women of society who were in costumes wore the loose trousers, caught a little above the ankle, which are typical of Western Asia, and they found this form of garb most satisfactory in pursuing intricate steps of the tango and the popular one-step when the floor was cleared for dancing after both the afternoon and evening performances. It made a charming Arabian Nights spectacle, aided by well calculated effects in the lighting."

It is all the more distressing as even the beer-drinking and duel-fighting soldiers of the Kaiser are not allowed to indulge in such gyrations; for the news came from Berlin on November 20, that at "a big charity ball given the previous night there was no tango on the programme, and it was noticed that the one and two steps were danced by none of the officers present."

If charity could forego such assistance, enlightened piety or indeed the most ordinary intelligence should do likewise.

EDUCATION

Sex Instruction Barred from Detroit's Schools—Meeting of the Catholic Students' Association of America—Registration in the Jesuits' Schools of North America—"Agriculture Day"

An item in the news columns of the daily papers told us the other day that the postal authorities of Chicago had decided against the admission to the mails of the fascicles on "sex instruction" prepared by the physicians entrusted with the new subject introduced into the curriculum of that city's schools. These fascicles, it appears, contain synopses of the instruction to be imparted to the young people attending the classes, and are intended for wide distribution among the parents of children frequenting the public schools in order that they might be fully informed of the nature of the topics discussed. The postal inspectors explain their decision by the affirmation that the topics treated as well as the manner of treatment used in the synopses bring the publications within the limits of the law excluding obscene and improper literature from the mails. The decision should help to open the eyes of the men and women who have been loud in their approval of Mrs. Ella Flagg Young's experiment.

That excellent lady's project received another set back early in the month. Superintendent Chadsey, of the public schools of Detroit, definitely put himself on record against the plans of the eugenists to introduce the teaching of sex hygiene in the high schools of that city. The Detroit Free Press, commenting editorially on the action of Dr. Chadsey, declares that "his pronouncement will be received with approval and with a feeling of relief by the great mass of sensible, old-fashioned folk who believe that parents should retain some control over the upbringing of their children, and who are convinced that those parents are, on the whole, as well able to guide their offspring aright in the more intimate matters of human existence as is any faddist masquerading as an expert."

The Detroit Superintendent does himself honor in the vigorous expression of his objections to the system inaugurated by Mrs. Young in the Chicago schools. Some of the reasons of the faith that is in him are, indeed, of so fundamental a nature as to create the hope that no headway will be made toward the local introduction of this pernicious vagary while Dr. Chadsey retains his position as head of the schools in the Michigan city. "The subject of sex relationships," says the Free Press describing Dr. Chadsey's stand, "is one which inevitably tends to morbidity if anything greater than the most casual emphasis is laid upon it. The adult population of America to-day is suffering seriously from the evil effects of just such emphasis. A great portion of the people seem to be able to think of nothing else. It is talked about at the club and by the fireside. It is given prominence in the theatre. It is pored over in the novel or short story of the day. The result is a most unhealthy state of the public mind, and sometimes it appears that the American people are positively threatened with monomania sexus."

Dr. Chadsey does not plead for crass ignorance,—what reasonable opponent of the sex hygiene folly for children does? He makes his plea solely for the exercise of common sense. "To permit the mental infection so widespread now among their elders to spread to boys and girls through public and formal discussion of the subject while they are at an age when they should be thinking of almost anything else in preference to it, would be disastrous. To encourage such an infection through school instruction is little short of criminal."

And the Free Press writer well adds: "Even parents who know their children best and are most in sympathy with them realize how difficult it is to impart all the information necessary to their well-being in the manner best calculated to do them good rather than evil. The demand that a public school teacher attempt to do this work in a classroom, that he or she speak to a crowd of young people en masse and at the same time try to appeal properly to each individual, is hideous. The best pedagogues know that class work is far from an ideal method of instruction even in such commonplace branches as arithmetic, geography and spelling. How can it be made to pass muster in explaining a subject as intensely personal and delicate as the one under discussion?" The Superintendent of Detroit's public schools is to be congratulated on his timely and sensible stand.

Archbishop Keane of Dubuque and Bishop Davis of Davenport were among the speakers at the fifth annual convention of the Catholic Students' Association of America, which met at Iowa City for a three days' session on November 13th, 14th and 15th. The association held its first meeting at Iowa City five years ago, at the time of its organization. Since that date its members have assembled annually in various universities and colleges throughout the Mississippi Valley, and Catholic students from all over the United States have taken part in its gatherings. Business and round table discussions took up the greater part of the time, and on November 13 a banquet and reception were held at the New Jefferson hotel. The members and delegates were guests of the Newman Society of Iowa University at the Iowa-Ames game on Saturday.

On October 1 of this year the total registration of students in the Jesuit Colleges in the United States and Canada was 20,500. Of this grand total 15,419 were following the usual college or high school courses and 5,081 were doing university work in the professional schools attached to the schools of the Society of Jesus in Fordham, Georgetown, Chicago, Detroit, Milwaukee, Omaha, St. Louis, Toledo, New Orleans, and San Francisco, leads with 6,490 in its high schools and colleges and 1718 in its university schools; the Middle Western, or Missouri, Province has a registration of 4,720 students in its lower schools and 3,127 in its university classes; the Province of San Francisco numbers 1,839 high school and college students and 133 who are doing university work; the New Orleans Province reports a registration of 923 in the lower schools and 103 in its professional courses; the Colorado-New Mexico Mission has 206 students in its one college in Denver, and in the five colleges of the Canada Province there are 1,241 attending Jesuit classes.

Dr. P. P. Claxton, the United States Commissioner of Education, has lent his influences to the "Back to the Farm" movement. According to a bulletin issued from his office in Washington he believes that a plan already in vogue in several of the States ought to be introduced into the school year's program everywhere. This is the holding of an "Agriculture and Rural Life Day" on some fixed date each year, with suitable programs prepared by the school children themselves, somewhat after the fashion already followed in all the schools for "Arbor" day and "Bird" day. On this day Dr. Claxton would have the ordinary class work give way to a form of public exercises in which the dignity and worth of country life, the development of the soil, the charm of simple and wholesome living shall be panegyricized in prose and verse and song. To this end he has caused a special bulletin to be prepared, by experts in his department, which offers to all interested in the project copious suggestions of material for such a day's program. One does not care to be too critical, yet, while some good may result from this multiplication of "days" in the school term consecrated to special topics quite outside the purpose of the class room, the expectations of those exploiting these particular fads should not grow especially sanguine because of the Commissioner's approval of their aims. The "Back to the Farm" movement, to be as successful as its promoters hope to make it, needs other and far more practical incentive and inspiration than that contained in the pretty sentiment of school children celebrating an "Agricultural and Rural Life" day.

Education in Argentina

Whatever may be the merits of Argentine public school education in theory, the Southern Cross of Buenos Ayres believes that in practice the whole system from the Primary base to the University apex is saturated with contradiction and paradox. The chief grievance seems to be that in Argentina the State school instead of welcoming and encouraging the cooperation of individual effort places every obstacle in the path of the private school. The State school seems to be jealous of the private school, and instead of welcoming competition which would undoubtedly raise the entire character of education, it seems to fear that competition will imperil the success of those institutions supported and controlled by the Government. Why is it, asks our contemporary, that the incorporation of the Catholic University has been refused? If the students are able to prove by the conclusive test of examination before a board of inspectors appointed by the State University and not over-friendly to private institutions that the students of the latter have mastered the official program, what more can be required? On the other hand, the instruction in some of the National Colleges is notably superficial. Here is a case in point. Three years ago 215 students entered the faculty of engineering. In the following year the number dwindled to 130. In the third year only 15 students remained to complete the course. Those who fell away were unable to continue their studies because of inadequate preparation in the National Colleges for the University. Much of the general education of the country, we are told, is going on steadily in the private schools. They are doing excellent work, literary and technical, for the Republic, notwithstanding or rather in spite of the jealousy and thinly-veiled hostility of the State school. And so it appears that the people of Argentina in the matter of education have struggles of their own.

SOCIOLOGY

Sterilization Unconstitutional

It is comforting to learn that not all the world has gone mad. Catching the infection from some men and women insane upon the subject of the physical perfectibility of the human race, and the obligation of procuring it in any and every way possible; and persuaded with all the obstinacy of monomaniacs that every means of doing so is just, the legislatures of certain states have passed laws for the sterilization of the feeble-minded, epileptics, criminals, and other defectives. Among them was the legislature of New Jersey. The Supreme Court of the State has just declared the statute unconstitutional on grounds that must commend the decision to any rational man or woman. In the first place, it is held to violate the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution which declares all persons born or naturalized within the United States, and subject to its jurisdiction, to be citizens of the United States; and forbids any state to make or enforce any law abridging the privilege or immunities of citizens of the United States. Seeing the lengths to which state legislatures have gone in the matter of social legislation, we cannot but be grateful to find that their unhappy victims are under the protection of the Federal Government and may appeal with no little confidence to the Supreme Court of the United States. The second ground of the decision is an immediate consequence of the first. The practice in question exceeds the police power of the State. This may also be deduced from the very nature of such powers. Their function is to maintain public order, and therefore includes necessarily, the prevention of threatening disorders. But, in the first place, that a disorder can be said to threaten, it must be proximate; and secondly, in preventing it there must be a due proportion between the disorder and the means due to prevent it. Should robberies or burglaries be prevalent in a certain district, the police may arrest evidently suspicious characters, compel them to give an account of themselves, and, if this be unsatisfactory, order them to move on. If there be good reason to believe that they meditate burglary they may be forbidden to be abroad after nightfall; but unless there is sufficient reason to connect them with burglaries already committed, they cannot be imprisoned. Imprisonment is a means of holding one suspected of crime for trial, or of punishing one convicted of crime; but it is not a means of preventing crime. Still less can a person be imprisoned merely because it is remotely possible that he will commit a crime. On the other hand, to be feeble-minded or epileptic, or even to have a criminal record, is not a crime. Society should use every lawful means to reduce the number of such persons, but to violate one of the fundamental rights of every human being, is not a lawful means. With regard to the feeble-minded, or epileptic, these as such, are no particular injury to the community in which they live. They are objects of charity, rather than of the police. They are to be protected and, as far as possible, cured; and in this way their offspring will be helped. Should their condition be such as to make them incapable of caring for themselves, they must be cared for at the public expense. This means that they must be put into asylums; and the necessary consequence will be that they will not reproduce their kind. But this result will be obtained as we say, per accidens. It follows, that segregation, but is not its formal effect. Moreover, such a consequence of segregation is no violation of the rights of the segregated. One may have a right, but if he is not able to perform the duties necessarily connected with that right, it remains suspended as regards its exercise. I have a right to drive an automobile along Fifth Avenue, but until I have acquired the skill necessary to avoid accidents, I cannot exercise that right; and so it is suspended. Such treatment of the afflicted differs altogether from the positive privation of their natural rights included in sterilization. As for criminals, when one has paid the penalty of his crime, he re-enters, ordinarily speaking, into the exercise of his natural rights. The way to check them in these, is again indirect. Were they punished adequately, were previous convictions always held to oblige to greater severity, were there fewer pardons and were convictions not so often upset on technicalities, the criminal classes would be on the whole, in their proper place. As for those who are remotely criminal either on account of their parent's antecedents or on account of their surroundings, they could be dealt with by means of religion, if only public authority would give it its due scope, and by that improving of environment, in which the benevolent are interesting themselves to-day. There is no such thing as a necessary criminal. Man is a moral being. He is susceptible of moral influences; and if these be dominated, as God's providence demands, by supernatural religion, none need remain unreclaimed.

Lastly, the Supreme Court of New Jersey points out the danger of allowing a legislature to proscribe any class. Once the principle is admitted, it would be impossible to restrict its application. It might be applied to any that the majority of the legislature should choose to term undesirable. It is unnecessary to enlarge upon so prudent an observation. Examples of the abuses that might happen, will occur to any one who takes the trouble to think the matter over.

While on this subject we may remark that there is a way, favored by a good many, of reforming criminals, which however, it may help, is not likely to prove efficacious without moral and religious training. Two prisoners were sent from Michigan to Chicago to be operated upon for the cure of moral delinquency. On their return they both assured the judge that they were cured, and were full of the most virtuous aspirations. Whereupon the judge paroled them. Both probably were Catholics. The judge believes that they are morally regenerated, and hopes, to send those appearing before him in the future to the operating table, instead of to prison. If the two regenerates do not help themselves with religion, they will soon be, we fear, in the hands of the police again.

H. W.

PERSONAL

Father Jerome S. Ricard, S.J., is receiving special attention now from the news gatherers of the press as "the Wizard Weather Man" of Santa Clara University, because of the remarkable success he has had in forecasting weather conditions in California. We find this about him in the San Francisco Monitor: "The weather forecasts made last week by the Jesuit astronomer, Fr. Ricard of Santa Clara University, have all come true. Father Ricard promised rain and rain came; not little local rains, but million-dollar gold-drop rains from Tehachapi to Oregon; rains that mean fortunes, made and secured, on the Pacific Coast." And then it goes on to quote Father Ricard as saying: "A storm is an air-wave and the latter is analogous to a water-wave; it has a trough and a crest, a starting-point and a forward movement. The low is the trough and the high the crest. The rate of motion of a water-wave can be measured. So is it with an air-wave. Hence science can tell when and where it will arrive, especially where there is no obstacle as at sea. The land offers more difficulty."

Mr. Wilfrid Ward, the English Catholic biographer and editor of the Dublin Review is in this country on a lecture tour. He began the course at Philadelphia Nov. 14, under the auspices of the American Catholic Historical Society with an address on the "Four Cardinals of the Catholic Revival." On the evening of Dec. 5 he will speak in New York at Æolian Hall, W. 42d Street, for the benefit of the Laymen's League for Retreats and Social Studies, his subject being "Cardinal Newman and His Critics." Mr. Ward will be in this country for some months.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

In an editorial on the methods being pursued in New York by suffrage advocates, the World of Nov. 19, said:

"In her methods of agitation Mrs. Belmont is rendering a service of very doubtful value to the department-store employees whose condition she professes a desire to see improved. From her personal standpoint of militancy, the opening of her campaign may have been correctly staged. It was noisy and spectacular, and all the principal actors achieved as much notoriety as they had a right to expect from the affair. Presumably some of them had a more serious purpose.

"Inciting women who have to work for a living to strike and throw away their positions and their pay is not the only way or the best way to help them to better their circumstances. If the conditions of their work are bad, if they have just grievances, outside sympathy and support may be of real benefit in hastening a change.

"The worst counsels are those of violence and strife, where intelligent co-operation is possible. Publicity alone accomplishes marvels. The public is never slow to take sides and make its moral influence felt when it is plainly shown that any class of workers is subjected to injustice or hardship through the greed or indifference of employers.

"It is the misfortune of a certain element of militant suffragists that they hurt more causes than they help and yet never learn wisdom."

Printed Lewdness as a Business Proposition

Under this caption the Evening Mail of Nov. 19, said editorially:

"The deliberate and systematic effort of certain newspaper and magazine owners to increase the circulation and profits of their publications by arousing lascivious curiosity through the persistent presentation of the details of 'sex problems' deserves the earnest attention of every thinking man and woman.

"Nor should any one be deceived by the attempt to disguise an unscrupulous commercial policy based on pruriency as a movement to promote social morality.

"It is not enough that the criminal courts may be invoked to punish direct and gross offenses against public decency and morality.

"Every effort should be made to arouse fathers and mothers to guard their innocent boys and girls against the sly, insidious lewdness offered to their immature minds in the form of 'romances' or 'popular science' articles.

"These panders to the lowest and most perilous human passions, who prey on the unlimited imagination and limited experience of the young, should mercilessly be sought out and exposed. Their publications should be excluded from every decent house.

"Signs are not wanting that the work of spreading this commercialized filth is increasing, and is assuming more daring forms, while those who make money by it are seeking to give its debasing allurements a false air of respectability by cunning arguments about the necessity for sex enlightenment as a social prophylaxis, a matter that belongs to parents, physicians and discreet, responsible teachers.

"There should be an organized and determined crusade to keep this printed poison out of our homes.

"It is better to prevent than to punish."

CHRONICLE

Mexico.—One hundred and eighty-four wounded men were in the Juarez hospitals, near El Paso, Texas, on Wednesday, November 26, following the unsuccessful Federal attack on that city, to which Pancho Villa and 6,000 rebel troops returned and where they are now quartered. Villa captured a number of field pieces and a military train. Apparently the greatest number of dead as a result of the fighting were those who faced the firing squad and paid the penalty of supporting the Huerta cause rather than that of Villa, Madero or Carranza.—Admiral Fletcher left Vera Cruz on the battleship Rhode Island November 24, with John Lind, the Special American Envoy, to investigate alleged threatening conditions in the oil districts of Tuxpam and Tampico. The Admiral's report regarding the Tuxpam field, where British and American interests are situated, showed there was no cause for alarm and that no immediate aggressive action on the part of the United States to furnish protection would be necessary. The situation at Tampico was found to be similarly controlled.

British Oil Behind Huerta.—In a lecture on the Mexican situation, delivered in Washington, November 23, Henry Lane Wilson, ex-Ambassador to Mexico, declared that British oil interests were behind the present Government in Mexico, as American oil interests were behind the government of Madero. Mr. Wilson was introduced by Representative Kahn, of California, and among his hearers were several Senators, Representatives, army and navy officers, and members of the Diplomatic Corps. It is Mr. Wilson's view that constitutional government, in Mexico, as people of the United States construe such government to be, is utterly impossible. This is primarily true because 80 per cent. of the people can neither read nor write. With this material, he says, the kind of government which the administration of President Wilson is asking cannot be obtained.

Colombia Again Protests.—The Presidents of all the South American Republics have received copies of a resolution adopted by the Colombian Congress, protesting against the recent public declaration of former President Roosevelt in Buenos Aires, that his action in the Colombia-Panama matter had been right. The resolution declares "against any public approval given to the loss of the Colombian Province of Panama, done in 1903 by President Roosevelt, according to his own confession." "This protest," the declaration adds, "is based upon such public approval being unjust, as it supports a manifest violation of the law of nations . . . and stands in opposition to the actual attitude of the Government and people of the United States, who profess to be animated by the very different sentiments of equity and international friendship."

Colombian Oil Grants Dropped.—The oil and other concessions obtained by Lord Murray in the Republic of Colombia, where he went on behalf of the Pearson concern, have been surrendered by Lord Cowdray. In confirming the report of the abandonment of the concessions, Lord Cowdray said: "Lord Murray, of Elibank, withdrew our application for a concession when he saw that the request was being used to stir up American opposition to the Pearson interests. I have just been informed of this action, which was taken on Lord Murray's own initiative. Our withdrawal is definite and absolute." The concessions sought from the Colombian Government, but which were not finally granted, as they had not received the sanction of the Colombian Congress, apparently would have given the Pearson concern indiscriminate right to construct harbor works and canals, in connection with the exploitation of Colombian oil deposits. The contract was signed by Lord Murray last April, and was approved by President Restrepo and his Cabinet. It was intimated the grant would give British interests, closely allied with the British Government itself, a right to build an inter-oceanic canal by way of the Atrato and Cupia rivers. The Colombian Congress will consider the American syndicate's request for oil rights, which request, it is said, is now on its way to Bogota.

Zelaya's Arrest Ordered.—Attorney-General MacReynolds, on November 24, honored a requisition made by Nicaragua for the arrest and extradition of José Santos Zelaya, former dictator of that Republic. The request for his extradition was made by the Nicaragua Assembly through Secretary of State Bryan. Zelaya is charged specifically with the murder of a fellow-countryman named Sixto, but it is likely that the execution of Cannon and Groce, two Americans, by Zelaya's orders, may figure prominently in the proceedings. When Zelaya was permitted to enter the country there was surprise that he was not deported as an undesirable. It now appears that the Administration was then busy with the Nicaraguan Government, and wanted Zelaya where he could be caught as soon as the papers reached Washington. In fact, Zelaya, in coming to New York, fell into a trap. Cannon and Groce were put to death four years ago by order of Zelaya, who then was President. Two weeks later, December 1, 1909, Secretary of State Knox handed the Nicaraguan Chargé in Washington his passports, and announced that Zelaya was personally responsible for the murder of the two men. Later in December, the same year, Zelaya, on the arrival of an American naval expedition in Nicaragua, abandoned the Presidency and escaped on a Mexican gunboat, which had been sent to his rescue by Porfirio Diaz, the President of Mexico. From Mexico, Zelaya went to Europe, and remained there until his arrival in New York a few weeks ago.

Philippines.—A depletion of the forces of the Philippines which has reduced troops and companies to half their size and made regiments a shadow of themselves, is the startling situation discovered recently by a Manila Times reporter, after a careful investigation. Its cause is the unwillingness of soldiers to reenlist and the dearth of recruits coming from the States. The seven-year term of enlistment and the abolition of double time for colonial service are held as largely responsible for a situation which is becoming serious. On the last three transports the average number of enlisted men who left for the United States has been more than 300, nearly all of whom were about to be discharged. In September, 29 men came to the Philippines to offset the loss of 300; in October, 34. Of the men discharged few intend to reenlist. What the outcome will be is uncertain, although it is confidently stated that the regulation for army reserves will be changed before January. Certain it is, says the Times, that unless there is a change the department of the Philippines will reach a stage of dangerous weakness.

Argentina.—There was disappointment for more than 20,000 persons who went to Rosario on Oct. 19, to a bull fight. The jefatura politica forbade the sport. The prohibition excited surprise, as the feria had been widely announced in the newspapers and by posters. At the last moment an order was received from Sante Fé, signed by the Governor, stating that the Minister of the Interior, Dr. Gomez, had wired that bull fights were absolutely prohibited in the Republic. The people protested, but the police succeeded in enforcing the law.—On the same day an interesting ceremony took place at Luna, when the seventh son of the Post-Master, Señor Julio Bahia, was christened. The municipal delegate, Señor Felipe Palacios, represented the President of the Republic as sponsor.

Canada.—The National Transcontinental Railway is now complete between Quebec and Winnipeg. The Grand Trunk Pacific carries it on to the Rocky Mountains. The road through to Prince Rupert will be opened, it is expected, next year.—The Grand Trunk has reduced the working time at its Montreal shops by five hours a week. It was thought better to do so for a time, than to lay off any of the 1,900 men working there.—Chief Justice Hunter, of British Columbia, has ordered the release of thirty-four natives of British India, held in Vancouver for deportation. The decision, however, turned on mere technicalities in the Order-in-Council, under which they were to have been deported.—The Canadian Pacific offices in Austria have been reopened, but emigration business remains forbidden pending the report of the official inquiry. Its former agent, Mr. Altman, has been released on bail. His place has been taken by a Mr. Veit, formerly an Austrian Consul in the United States.—The last census shows a considerable increase in the Indians of Canada. That they are advancing in a certain kind of civilization is proved by a British Columbian Indian just convicted of manslaughter. Before he attacked his victim he took out an accident insurance policy, and during his trial his wife consulted his lawyer as to her right to collect it, in case he were hanged.—Sir Wilfrid Laurier has come out for the abolition of all duties on food. He professes to think that such a policy will reduce the cost of living. Perhaps what is really in his mind is, that if the people can be persuaded that such will be its effect, the Liberals will have a good chance to regain power at the next election.

Great Britain.—The troubles of the Indians in South Africa, now that these are doing more than mere petitioning, are beginning to attract attention. Several journals advance the assertion that South Africa cannot be allowed to pursue a selfish policy that will imperil India. Mr. Samuel speaking apparently for the Government, proposes the paradox that the firm bond of union in the Empire is the 'exercise by each self-governing dominion to do what it likes within its own boundaries. Lord Hardinge, Viceroy of India, has offended the South African Government grievously by expressing his sympathy with the Indians in South Africa. As the Natal employers of labor say openly that they want Indians as indentured laborers, but not as farmers, and as the Indians, as soon as they have worked out their indentures, pass under oppressive laws imposing on them a special tax and restricting their Freedom, Lord Hardinge could not have spoken otherwise without increasing seriously Indian discontent. —The Suffragists announce that they have formed a uniformed and armed police force, under the command of Mrs. Drummond, sister of General Sir John French. Its business will be to protect Mrs. Pankhurst against the police of the Government. —The Globe claims semi-official authority for the statement that there will be no more all-big-gun superdreadnoughts, on account of the success of submarines against them in the last naval maneuvers. —Rachael Peace, a suffragist, found guilty of arson, has been sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment with hard labor. She comes under the Home Secretary's decision excluding criminals of her class from the "Cat and Mouse Act."

Ireland.—According to the decennial summary for the years 1901-1910, issued by the Irish Registrar-General, during the decade, the population of Ireland dropped from 4,468,501 to 4,385,421, a loss of 83,080. The marriages registered during the ten years were 227,211, as compared with 221,608 during the previous decade. The total births registered during the decade was 1,023,352, as compared with 1,055,020 for the previous ten years. As the births were 1,023,352, and the deaths 767,256, the former exceeded the latter by 256,096, indicating a natural increase in the population. During the decade 346,024 emigrants (or 7.8 per 1,000 of the population) left Ireland. The number of emigrants would thus appear to have exceeded the excess of births over deaths by 89,927. During the last 40 years there has been a well-marked decrease in early marriages. Of the 1,023,352 births registered during the decade, 2.6 per cent. were illegitimate. —Industrial conditions in Dublin, consequent on the strike, do not improve, neither side responds to the appeals of the peace-makers, and there is open advocacy of the most radical Syndicalism. One result of the troubles is the exposure of the shocking conditions of the tenement districts, which indicate that Dublin is, with the exception of a few Oriental towns, the most congested city in the British Empire. There are 21,083 one-room tenements, one-fourth of them occupied by five or more persons. It is shown that the rehousing of the poor must now be attempted on a large scale. —The deaths are announced of the famous astronomer, Sir Robert Ball, who was born in Dublin in 1840, and of the Rev. Andrew Rorke, S.J., a native of Limerick, aged 85, who had held many important offices in the Irish Province. —Much public indignation is expressed at the recent repeated refusals of the Cunard steamers to enter Cork Harbor for the American mails, and thereby causing a delay of from six to eight days in their delivery in New York. —It is reported that contracts have been signed for the construction of the harbor at Blacksod Bay, in connection with the proposed steamship line between that port, Halifax and Boston. —According to the Belfast News Letter, Premier Asquith informed a delegation of Ulster Liberals, who protested to him against the exclusion of Ulster from the provisions of the measure, that the Home Rule Bill must pass as it stands now.

Rome.—A warning is given in the Osservatore Romano, that loyal Catholics cannot endorse the proposed new Liberal Nationalist Catholic party in the Italian Parliament, made up of the "progressive" Catholics who desire to exercise political action without ecclesiastical control, for they are independents who affect to believe that the "Non Expedit" has been totally abolished. The President of the Catholic Electoral Union claims 228 pledged Deputies in the incoming Italian Parliament. One hundred and forty candidates deny that they have in any way pledged themselves as to their attitude on religious measures.

Italy.—On November 27 the King and Queen attended the opening of Parliament, which was the first in which the representatives of universal suffrage were seated. His Majesty glorified the exploits of the army, and the advantages accruing to Italy by the conquest of Libya in the way of emigration and civilization. He referred also to the domestic reforms in contemplation, such as that of determining what the press calls "the rightful place of women"; and the attitude of the State to the Church, the latter "to have the most ample liberty without, however, being permitted to hamper the State," a precaution that seems somewhat cynical, especially as His Royal Highness added that "the State could not admit any limit to its sovereignty." Finally the army was to be placed on a better footing, and the rich were exhorted to be more generous in their contributions to the public exchequer. —The appointment by the King of three Socialist Senators—Profs. Pulle and Catti and Signor della Torre, a banker—has aroused much comment in Rome. The appointments are ascribed to the King's democratic tendencies. —The Pope's physician, Dr. Marchiafava, was also appointed a Senator. It is reported that the Pope sent him a message of congratulation and expressed the hope that the new honor would not make it necessary to abandon his post of consulting physician to the Vatican. He replied that he would continue to give the Holy Father medical attention, but would not attend public functions at the Vatican.—At a special audience the Pope warmly commended the successful efforts of Senora Decosta and her husband in placing a replica of the famous "Christ of the Andes" in the Palace of Peace in The Hague. The Holy Father spoke enthusiastically of the large part that both North and South America are having in bringing about universal peace.

France.—On November 27, the debate on the new loan of $260,000,000 needed to cover the budget deficit, was begun. M. Jaurès protested that no loan should be considered until the Government gave assurance that its program would be a pacifist one. He wanted France to take the initiative in proposing universal arbitration. M. Barthou, the Premier, replied that such a proposal on the part of France had already been tried, but had failed, namely, when France had proposed that the Balkan quarrel should be referred to The Hague. The Triple Alliance turned down the request. The Chamber agreed with the Minister, for the motion was lost by a vote of 439 to 148.—The differences between Bulgaria and Greece concerning prisoners of war will be submitted to the arbitration of President Poincaré. Bulgaria complains that Greece still holds and refuses to release Bulgarian prisoners of war, contrary to international law.—All French spinsters and bachelors more than thirty years old, unless they have at least three persons dependent upon them, are to be subject to an increase of 20 per cent. in the income tax. The committee in charge of the bill, which has taken four years to prepare, will submit it shortly to the Senate.—The claim of the Naundorfs to be Bourbons was recognized by the courts on November 27. La Patrie, which denied any such claim, was sued by Louis Charles de Bourbon, head of the Naundorf family, and fined $100. As is commonly known, Karl Wilhelm Naundorf, the Comte de Richemont, and Eleazar Williams all claimed to be the descendants of Louis XVII, the Dauphin who was supposed to have escaped from prison after the execution of his father, Louis XVI. Eleazar Williams was a missionary to the American Indians when the Prince de Joinville, son of Louis Philippe, met him and induced him to forego his rights for a financial consideration. That fiction was laughed at. Not much was heard of de Richemont, but Naundorf presented his claim in 1833, and was accepted as being what he said he was. He died in Holland in 1845, and the Dutch Government permitted his son to bear the name of Bourbon.

Germany.—The recent Zeppelin disasters have only stimulated the nation, as well as the aged inventor, to labor more energetically than ever at perfecting their huge air crafts. On November 22 the latest and most modern dirigible of the Zeppelin type, "Z. 6," successfully made its trial flight of 250 miles. Work is likewise progressing rapidly upon the new marine airship which is to replace the dirigible "L. 2," at whose destruction the entire crew of 28 persons perished. All the improvements deemed necessary to avoid similar catastrophes in the future are being made.—While the German papers have been exceedingly reticent regarding our Mexican imbroglio, saying little more than that our politics are unintelligible to them, Professor Bingham, of Yale, has published an article in the Berliner Tageblatt, in which he declares the Monroe doctrine to be obsolete. In the strongest terms he condemns the new interpretation given to it, and declares that in view of the anti-American sentiment of South America the entire doctrine has become meaningless. The article has created no slight sensation.—The regulation of Emperor Wilhelm forbidding the officers of both army and navy to dance the tango, the one-step and the two-step while wearing their uniforms has likewise been extended to diplomatic circles. In consequence the program for the ball following the Thanksgiving day dinner arranged by the American colony was hastily changed, since every member of the Diplomatic Corps would have been obliged to absent himself. The American company was to be permitted freely to disport itself when the official guests had departed.—The Reichstag opened November 25, after an intermission of almost five months. The memory of the members who had died during this interval was honored by the President, Johannes Kaempf, at the opening of the session.

Austria-Hungary.—The committee appointed to investigate the "emigration scandal" has completed its work. The report demands that the Austrian ship traffic be freed from exploitation by the pool. It declares that the increase of emigration is due to the economic crisis, and condemns the steamship lines as guilty of "gross abuses." The Government is finally urged to ask of Prussia a reorganization of its stations, which are at present in control of emigration. The four officials of the Canadian-Pacific Bureau, who had been held in custody at Czernowitz, were set at liberty under bail of seventy thousand crowns. The number of those who had escaped military service was shown, during the investigations, to have been exaggerated.—Great satisfaction is expressed at the hearty reception accorded in England to the heir apparent of the Austrian throne, Franz Ferdinand. Another diplomatic event of considerable importance was the visit paid to the aged Emperor, Franz Josef, at the castle of Schönbrunn, by King Alfonso of Spain.—An army consisting of thousands of unemployed workingmen marched in closed ranks towards the Parliament building at Budapest, and was greeted along the route of march by an immense throng with loud expressions of sympathy. In their enormous demonstration before the House of Parliament itself the men poured forth denunciations against the Government, and the situation threatened to become critical. They were finally dispersed by the police, who had sent out calls for assistance in every direction.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

"Is Exemption from Taxation a Favor?"

There appeared in the Public Ledger of Philadelphia, in its issue of November 20, a letter addressed to the editor of that journal by Rt. Rev. Mgr. McDevitt, Superintendent of Parish Schools in the Philadelphia archdiocese, which deserves careful reading on the part of many among us. Just the other day the newspapers of New York gave considerable space to an announcement of the recrudescence in this city of the ill-famed American Protective Association, and prominent in the declaration of principles of the body was the resolution "to maintain a complete separation of Church and State by securing legislation to tax all church property." One cannot say whether the Public Ledger has been inspired to prepare the way for the reappearance of the bigoted A. P. A in the venerable city of Penn, but the occasion of Mgr. McDevitt's letter was an editorial which had appeared in its columns strongly favoring the policy proclaimed in this resolution.

On November 14 the Ledger stated editorially: "A year ago a real estate authority in Philadelphia made the computation that there was exempt from taxation in this city $227,632,284 of property. More than half of this sum represents property of the city, the State of Pennsylvania and of the United States, but a large part of the balance is property as to which only a strained construction of the law by the courts could justify exemption." Mgr. McDevitt accepts this statement as "a specific and definite charge that the religious, educational and charitable bodies of the city are receiving a favor which only a strained construction of the law can justify and which is, therefore, an injustice to the general body of Philadelphia taxpayers."

No doubt the ethical principal which justifies the exemption from public tax of the property of every organization whose sole purpose is to aid in the development of the common good does not appeal to those among us who clamor for the taxation of churches and private schools. Ordinarily such men are prone to profess scant respect for the work to which these are consecrated. But even from the grossest aspect of material selfishness there is no great difficulty in proving that no mistake is made in exempting churches and schools from the burden of civic taxes, and that so far from receiving a favor from the government these render so enormous a benefit, even in a material sense, to society that it would be a most unreasonable folly as well as an outrageous injustice to attempt to hamper their efforts by taxing their property and equipment.

Probably because of density of mind—or is it pure, unadulterated desire, prompted by bigotry, to thwart all religious activity?—the defenders of such taxation fail to note this, and it is this phase of the question, therefore, which Mgr. McDevitt urges with unanswerable logic. He does not deal with the whole broad question, but confines himself to one feature of it only, and, to demonstrate that the various religious, educational and charitable organizations of the city are not making other people bear their burdens, he takes the parochial schools of Philadelphia as an illustration, "because he is familiar with the conditions under which these schools are conducted."

Before publishing a statement meant, one may presume, to be a fair and just presentation of the tax question as it concerns the exempted properties of churches and schools "should there not have been in your editorial," Mgr. McDevitt asks the Ledger writer, "at least some reference to the immense sums of money which the exempted educational and charitable institutions save to the city annually?" And the reference which ought to have been made he thus pithily presents: "Every one recognizes that these institutions voluntarily take upon themselves a financial burden which otherwise the city, i. e., the taxpayers, would have to bear—a burden many times greater than the sum of money that could be collected were the property of the organizations made to pay the real estate tax. The favor, then, which your editorial sees in this exemption is a very doubtful one. The exemption, rather, is just and warranted."

The illustration which he brings from the parochial schools is an illuminating one. According to the editorial in the Ledger the assessed value of parochial and free school property in Philadelphia is $3,000,000. If taxed at the rate for real estate actually prevailing in that city there would be turned into the city treasury from this source the sum of $45,000. This, then, represents the "favor" extended to those citizens who, in self-sacrificing loyalty to an educational principle, support the eighty-four parochial schools of the Quaker City. And in return for the "favor" these men, whom the Ledger accuses of making other people bear their burdens, pay for the education of 60,000 pupils without a penny of cost to the city. Mgr. McDevitt emphasizes this point of his contention—the enormous financial return to the city from these self-supporting schools—by grimly suggesting the consternation of the Board of Education were the 60,000 children, who attend the parochial schools, next September to present themselves for admission to the public schools of the city to obtain that free education to which they are entitled by the very same right as are the 180,000 children now enrolled in these latter institutions.

Nor would their consternation be an unreasonable one. From a mere financial aspect, Mgr. McDevitt writes, were the city to undertake to care for these 60,000 children there would be entailed an immediate increase in the running expenses of the Board of Education of well-nigh $2,000,000 annually. To be sure this could happen only in the supposition that the parochial schools were to close their doors, in which contingency there would be an additional necessary expenditure of many other millions to secure property and to erect buildings to take the places of the eighty-four parochial schools no longer in existence. "Contrast this heavy outlay," the Superintendent of Philadelphia's Catholic schools suggests to the Ledger writer, "for current expenses and buildings, if the public schools were required to do the work which the parochial schools are now doing, with the paltry sum of $45,000 in taxes, exemption from which is secured, forsooth, only by a strained construction of the law."

And, he it remarked, this showing involves only elementary education. A precisely similar line of reasoning might be insisted upon in reference to the 1,350 pupils registered in the two Catholic high schools in Philadelphia, to care for whom, were these to demand, as they have the right to do, their secondary training in the city schools, a further heavy outlay would be imposed upon the city. Using the cost of some of the recently erected public schools as a standard, Mgr. McDevitt estimates that this would mean $500,000 for property and buildings, besides an annual expenditure of $135,000, the per capita expenditure for high school pupils being one hundred dollars.

Still another fact, true in Philadelphia as universally in the cities throughout the country, is not neglected by the Philadelphia prelate in his splendid letter. The general public does not always advert to it, but it is nevertheless the case that the distribution of the share of State taxes devoted to educational purposes is made among the various public school districts of the commonwealth on a pro rata basis according to the number of children of school age actually residing within the limits of each district, whether these children attend the public schools or not. The City of Philadelphia, therefore receives from the Treasurer of Pennsylvania the pro rata allowance for the 60,000 children attending the parochial schools although these cost the public school system not a single penny for their training. The amount realized by the city from this source at the last appropriation by the State reached the very respectable figure of $225,000.

It was not the purpose of Mgr. McDevitt, nor did his argument need the confirmation, "to refer to the immense sums of money which non-Catholic private educational institutions which are exempt from taxation save to the city by their work." Neither does he speak of the saving by charitable institutions, asylums and orphanages. His statement stands as an irrefutable answer to the claim of those whose bigotry—one can find no gentler term to describe their attitude—inspires them to charge such institutions with receiving "favours" and refusing to bear their own proper burdens.

Strange to say, the Ledger's editor is not convinced, although he is fair enough to concede that the statement is "an able defence" of the position assumed by the Monsignor. The Catholic Standard and Times of November 22 reprints the argument, advanced by the Ledger in rebuttal, in the editor's own words:

"It is, of course, true that an enormous burden would fall upon the city were it obliged to undertake the work now done by private charities, religious and secular, but it by no means follows that such a condition would arise should the existing exemptions be done away with. In the case of the parochial schools, for example, for which Father McDevitt speaks, there is not the slightest probability that were the city to impose a tax on their real estate they would abandon the position which they, for conscience's sake, have assumed."

We can only say with the Standard and Times: "A noble justification, truly! . . . Tax the voluntary schools; they already do much of the city's work. But make them do more, for they will bear the additional unjust burdens rather than close their doors."

Happily the brutal lack of fairmindedness manifested by the Ledger writer is not universal among us; and the generous men and women who, in loyal regard for principle dearer to them than life itself and for conscience's sake, give their self-sacrificing support to these institutions, Catholic and non-Catholic, will continue to trust in the justice of their fellows. The American Protective Association has passed resolutions before, but the saner sense of our countrymen has given little heed to their unworthy plottings.

M. J. O'CONNOR, S.J.

Origin of Medieval Gilds

Among the qualifications laid down by Pope Pius X as prerequisites for the study of social science, special stress is laid upon "a thorough knowledge of the history of ancient and modern civilization." Every age is replete with lessons for the student of social problems; but no epoch is of more exceptional interest and importance than the long period to which must be assigned the origin, growth and decline of the medieval gilds.

Modern sociologists are daily attaching greater significance to the study of these institutions which once were universally established throughout the Christian world. Catholic reformer and Protestant economist alike find here most fruitful suggestions for the renewal of society. What is best in modern developments of social thought and action had often been anticipated in a far more perfect way by the gilds of the Middle Ages. Even their very faults, to which we cannot be blind, will serve for warning or encouragement. An order of society, therefore, which in many respects has proved the most ideal the world has yet known, must certainly contain important lessons for all who would contribute their little mite of service to the social betterment of our own distressed and largely paganized civilization.

There is great divergence of opinion about the origin of the medieval gilds. Though apparently it matters little for the social student or reformer whether they were derived from ancient Rome or Greece, or sprang up from the soil itself of the respective European countries, the question is not without far-reaching consequence. Whatever their origin, it was the Church which impressed upon them, and upon the civilization in the midst of which they developed, those marvelous Christian characteristics which essentially distinguished them from every similar form of organization historians may find in Egypt, India or China, in Greece or Rome, and even among the barbarous tribes from which many of the great nations of modern Europe have sprung.

It is true that long before the medieval guilds came into being, the Roman officia opificum, or trade unions, had existed in the ancient cities of Gaul, Britain and other provinces under Roman dominion. This civilization, however, was soon to be swept away, and about such unions the history of the centuries that followed is silent. Little can now be learned of the conditions of the laboring classes during these submerged epochs of history. Yet the many analogies and even possible points of contact existing between the ancient and the medieval guilds have naturally given rise to a theory which would see in the medieval trade-unions the lineal descendants of the ancient labor organizations. In the same manner the merchant guilds of the Middle Ages, history tells us, are derived from the trading organizations of the Romans and the Syrians.

Especially interesting is the fact that in the East classical traditions continued unbroken at Constantinople, and it is not impossible that Roman guilds may there at least have survived until the very fall of the city, towards the end of the Middle Ages. Certain it is that such guilds are found both under the Byzantine Emperors and in the days of Moslem rule. Mohammed himself is said to have been a member of a merchant guild.

The Esnafs, as the guilds of Turkey and the various Mussulman tribes are called, were not improbably derived from such early institutions, and popular traditions made bold to trace them back to the days before the flood. Like the classical Christian guilds they acknowledged the need of religion, but showed a true Mohammedan singularity, and at times perversity, in the choice of patrons. Thus to Adam were dedicated the guilds of bakers and tailors, to Noah the shipwrights and carpenters. Cain was the patron of the grave-diggers, Abel of the herdsmen and Nimrod of the smiths, while Eve presided over the guild of washerwomen. (Garnett, Turkish Life in Town and Country.)

Westward the course of Empire takes its way. Along the same path, by a finely elaborated and seemingly plausible theory, certain writers have attempted to trace the progress of the guilds. What in fact could seem more simple than to map out this uninterrupted course of guild life through more than twenty centuries? Beginning with the days of the Roman King Numa, almost seven hundred years before the Christian era, we would thus trace it down to Augustus; from Augustus to Constantine; from the first Eastern Emperor to the last of the Byzantine monarchs. Finally from Constantinople we should see it spreading throughout the Orient, thence passing over into Lombardy, from Lombardy into Southern France, and from France into Germany and England!

That guilds of craftsmen have existed during almost all this period is sufficiently certain; but no historic evidence can be adduced to make the guilds of the Middle Ages essentially dependent upon those of other civilizations. Influences from Roman and Byzantine sources may undoubtedly have been brought to bear upon them, whether directly or indirectly. Yet such influences were not sufficient to account for a system which seemed almost to partake of the universality of the Catholic Church itself, and which differed vastly in its entire spirit from all other forms of guild life which had preceded it.

While the Roman trade-unions during the last centuries of the declining Empire were purely servile organizations, and the Eastern esnafs and the trade castes of India remained stagnant, the guilds which arose under the influence of the Catholic Church were a dynamic force. Nowhere perhaps was that freedom and spirit of brotherhood, which the Church has come to bring to mankind, better illustrated than in these guilds at the period of their most ideal development. In the Church alone has labor been truly honored and sanctified. Under her inspiration nobles and captains, princes and rulers have laid aside their robes of state and shining armor to don the poor patched habit of the monk. To the great religious orders the civilization of barbarous nations was due then as it is now. They drained the marshes and cultivated the arid land; they cleared the forests which were still the lurking places of wild beasts and more savage men; they tutored the fierce minds of the barbarian hordes, and with solemn chant and holy word raised up men's hearts to God. Beneath their labors the waste wilderness became fertile with the benediction of golden harvests and the desert bloomed into an Eden of beauty. Soon hamlet and town arose about the monastery wall, and God was glorified throughout the land. Amid such influences many of the guilds of the Middle Ages took their origin.

Of the theory, however, which would trace them back to the pagan sacrificial feasts of the nations among whom the early missionaries labored an outline must at least be given here.

The old Teutonic root of the word gild possessed two distinct meanings. It signified "to pay" and also "to sacrifice." The word, therefore, in its first meaning, might readily have been derived from the contributions, or "payments," which have always been an essential part of the guild statutes in every age. Geld in German still retains this root meaning, and is the exact equivalent of our modern English word "money" for the Anglo-Saxon "gild."

Writers, however, who insist mainly upon the sacrificial character of the first guilds naturally accept only the derivation which confirms their own theory. According to Brentano, one of the foremost champions of this view, gild meant originally the sacrificial meal made up of common contributions; then a social banquet in general; and lastly a society.

Christianity—to sum up this theory in brief—had not come to banish the cheer of life, but to hallow it. The old feasts were therefore still retained as paganism gradually disappeared. But Christ was worshipped and His saints were honored in place of the idolatrous homage which had once prevailed. The banquets formerly held in connection with superstitious sacrifices were now opened with Christian prayers. The virtues of the Gospel expelled the vices of the pagan orgies. The Church in fine retained, and elevated to a higher sphere, whatever elements of brotherhood and mutual helpfulness had already existed under the old worship of the false gods.

Such an argument may appear plausible. Yet here likewise there is no evidence which forces us to accept it. The banquets which were to become so striking a feature of the Christian gilds had already existed in the gilds of Rome and Greece. With a different spirit they reappeared in the love feasts of apostolic days. They were the natural expression of man's social nature, and like all other indifferent actions could be supernaturalized by religious motives. While instituted for manifold and specifically various purposes, the medieval gilds were social and religious in nature, and hence naturally delighted in conviviality, without forgetting the public as well as private duties of worship.

We gladly dispense ourselves, therefore, from entering into the evolutionary theories which deduce the gilds from the family. While admitting freely the possibility of many and various modifying influences, such as we have here described, it is sufficient to recur to the needs of human nature and the principles of Christianity as the chief sources from which sprang the medieval gilds.

Roosevelt as an Essayist*

Not long before "our leading citizen" departed for a lecturing and hunting tour in South America, he gave us a new volume of essays. To review adequately the eleven disquisitions which Mr. Roosevelt includes under "History as Literature," the title of the first, would involve too heavy a tax on the interest of the reader and too great a demand on the space of this paper. For a vast range and bewildering variety of questions and events are handled by the essayist with a confidence that is hardly in keeping with his own word of advice to historians: "Willingness to admit ignorance is a prime factor in developing wisdom out of knowledge." Such discourses, however, as that on "Citizenship in a Republic," delivered in Paris, before the doctors of the Sorbonne, contain wholesome truths, which though obvious to an American, were eminently apposite in the very un-republican Republic to which it was addressed. "Probably the best test," he told them, "of true love of liberty in any country is the way in which minorities are treated in that country. Not only should there be complete liberty in matters of religion and opinion, but complete liberty for each man to lead his life as he desires, provided only that in so doing he does not wrong his neighbor." That was good advice for the French bloc, and such passages abound whenever the author discusses questions on which his experience qualifies him to speak.

But, unhappily, he often writes with equal assurance and readiness about matters on which he is obviously incapable of passing a correct judgment. There are three misconceptions in particular that recur with such frequency that they seem to have obsessed Mr. Roosevelt's mind: the spiritual darkness and "bigoted ecclesiasticism" of the Middle Ages; "the theological tyranny and superstition" that continued to prevail—especially in Spain and its dominions, where the darkness became "Stygian,"—till the French Revolution partially dispelled them; and the Church's persistent repression of intellectual and spiritual freedom, of which its opposition to "the doctrine of evolution" is the most modern example.

Among the doctors who are charged with not "trying simply to live up to their spiritual impulses" are St. Thomas Aquinas, St. Bonaventure, Duns Scotus, St. Bernard, and not a few other giants of that wondrous age, who left an indelible impress on the thought of all future time, and were as remarkable for spiritual as intellectual sublimity. Mr. Roosevelt pronounces "all their writings" of less worth than the Catholic cathedral architecture of the period which was of "infinitely more permanent value"—infinite is a word he is fond of applying to the finite—of less influence upon general thought than the romances and folk-songs of the period, including the "Irish sagas"—which were not sagas and had originated centuries before—and of less influence on religious thought than "two books produced long afterwards, the 'Imitation of Christ' and 'Pilgrim's Progress.'" Those who have made themselves acquainted by actual study with the writings of the great schoolmen, and also with the other productions mentioned, will not accept this evaluation of relative importance; the teachers of teachers exert a deeper and more far-reaching influence than entertainers of the multitude. But the masterpieces of architecture, the hero songs of the people, the miracle-plays that originated modern drama, Dante's masterpiece of poetry, and à Kempis's masterpiece of piety, which came but a century after the "Summa," all belonged to the same great age and were the outcome of its spirit. It should, therefore, get the credit; nor should its universities be blamed any more than ours for not devoting themselves to the creation of song; nor, if it witnessed lawless indulgence, are we so free of "brutal passions and coarse appetites," after long centuries of opportunity, that we can afford to throw stones at the religious and intellectual system which in a few generations moulded from savage Goth and Hun and Frank and Lombard, hosts of heroes, saints and sages, and matchless masters of the beautiful in the whole range of creative art.

In whatsoever the Church then is charged with, "theological tyranny and superstition," and "the performance of a barren ceremonial," the same substantially must be charged against it now. Holding herself formally and authoritatively entrusted by Christ with the deposit of Divine truth and the fitting worship of the Creator, she continues now, as then, to preach that truth, and that law of conduct it imposes in religious and secular service, and the penalties attached to the violation of both, even though a certain class of mind should deem the one a tyranny and the other a superstition. If this was "the cringing and timid ignorance of the Dark Ages," the same is far more widely prevalent to-day; with this difference, that none but the rash and ignorant apply such terms to it now. Probably the same temperament that begat Mr. Roosevelt's dislike of the Middle Ages, impelled him to declare: "Better the terrible flame of the French Revolution than the worse than Stygian hopelessness of the tyranny—physical intellectual, and spiritual—which brooded over the Spain of that day." It happens that the "intellectual and spiritual tyranny" he has in mind—the exclusion and suppression of all assaults on Catholic truth—had then long ceased to be enforced, but it was vigorously enforced throughout the Spanish Peninsula in the period when "the figures of warriors, explorers, statesmen, poets, and painters illumined its annals." He may be excused for not knowing that Spain's philosophical and theological output has continued to this day virile, fruitful and independent, or that the Scientific Institute of Madrid is one of the most advanced and comprehensive in the world; but his characterization of the "feeble universities of the Spanish-speaking countries" should at least have been qualified by the reports of the United States Weather Bureau during his own administration, which informed him that the Jesuit Observatories in Havana and Manila, the pioneer forecasters of hurricanes were the most accurate, scientific and reliable in eastern and western waters.

A similar explanation must account for the strange irritation he displays in discussing Dr. Dwight's masterly "Thoughts of a Catholic Anatomist." Mr. Roosevelt is constantly taunting the author with what others of his creed had done or said, and reminding him that the Church "a century ago would not have permitted him to print his book if it had even contained the statement that the earth goes around the sun"; and the maltreatment of Galileo, Giordano Bruno and Roger Bacon for scientific heresy, is flung in his face. Dr. Dwight could have replied that Ampère and other stanchly Catholic scientists had defended the hypothesis of genetic evolution against Cuvier more than a century ago; that Bruno was not a scientist, nor punished for his scientific vagaries; that Roger Bacon had written the book referred to at the request of and on the lines suggested by the reigning Pontiff, and had not been imprisoned by the Church; that the troubles of Galileo and Bacon were occasioned not by their scientific views, but by imprudent language on matters outside of them, just as Presidents have punished very competent Ambassadors on similar grounds; that Copernicus had published his theory unreprieved fifty years before Galileo, and that the heliocentric hypothesis, as such, was never on the Index. This and much more he could have answered truly; but as his angry critic went on to say that the Church authorities refused Leonardo da Vinci permission to dissect dead bodies; that Copernicus was held to be a dangerous opponent of orthodoxy; that Bruno was one of the great names in science; that Mendel's work would have been condemned had not Darwin's distracted attention from it; that "the use of antitoxin would unquestionably have been considered a very dangerous heresy from all standpoints," etc.—Dr. Dwight would have given it up, as we do. Still we may cite the declaration of Professor de Morgan on the general point of his charges: "The Papal power must on the whole have been moderately used in matters of philosophy, if we may judge by the great stress laid on this one case of Galileo. It is the standing proof that an authority which has lasted a thousand years was all the time occupied in checking the progress of thought."

Mr. Roosevelt's wholesome views on citizenship and government we should like to see issued in separate form and reproduced in every civilized language. Outside of this field he exhibits many-sided qualities of mind, wide and varied, if not well-digested reading, and a ravenous appetite for knowledge. If he frequently fails to assimilate the mighty intellectual meal he has accumulated, it is because, as he says truly of another, "He is unwise to follow Brougham's example and make omniscience his foible."

An International Catholic Defence Organization

In every country it is part of the work of Catholic journalists to deal with attacks upon the Church in the public press. Sometimes this work takes the form of answering misrepresentations of Catholic teaching and practice. Another part of the work is the refutation of scandalous reports, which are either absolute fictions or wild exaggerations and misrepresentations of matters that are in themselves of little account.

With regard to statements as to alleged scandals in his own country the Catholic journalist has usually an easy means of getting at the facts, but there is often a serious difficulty in arriving at the truth when a story is hawked about from country to country, or circulated over half the world by one of the great press agencies. Even a well-informed writer on the Catholic side will not always know to what precise quarter to address his request for information. Time is of importance in dealing with a slanderous report, and the mere delay in seeking more reliable information as to the facts often results in the lie having got such a start that it is all but hopeless to catch up with it. The mischief is done, and the refutation or explanation come too late to be of effective use.

There have existed for some time in several countries Catholic Press agencies or Press Defence Committees formed to deal with current slanders against the Church and the priesthood. Some of these have done admirable work. The Belgian "Comité de Défense contre la Mauvaise Presse," formed more than four years ago, is a model organization of this kind, and its annual reports tell of important results secured by its action. Its correspondents all over Belgium forward to the central office marked copies of newspapers and reviews containing attacks upon the Church, the priesthood, the religious orders, etc., or allegations to their disadvantage. The Committee examines these, ascertains the facts, and then proceeds to deal with them in two ways. Many of them can be met by a simple communication on to the press, but there is a still more effective means of action provided by the Belgian law of libel, which supplies a very simple procedure in the case of slanders against individuals.

The Committee has at its disposal the gratuitous advice of Catholic lawyers, who are experts in press law, and where they consider that legal action can be taken a suit is begun in the courts. In Belgium the penalty for libel is the payment of a fine or of damages, and the publication at the cost of the libeller of the judgment of the court in his own newspaper and in a number of others to be selected by the aggrieved party. The court has further the power of sending the libeller to prison. The Defence Committee has conducted a number of successful suits for libel, with the result that the anti-Catholic press has become exceedingly careful in its statements.

The Belgian Defence Committee soon found that it was necessary to have correspondents abroad, in order to be able to deal with anti-Catholic statements reproduced in Belgium from the press of other countries. This was all the more necessary as, when the Belgian Liberal and Socialist press found that it was dangerous to circulate slanders against the Church in Belgium itself, it began to be all the more keen on obtaining damaging items from abroad. The Defence Committee then set to work to place itself in regular communication with similar agencies in other countries, and where they did not already exist suggested their formation. France had already a Comité de Défense in connection with the central press agency in Paris that collects news for several of the Catholic papers. Germany, which now possesses nearly 600 Catholic newspapers (including nearly 300 daily newspapers), has an organization that works chiefly through the Catholic press. It is known as the "Pax Association." It keeps a watch on the non-Catholic press, and issues every week, and sometimes more frequently, to the editors of the Catholic papers brief statements of fact or explanatory comments on current attacks, misrepresentations and slanders. These are sent out in such a form that they can be at once reprinted by the papers that receive them as articles or paragraphs.

The Belgian Defence Committee is now becoming the centre of an international defence organization. The idea on which it is based is simple and practical. The group which undertakes this work in each country will undertake to answer the enquiries of, and communicate information to, the secretaries of the groups in other countries. Centres of enquiry and correspondence have now been established in Belgium, Germany, France, England, Holland, Spain, Austria, Brazil and Chile. The Belgian Committee is the centre of the whole organization, which will soon be further extended.

The group that constitutes the centre for England is a sub-committee of the council of the Catholic Truth Society. Mr. James Britten, K.S.G., one of the founders and still the lay secretary of the society, has for many years specialized in the work of refuting anti-Catholic fictions and slanders and has been the means of exposing a number of such "stars" of the anti-Catholic platform as "escaped nuns" and "ex-priests." One of his colleagues in this special branch of Catholic defence is the secretary of the Press Sub-committee which now represents Great Britain in the international organization.

CORRESPONDENCE

Maura Ostracized

MADRID, November 15, 1913.

The solution of the last ministerial crisis in Spain brought about by the retirement of the Liberals and the resumption of the governmental reins by the Conservatives, is, at least in one aspect, a great triumph for the Republicans and the revolutionary elements in our country. When his Majesty called upon Señor Maura to form a new cabinet, he received this answer: "I shall accept the responsibility of your Majesty's mandate and return to the presidency of the Council, if it be permitted me to govern the country along the lines of the policy which the Conservative party sought to follow from 1907 to 1909. Solely on this condition will I charge myself with forming a new ministry. And I add: In default of this condition if there be a Conservative rash enough to accept the burden, let him undertake the charge, but be assured he will succeed only at the expense of his principles and with so sweeping a change in the policy of his party as will inevitably work its ruin."

What was Maura's policy during the period referred to? A single phrase is the answer: it was one of respect for and of strict carrying out of the laws of the land. During the last four years of Spain's government by a Liberal administration, whether Moret was its head or Canalejas or Count Romanones, the country has witnessed a total eclipse of authority and of law. The different liberal cabinets in power during these four years have had but one purpose—to satisfy the elements of the Left, the Republicans and Radicals and Socialists; the material peace our people have enjoyed has been won at the cost of concessions to the Left of every kind. As a matter of fact Spain in this period has been completely under the control of the Republicans, the enemies of the monarchy.

Maura could not conform to such a state of affairs. His conscience would not permit him, either as a Catholic, as a Monarchist, or as a good citizen and patriot, to accept from the hands of the Liberals the reins of a weak and destructive government, unless he saw himself in full authority to change the whole wretched policy prevailing and begin anew the work of national reform suspended at his overthrow in 1909.

They who affirm Maura to be a reactionary, a cruel man, and a leader who favors an inquisitorial policy in government vilely calumniate that statesman. Maura's sole ambition is to bring about the exact observance of the law of the land, to protect the principle of authority against the violence of the reckless mob in the streets, to maintain social order, to prevent the legitimate budget of the State from becoming the prey of grafting politicians, to make the interests of the nation independent of the scheming of personal ambition and of party plotting; in one word, Maura is determined not to allow the well-being of religion and of the monarchy to be sacrificed for the benefit of the few sectaries among us who seek the ruin of both, and if this be the policy of a reactionary Maura is proud of the name.

That principles such as these are hated by the partisans of disorder and of moral anarchy goes without saying. And, therefore, no one was surprised, during the gathering of the clouds which preceded the ministerial crisis, when Maura's name was everywhere proclaimed as that of the one leader able to save the situation, to hear the frantic outcries of Lerroux and of Pablo Iglesias, of Melchíades Alvarez and of the united Republican press of the country: "Not Maura; Maura never; rather riots and pillage in the streets, rather the revolution than Maura."

Unhappily the outbreak reached the throne of the King, and no doubt the fear of wild disorder impelled his Majesty to refuse the condition put by Maura as imperative before his acceptance of power. And since that day, October 27 of this year, the policy of the Conservative leader has been repudiated and been proscribed as dangerous to the welfare of Spain! Does the repudiation extend to the Conservative party as well? Such was the opinion of Señor Maura, but there was found a man in that body, Señor Dato, who seemed to have no such notion, and who, without worrying scruple, took over the presidency of the Council with its inheritance of the entire Liberal policy without a single condition.

And so the Conservatives among us are presenting a sad and deplorable spectacle of disloyalty to their party traditions. Maura sees himself abandoned by his followers; the saddle-bags of Sancho Panza have prevailed over the ideals of Don Quixote. Those same party men, his friends and coreligionists, who ten months ago, at the beginning of January in this year, almost went on their knees to Maura to plead with him not to abandon politics and not to resign his position as head of the Conservative body, now hurry from his presence and leave him alone while they eagerly enlist under the standard of Señor Dato and promise allegiance to the new Conservatism, which in no way professes the old rectitude of purpose proclaimed by their devoted leader. Is it to be true in Spain that to enjoy the privilege of power, conscience, faith, patriotism and uprightness must be abandoned? The answer to the question appears to be contained in certain remarks made during the crisis concerning Maura by Señor Gonzalez Besada, a member of Maura's cabinet and a distinguished personage in the Conservative party. "The trouble with Maura is his conscience; he brings into his politics a conscience of scrupulous delicacy. For him, in consequence, compromise is a practical impossibility. The meannesses of real life disgust his spirit of faith, and his faith will not allow him to excuse the realities he finds all about him in political life. I declare that never in all my dealings with him, even in serious situations, have I found Maura to indulge a disposition to avoid a difficulty by the use of a bit of cunning."

I have explained above the true significance of this "scrupulous delicacy of conscience" affirmed of Maura, and of the "meannesses of real life" concerning which Besada speaks, and there is no need of further comment. The fact is, and it is a bitterly lamentable fact, that Señor Maura has been abandoned, and his ostracism by his own involves the loss to Spain of our one hope. Maura, unhappily for our country, is the one man who, because of his nobility of character, his uprightness, his lofty ideals, his patriotism and fine spirit could have curbed the revolution and have saved his country from the fearful consequences the policy of the past four years has made inevitable.

And to-day the cry throughout all Spain is: "What will Maura do, now that he has been deserted by his former friends and followers? Will he rise to the ideals of a true Catholic leader and assume the direction of all the sane and independent forces of the kingdom? Will he decide to unfurl a new banner and to form a great, strong Catholic party capable of arresting the developments now threatening and to crush the revolutionary spirit abroad in the land?" No one may question Maura's reputation in Spain—he holds, as does no one else, the sympathy, the admiration and the honorable esteem of the best among us. In financial circles, in the army, among the clergy, with the aristocracy, in every class of our people Maura's name is respected. Were he to issue a call to those who love him, proclaiming his purpose to wage a national campaign under a banner bearing the inscription, "Religion, Country and Social Order," no one may doubt that he would speedily enlist a vast and an enthusiastic following, made up of men who would not betray him as he has been just betrayed.

What will Maura do? It is not possible to say now. Many, very many among us cherish high hopes. But the reserve and silence which, as I write, mark our leader's conduct do not allow us to say aught more.

NORBERTO TORCAL.

Catholic Press Activities in Holland

"I trust to God in the day of judgment I shall not be reproached with having failed to warn you, in season and out of season, against the paramount danger of our times, the evil press." These grave and weighty words, rendered doubly impressive by the place and the occasion, were uttered last August by a Dutch bishop from the ambo in front of the Grotto of Our Lady of Lourdes. His audience mainly consisted of some fifteen hundred devout pilgrims, mostly of the well-to-do class, who made up the twenty-fifth annual Pilgrimage from Holland to the world-famed Pyrenean Shrine.

Holland and her great neighbor to the East, though both with an overwhelmingly Protestant population, have within the last two decades attracted widespread attention by their singular achievements in the field of Catholic journalism. The 1913 Year-book of the first named country, under the heading, "The Catholic Press," enumerates seventeen Catholic dailies, twenty-nine bi-weekly papers, sixty-nine weeklies and fifty-four monthly magazines of a diversified character. With the exception of three or four that enjoy a wider circulation, the Catholic dailies of Holland are mostly local or provincial papers, being issued from the larger centers of population and covering the country districts contiguous to each. Thus Haarlem, Leiden, The Hague, etc., each has its own Catholic daily. Amsterdam may boast of as many as three, with De Tyd, the oldest Catholic organ in the country, conspicuously in the lead. Rotterdam is represented by two Catholic dailies, one of which, De Maasbode, of recent years, has forged ahead so as to rank at present as the leading "Catholic journal of the Netherlands, with morning and evening editions." All of these dailies may be classed as live newspapers, each giving regularly the associated telegraphic news, more or less extensive market reports and, apart from the Catholic tone pervading their editorial and news columns, being similar in all respects to other papers.

The weeklies likewise deserve to be ranked as newspapers. So far from their being edited on the assumption that their readers get the news from the secular press of every shade, every one of these papers weekly contains a chronicle of foreign and domestic happenings amply sufficient to satisfy on this point the demand of their readers, especially those of the farming and laboring class. Both dailies and weeklies are generally well supported; one weekly is reported as having 30,000 subscribers. An excellent spirit in this respect seems to prevail among the Dutch Catholics, who generally look upon the duty of supporting their press in the light of an Eleventh Commandment, while patronizing the secular press to the exclusion of their own is regarded by them as a mark of religious torpidity akin to apostasy. Very rarely if ever is a Catholic paper heard of as having to suspend publication for lack of financial support. On the contrary, new papers are being started from time to time, the latest addition to the ranks of the dailies being Ons Noorden (Our North), which within the last three months has appeared as the Catholic organ for the Provinces of Groningen and Friesland. This makes a grand total of eighteen Catholic dailies in a national constituency slightly exceeding in numbers the aggregate Catholic population of, say, Greater New York!

In the face of this ideal showing, the bishop's remarks, quoted at the outset, nevertheless would seem to hint at something more to be desired on this score.

There is a vast difference between a local or provincial daily, with its restricted space and limited resources, and the great metropolitan press, with its commercial ramifications and news agencies extending to every quarter of the globe. This latter division of the public press in Holland, as in most European countries, is almost exclusively controlled by the liberal and radical element, and therefore of a decided anti-clerical bent in general and bitterly hostile to Catholicism in particular. Nevertheless on the plea of the completeness of their news columns, these papers were still largely patronized by Catholics of the professional and business classes. In order to remedy this unsatisfactory condition, De Maasbode of Rotterdam, with great pluck and enterprise considering its relatively small resources, some five years ago greatly enlarged its size, put its commercial and financial departments up to the highest level and began publishing both morning and evening editions. In its present make-up the paper is the peer of any secular sheet in the country and contains such ample daily news, both foreign and domestic, as any banker, broker or wholesale merchant might require. But it takes time to dislodge an enemy once he has obtained admission to the premises on the pretence of his liberal theories. Such is especially the case in the two southernmost Provinces of Holland, where Catholics largely predominate and therefore had exceptionally benefited by the political reforms introduced under the early Liberal administrations of the fifties. The bitterly-fought electoral campaign of last summer, however, has aroused anew the fighting spirit of the great Rotterdam daily. So vicious and vituperative had been the daily attacks on Church, clergy and religious, that the paper in dead earnest set itself to the task of gradually displacing those virulent commercial sheets wherever they are found circulating among Catholics. With the unanimous approval of the Episcopate, committees, composed of the leading clergy, professional and business men, have since been formed in all the great centres, particularly of Holland proper, North Brabant and Limburg, for the purpose of carrying on an active propaganda to extend the circulation of De Maasbode in professional and business circles. Evidently the bishop aforementioned had this in mind while addressing some of his wealthier countrymen at the Grotto of Lourdes. Cardinal Van Rossum, while visiting Holland last summer, also warmly espoused De Maasbode's cause, and publicly commended the paper for its courageous stand and high purpose. Encouragement is further being received from the very class whom the movement chiefly concerns. One leading merchant with foreign business connections writes to the paper that Catholic business people henceforth have no excuse whatsoever in patronizing the secular press, since De Maasbode contains all the daily news any business man in any branch of trade at home or abroad may be looking for. Apart from this movement, the paper has recently opened a public subscription for the purpose of sustaining, financially as well as morally, its active and persistent fight against the judeo-masonic press. Upwards of 10,000 gulden have so far been subscribed by sympathizers of every rank and condition. No better proof could be had of the Catholic public's endorsement of the paper's stand in the pursuit of which its editors and managers seem to be straining every nerve. And the signs all point to their energy and grit not being wasted. It should be remembered that Holland geographically is a rather small-sized country and that its Catholic population barely exceeds two million souls. While there seems to be ample scope for all of its local papers and every indication of their being successfully supported, the area of the country and the circle of the reading public are necessarily too limited to maintain more than one Catholic commercial daily up to the high standard of modern requirements. Consolidation has been in the air for some time past, and though nothing definite has transpired so far, eventually, it is believed, the two leading papers, De Tyd of Amsterdam and De Maasbode of Rotterdam will be merged into one superior Catholic journal wherewith effectively to offset the many advantages that large capital and political pull afford the great secular press.

In connection herewith what greatly perplexes intelligent Catholics in Holland is that so far not a single English Catholic daily has made its appearance in the great United States. The gist of their argument seems fairly well reflected by Kipling's familiar lines: "We have got the ships; we have got the men; we have got the money, too!" As they view it, all we lack is the spirit that prompts Catholics individually to subscribe the necessary capital and editors and managers to be content with a "living wage," and all for the success of a cause that should be dear to us beyond all else. This alone, they claim, holds the secret of their remarkable achievements of late years in the journalistic field.

The Catholic Church in Bosnia

Recently much has been written about the Balkan States, but there is one Balkan land that has been practically forgotten. It is Bosnia! There, too, a war is being waged, not a war of blood, but a war that is direful and full of significance—the Catholic Church in Bosnia is warring against Schism and Mohammedanism. Just now this struggle has become especially acute between the Catholics and Schismatics, or, as they prefer to be called, the Servians. The activities and forces of the Schismatics are chiefly directed towards obtaining a political union with Servia, which would mean absolute persecution for Catholicism, if we are to judge from Servia's former attitude towards Catholicity, which has been that of complete and unflinching intolerance.

Bosnia in the year 1463, fell into the hands of the Turks. King Stefan Tomasevic had for years been harassed by interior rebellions among his princes, many of whom had fallen away from the Faith. So now with the change to Turkish rule, thousands of the people, following their princes and nobles, yielded to the yoke of Islam in order to preserve their lands and estates. The churches, as in all religious persecutions, were the first objects of the invaders' ravages and plunders. Many were burned, after being despoiled of their treasures and religious ex-votos; others were unceremoniously converted into Turkish mosques. The monasteries of the Franciscans, who for years had been the religious teachers of the country, were looted, and these hallowed walls, resonant of the days of glory under the patronage of the kings, were now battered down and crumbled into dust. The learning, the piety and the sacred memories of consecrated and great lives were buried and forgotten in the ruins.

Amidst all this the sons of St. Francis showed themselves "men of God." During these times of pressure and hardship and want, which were the inevitable outcome and results of war, these holy monks went about caring for the sick and the dying, caring for their persecutors as well as for their own people. To them do the Bosnians owe their faith of to-day. Dressed in the flowing Turkish robe and turban they went from village to village, celebrating Mass, administering the Sacraments and consoling the desolate people. They trained the youth, and in order to secure a new supply of native clergy, sent these young men to Italy, to Croatia or Hungary for their seminary training. The people had abandoned their homes and fled to the frontier countries, where they could breathe the pure air of freedom and, unmolested, worship their God.

Thus it was that the country became a desolate waste. Bosnia, but a short time before a country of smiling meadows and well-fed cattle, a land where the country folk sang as they worked and praised God as they lived, now was a barren stretch of untilled fields, with houses and farms vacant and dreary. The Turks saw this and tried a remedy by bringing in from Servia the Schismatics. But this was merely "adding insult to injury" as regards the Catholic Church, which gradually weakened and nearly died.

In 1878, the year of the occupation by Austria-Hungary, a new era dawned for Bosnia. In 1879, out of a population of 1,158,160 there were only 209,400 Catholics, but the occupation broke the Slavic fetters and the Catholic Church began a new existence. The ecclesiastical hierarchy was established. Dr. Joseph Stadler, Professor of Theology in Agram, was appointed Archbishop of Sarajevo, assisted by two native Franciscan bishops in Banjaluka and Mostar. The Society of Jesus was called in to establish seminaries for the secular priests. In Travnik the Jesuits founded a preparatory seminary with about one hundred students, and a gymnasium, or college, with three hundred students on the roll; later in Sarajevo, a theological seminary was established with twenty seminarians.

The population of Bosnia to-day is somewhat more than 1,800,000; of these 782,800 are Schismatics, 602,200 Mohammedans, 423,000 Catholics. These 423,000 Catholics are divided into 173 parishes, of which 98 are under the direction of the Franciscans, the others looked after by secular priests. There are 372 priests in Bosnia, of whom 106 are secular priests. There are 560 Sisters of different orders and Congregations: St. Vincent Sisters of Mercy, 127; Sisters of the Precious Blood, 137; Daughters of the Divine Love, 140; Servants of the Holy Infant Jesus, founded by Archbishop Stadler, 120, etc. Despite the fact that the education of the clergy is well provided for, yet there is a great want of facilities for the education of the Catholic layman, which should and does necessarily mean that one potent factor for the advance of the Bosnian people is lacking. However, the reason for this can readily be understood when we realize that eighty per cent. of the population is illiterate. In the entire Bosnian land, for a population of more than 1,800,000, there are but 417 elementary State schools.

In 1910 Bosnia obtained "Home Rule," or a Parliament of its own. The Emperor has eliminated religious quarrels, as much as he could, by making the number of members proportionate to the strength of the religious denominations, which means that out of the seventy members directly elected but sixteen are Catholics. While of the twenty appointed but five are of the Faith. What is the result? Violent and virulent persecution of Catholics. Catholic laymen are needed as leaders; Catholic laymen educated as to the questions and political status of the day; Catholic laymen who can by brains and goodness meet the opposing party; who can meet books with books, pamphlets with pamphlets, sophisms with truth; free thought and heterodox doctrines with pure Catholic principles and orthodoxy. Those of the opposition have the numbers, they have the official positions, they have the schools, such as they are; they have everything but right. Hence it is that Bosnia is struggling for its religious existence; it is waging a war against great odds; it needs assistance and encouragement from its more successful and resourceful brethren. "Quality for Catholics" is the watchword in Bosnia, and though young in the struggle, its maturity will certainly bring success and religious freedom.

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW.

A School Lesson

The New York Herald of November 22 presented the following item to the readers of its news columns:

"Because they say that they believe there is no God, a large number of boys in the four upper classes of Public School No. 72, in East New York, at New Lots road and Schenck avenue, recently developed the habit of maintaining silence during the singing of hymns containing reference to faith in a Deity. Some of the girls in the two upper classes also began to remain silent during the singing. The decrease in volume became so noticeable that the teacher in charge of the singing took action to induce the children to sing, and failing in this she referred the matter to the school principal."

The principal promptly shifted the burden to the district superintendent, and this latter, after questioning the graduating class of boys and the same class of girls, told their members that "if joining in the songs was against their beliefs it was not necessary for them to do so." Since that time, the Herald gravely adds, a large part of the school singing has been stopped.

Evidently the Herald's enterprising newsgatherer followed the trail thus opened, since the further information is vouchsafed that "several of the boys come from homes where the atmosphere is atheistic or agnostic, while a great many of the parents of boys who have taken this stand have orthodox religious views. The great majority of the children in the school are Jewish." The orthodoxy of the parents, however, has not descended to all of their children. "We have been taught a lot of things in science about the growth and origin of things which don't agree with the things in the Bible, and we take the science," was the manner in which one lad expressed his reason for not joining in the singing of the hymns. How wise old heads that have grown weary revolving the perplexities in just that thought must envy the easily achieved assurance of that lad!

We might use the foregoing as a peg on which to hang several rather serious deductions. If the Herald's story is accurate, and one has no reason to question it, what is one to say regarding the absolute freedom from religious bias so frequently insisted upon as characteristic of public school training? What must one think of the orthodox parent that permits his untrained child to be educated in an atmosphere in which he is "taught a lot of things about the growth and origin of things which don't agree with the things in the Bible"? What shall one say of the confusion and disorder and lack of discipline inevitably resulting in a school-room where such incidents as the Herald describes are possible? Since the district superintendent had no alternative in his decision, they are quite possible, be it added, in every class-room in every public school, although we have known cases in which a like speedy spirit of justice according to law was not exhibited. And if they are possible, what shall one think of the habit of training young people, of discipline and obedience and subordination to authority so supremely needed in the fashioning of children? What shall one say—but why pursue the theme? Is it any wonder that Christian parents in a Christian land are beginning to awaken to the need of something more in the education of their little ones than there is afforded in the non-religious program of the public school?

Have Women Souls?

Frequently reference is made in the radical literature of our day to a supposed discussion held at the Council of Macon to decide whether or not women have souls. The story is taken from the Socialist text-book upon sexual matters, Bebel's "Woman under Socialism." The book, though it has passed through more than thirty editions, and has been translated into nearly every language spoken by Socialists, is as unscientific as it is slanderous, blasphemous and immoral. Its frank paganism and free love doctrines, however, have rendered it popular, while its vile misrepresentations of Christianity and of the Church are thought to contribute to the modern emancipation of womankind.

After striving to prove by disconnected and misunderstood quotations that Christ, Saint Paul and the Fathers of the Church were hostile to woman and marriage, he comes to the Council of Macon, "which" to quote De Leon's translation "in the sixteenth (sic) century, discussed the question whether woman had a soul, and which decided with a majority of but one vote, that she had." (p. 52.)

With his wonted carelessness for truth or precision, provided a slander can serve his purpose, no reference to the source of his statement is given. We must accept it upon his assumed veracity and the infallible correctness of his interpretation. In the official records of the Council no such discussion is noted. The story, as Father W. McMahon, S.J., shows in his "Bebel's Libel on Woman," is founded upon an ignorant or malicious distortion of a perfectly clear passage in the "Historia Francorum" of Gregory of Tours (VIII, 20): "In this Council," writes Gregory, "there was one of the bishops who declared that a woman could not be called homo (man). But when the other bishops had reasoned with him, he held his peace, for they showed him that the text of the Old Testament laid down that in the beginning when God created man it was said 'male and female He created them, and He called their name Adam,' which means man of the earth, thus applying the same term to woman and man alike, for He designated each of them equally homo."

The question, therefore, whether women have souls was never mentioned in the Council. The discussion consisted merely of an objection made by a single bishop regarding the propriety of using the term "man" when technically referring to woman, and finally there was no vote taken, but merely an explanation offered, which was at once accepted as satisfactory.

It is with falsehoods like the present, and with apparently learned but misinterpreted quotations and clever sophisms, that the faith of Catholics is attacked on every hand by the Socialist method of propaganda. Naturally the average workingman cannot be prepared to give an answer to such countless calumnies against his Church, nor can he distinguish between reliable and unreliable authorities, between misapplied and correct quotations. Every means is used, moreover, to estrange him from his divinely appointed teachers, and to inspire him with distrust and even hatred of the priesthood. He has refused to heed the warnings of the Church, he has knowingly exposed himself to danger, and his loss of faith is almost an inevitable result.

Bebel's volume, which reflects the very lowest stage of sexual degeneracy, is advertised in every Socialist paper, and has even been sold directly by the "Christian Socialist." It is freely recommended as a vade mecum for every Socialist girl and woman. Its apparent apparatus of vast learning, without any of the reality, renders it sufficiently formidable. Bebel undoubtedly recognized the untenableness of many of his statements, bolstered up, as they are, by an array of credulously accepted or misinterpreted authorities; but the book was good propaganda matter and a slur upon Christianity and all religion. The Socialist party has everywhere sought to introduce it, while it has apotheosized its author. Yet Socialism is not concerned with religion! Religion is a private matter!

Thanksgiving Day in Washington

The annual Pan-American Thanksgiving Mass was celebrated at St. Patrick's church, Washington, on November 27, and was attended according to his promise by the President of the United States. The presence of the Nation's Chief Executive on that occasion was an answer to those who remonstrated with him for lending an official coloring to a Catholic service. At the same time it was a rebuke to those churchmen, patriotic societies and guardians of liberty who are forever raising the religious issue and thrusting themselves forward as official censors of the President in whatever relations he may have, whether public or private, with Catholics or the Catholic Church.

The "Century's" Moral Obfuscation

One of our subscribers wrote to the publishers of the Century Magazine to complain of a story entitled "Home," in its November issue. An answer was immediately received, which we reproduce in part. It runs as follows:

"We assure you that the publishers of the Century Magazine had not the slightest intention in the world of calumniating or offending Catholicism or Catholics. Indeed, several of the members of our own editorial family are Catholics, whose sensibilities are as carefully considered and whose opinions are as useful and as often required as any of the others. . . . Everybody knows the eternally righteous discipline of the Mother Church regarding the sacrament of matrimony. Everybody knows, too, the pathetic human frailties and inadequacies that so often hinder the real achievement of that ideal, especially in wild, newly-settled countries. And every Catholic knows that, if forced to choose between the salvation of a human soul and the perpetuation, whether or no, of a specific marriage contract, the Mother Church saves the soul! And that for the very reason that, obviously, humanity's ideals are in some cases too real to be realized.

"The deeply human, earnestly sympathetic reader of 'Home' cannot, we think, fail to see that the author's attitude is as perfectly respectful, reverential indeed, as his depiction is graphic.

"Truly yours,

"THE CENTURY CO."

This letter aggravates the original offense, for although the story of "Home" was bad enough, the editor's own idea of the methods adopted by "Mother Church" to save souls is appalling and atrocious. Evidently he and "the Catholic members of the editorial family, whose sensibilities are as carefully considered, and whose opinions are as useful and as often required as any of the others," need immediate instruction in the fundamentals of ethics.

This anonymous novel "Home" presents us with a priest in the confessional who counsels a seducer to marry the girl he had led astray. When the penitent, who, by the way, is a Protestant—but that is only one of the absurdities of this passage—protests that he cannot do so because he is already married, the priest assures him that he need not worry; it will be a secret "locked in the confessional." As this virtuous heretic objects that he would be thus acting a lie, the priest informs him that "lies are feathers" compared with the peace of mind afforded the girl who, from a life of sin, will be thus lifted into paths of virtue, at least in her own opinion; though he added, such lapses in chastity do not really result in a loss of innocence.

This is what the editors of the Century and "the Catholic members of the editorial family" consider the way in which "Mother Church" saves souls. They ought to be thoroughly ashamed of themselves. Two weeks ago we had sent them a marked copy of AMERICA for November 15, in which this offensive novel was discussed, but very probably it never reached the editorial desk.

"Teacher-Mothers"

The controversy over "teacher-mothers" that has been going on in New York seems to be chiefly characterized by weakness of argument and indelicacy of expression. But common sense suggests that if a schoolma'am would marry, she should choose a husband who can support her, and before the wedding day she should be required, of course, to resign her position. If a woman is allowed to continue teaching after her marriage one of several grave evils is likely to ensue. Either she will shirk, and as a rule, not without sin, the prime duty of the married; and if not, she will have to be absent from school for long periods; if these periods are unduly shortened, both the school children confided to her care and her own children at home are sure to suffer. No properly conducted school board can be granting the same teacher such leaves of absence, nor is the classroom the place for expectant mothers. What one of the speakers at the recent Cooper Union meeting of protest said about the inefficiency of unmarried teachers is arrant nonsense. All but a very small percentage of the most capable schoolma'ams in the land are spinsters, and the highly successful educational work that the Catholic Church carries on throughout the world is achieved by men and women who have holily renounced marriage that they may "attend upon the Lord," as St. Paul advises, "without impediment," and be free to think "on the things of the Lord." But are there any of His "things" of more importance nowadays than that children should have capable and devoted teachers?

Bible Sunday, or Tuberculosis Sunday, or Second Sunday in Advent—Which?

The Anti-Tuberculosis Society, it is said, has asked ministers of the many denominations, the school boards, the labor organizations, the Governors of States, and even the President himself, to devote Sunday, December 7, to tuberculosis. A Canadian minister objects, on the ground that this date has already been taken for "Bible Sunday." Naturally the question arises: Who took it? We may go further and ask what authority have school boards, labor organizations, governors, or the President to determine how any Sunday is to be observed? Ministers, it seems, are free to use their pulpits how they please on every Sunday. If they choose to interrupt their talks on politics, literature, social reform, municipal government, and such like subjects, to talk on tuberculosis, or the Bible, they may do so, having only their employers, the church committee, to reckon with. There is only one authority charged with settling the character of the worship for each Sunday in the year, and this tells us, as it has done for centuries, that Sunday, December 7, is the Second Sunday in Advent. The Church of England, at the Reformation, made it a sort of Bible Sunday; but the Catholic Church, even in the twentieth century, is still too busy in preparing for the due celebration of Our Lord's birth to turn aside to anything else, notwithstanding the claims of tuberculosis. As for the Bible, the Catholic Church does its duty by defending it against its modern enemies, not the least of whom are the ministers themselves.

Vandervelde, the Socialist leader in Belgium, who never hesitates at blackening his country's reputation provided he can strike a blow at the Church, announced the other day in Parliament that, in spite of the fact that Belgium was Catholic, she had the worst record of criminality of any nation in Europe. France had 170 delinquents for every 1,000 inhabitants, Italy 228, England 237, Holland 231, whereas Belgium was at the top of the list with 340.

The Minister of Justice, Carton de Wiart, was on his feet in an instant and asked the traducer if the figure 340 meant accusations or condemnations? There was no answer. Vandervelde was nowhere to be seen. He had fled like a boy who had thrown a stone. As a matter of fact, the figures only go to show the activity of the courts of Belgium in pursuing the slightest infractions of the law, such as those relating to hygiene, muzzling dogs, injuries to roads, etc. Moreover, every one in Belgium knows, and no one better than Vandervelde, that the worst place in the country is Charleroi, which gave him his start in political life. They know also that the centres of Socialism have the highest criminal average, and that the districts along the frontiers which are anti-clerical furnish most of the business for the criminal courts.

A new lecture tour has been arranged by the Central Verein for Mr. David Goldstein. It is to begin in Boston about the middle of January and, like the preceding tour, is to carry him across the entire country. We are told that 9,760 miles were covered during his preceding campaign, and over 10,000 copies of "Socialism: The Nation of Fatherless Children" were disposed of. The book plan for financing the lectures has again been adopted. Two hundred and fifty books, at fifty cents a copy, are purchased by the parties desiring to arrange for a lecture. The volumes are then sold at cost price or with a profit by the organization which engages the lecturer. "Our plan," says the prospectus just issued,

"enables organizations to have a lecture without financial outlay for railroad fare, hotel bills and a personal fee. Yet at the same time the propaganda against Socialism is strengthened by leaving the written word behind to supplement the spoken word of the lecturer." The following choice of subjects is offered: Socialism from an Economic Standpoint, Socialism and Religion, Socialism and the Family, Trade Unions, From Socialism to the Church, Why I Am a Catholic, Leo XIII and the Labor Problem. Application for dates is to be made to the Central Bureau of the Central Verein, Temple Building, St. Louis, Mo.

In an address delivered before the Columbia University School of Journalism, November 24, Melville E. Stone, General Manager of the Associated Press, reached the conclusion that Americans as a nation are "news-mad." Our papers are filled with accounts of executions, prizefights, divorce cases, "the antics of our friends at Newport," etc., which are merely episodes or tittle-tattle, and "in no sense contributions to the real history of the world." Therefore he would have much more space devoted to what is being done "in the field of science, ethics, politics and economics." It is imperative, he said, "that somebody, somehow, shall do some thinking."

"The newspaper has practically driven out of existence in this country the review; even the magazines are devoted, as a rule, to fiction of the most inconsequential character; even in the newspapers, in large measure, editorial opinion has disappeared. Where, then, shall you turn for a serious, thoughtful consideration of any public question? . . . What we need are newspapers having such vision that they are able to present a fair perspective of the really important things that are happening in the world, to whom, for instance, the chaotic condition in Mexico is of some more moment than a Nan Patterson case here."

Well said! Perhaps the young journalists who listened to Mr. Stone will be the men to make our newspapers more like his ideal. As conditions are now, in most of our journals, the local, the trivial and the scandalous occupy far too much space, while a really good editorial page is not at all common.

"Advanced" theological views regarding Our Divine Lord pervade some of the Christmas fiction that is being offered the public just now. A case in point is the opening story in Harper's Magazine for December, for "The Lost Boy" whose adventures the very imaginative Dr. Henry Van Dyke there describes is an Arianized Messiah. The Child Jesus is represented criticizing the law of Moses, which commands the sacrifice of the Paschal lamb; as realizing His high mission for the first time only when He questions the doctors in the Temple; as reflecting that "there must be something in the world that He did not understand"; as seeking for "one to give a light" to his path; as saying "I do not understand what he [the Prophet Daniel] says about the times and a half-time and the days and the seasons before the coming of the Messiah," etc., etc. This, of course, is the Christ that such writers as Edersheim and Farrar have made their admirers familiar with, but it is not the Christ of those old-fashioned Protestants who believe unequivocally that Blessed Mary's Son was divine, nor the Christ of the innumerable Catholics throughout the world who listen standing to St. John's Gospel when it is read at the end of Mass. The Word made Flesh, needless to say, never ceased for an instant to be conscious that He was the omniscient God. But with Harper's Monthly and Dr. Van Dyke this doctrine has long been obsolete.

We pointed out to captious critics lately a very easy way for Sœur Thérèse to get miraculous banknotes for her clients. We learn now from letters to English periodicals, that Mgr. de Teil, promoter of her cause, holds that she probably used it. In February, 1912, he mentioned, during a conference on the subject, that the notes given to the convent of Gallipoli had been issued by the Bank of Naples. He himself presented them to the bank, asking that their genuineness be investigated. The cashier reported them genuine, and offered to pay them in gold. Mgr. de Teil remarked that many notes of the Bank of Naples must have been buried in the ruins of Messina caused by the great earthquake, and suggested that those given to the Carmelites of Gallipoli came from that source.

LITERATURE

Lollardy and the Reformation in England, by Dr. JAMES GAIRDNER, C.B. Vol. IV, edited by WILLIAM HUNT, M.A., D. Litt. New York: The Macmillan Company. $3 net.

Dr. Gairdner had hoped to carry the last work of a long life down to 1570, which he assumed to be the date of the consummating of England's breach with Rome. But death intervened; and this fourth volume, edited at his request from his manuscripts by Dr. Hunt, leaves it unfinished, stopping with Queen Mary's marriage in 1554. We might be sorry for his sake that he did not live to complete his task; for there are signs to indicate that, had he done so, he would have written its last lines a member of the Catholic Church. But such matters belong to God's loving providence. Of this, however, we may be sure, that in the learned author's account of his long stewardship, his zeal for the truth, too unacceptable to his fellow-countrymen, which marks this volume, was not left unreckoned.

That this volume displeases the English taste, its reviewer in the London Times shows clearly. Dr. Gairdner held, for many years, such a place in public esteem that the reviewer could not dismiss him lightly. He therefore gives his readers to understand that the historian long honored for impartiality, became at last a partisan. He does not disguise his satisfaction that Dr. Gairdner left his work incomplete, accusing him of writing history, like Fox and Froude, according to his prejudices, rather than in conformity with objective facts. He proves this by saying that Dr. Gairdner introduces his comments into his documents, though he acknowledges that, unlike Froude, he does not include them within his quotation marks, that is to say, he does not falsify his documents. The fact is, that one has but to run through the volume to see that the comments are distinguishable from the documents at a glance. Indeed, the cases instanced by the Times reviewer—who must be presumed to have chosen among the worst—are quite sufficient to show it. He brings as an example of prejudice leading to error, Dr. Gairdner's identification of the "godly Thomas Mountain" with the parson of St. Michael's Church in the Tower Royal, otherwise known as Whittington's College, who, according to Stow, broke into Whittington's tomb during the reign of Edward VI in search of filthy lucre; denying the identification on the ground that Whittington's College was despoiled and sold for £92 in 1548, the year after Edward's accession, while Mountain was not appointed till December 29, 1550. But the official despoiling was one thing, and the parson's private plundering, another. The former was concerned with plate, vestments, endowments and residence for the master, fellows, clerks, chorists, etc., even the endowments of the almshouse, which Stow tells us were maintained by the Mercers; but it hardly went so far as to break into the tomb of the famous Lord Mayor of London. If Mountain were not the one guilty of this, there must have been another parson who played the game for his own hand and then made way for him. But Mountain's predecessor was Dr. Richard Smith, Regius Professor of Divinity at Oxford, who, though on Edward's ascension in 1547 he declared against the Pope, did not, therefore satisfy the new régime as to his thoroughgoing Protestantism. He was consequently deprived of his professorship which was given to Peter Martyr, and his reputation as a Catholic still growing, he escaped into exile in 1549, to take up his abode at Louvain; where he retracted his error about the Pope and devoted himself to the defence of the Catholic cause, as Dr. Gairdner notes in Vol. III. Apart from the fact that as a Catholic, he would not violate his church, we may say that one out of favor with the Government would not take the risk of doing so. Hence Mountain was the man who after the official spoliation came in to glean the aftermath. Had Dr. Gairdner been a writer of no repute, the Times reviewer would hardly have been justified in accusing him before having looked up the fact. As he was an historian intimately acquainted with the Tudor period, to assume that he was ignorant of the career of one so well known in it as Dr. Richard Smith is preposterous.

Again the Times reviewer complains that Gairdner "could not appreciate the point of view of those he calls 'heretics,' and speaks of the Act of October, 1553 which restored the Catholic religion and prohibited every other, as a 'Catholic Emancipation Act,' and repeatedly refers to the state of things it established as 'a truce.'" The answer to this is obvious. Gairdner could appreciate the heretics' position quite well, as his book proves. He could also appreciate its value, and the value of the claims made from it. Here we come down to fundamentals. Has heresy any rights against the truth? Is its profession a title to new rights, or does this entail the forfeiture of some of those rights the heretic enjoyed while he was orthodox? Have Acts of Parliament in favor of heresy any force other than coercive? To suppose that an historian is impartial, only when he is indifferent to such questions and treats truth and error alike, is one of the many errors of the modern historical school. Regard for the truth is the foundation of all impartiality. Dr. Gairdner has that regard. Hence he saw that the Act carried in November, 1553—not the "Act of October," which declared valid the marriage of Katherine of Aragon—could well be compared to the Catholic Emancipation Act, inasmuch as it fell far short of the rights of the Catholic Church. It did not "restore the Catholic religion" but the religion of the later years of Henry VIII, a very different thing. So too, if one reads the matter carefully, he will see that the relations of Catholics and Protestants during the first half of 1554 may be compared to "a truce." Notwithstanding the law, Protestant ministers managed to keep up in the churches their forbidden worship.

What our opinion of Dr. Gairdner's last volume is, can be gathered from the foregoing. It is not faultless; but it is distinctly more satisfactory than some of its predecessors. Some of its flaws would no doubt have been eliminated, had the author been able to revise his own work. Some things which hostile critics pretend are flaws, would have been explained; as, for instance, the passage on page 369 about Fox's sneer that the Papists usually trust to armed force, and its refutation by means of the example of Hadleigh. Here at first sight there is a contradiction; but those who proclaim it confidently pass over the words: "in which the people still believed," which give the key to the solution.

H. W.

The Catholic Student's "Aids" to the Bible. By HUGH POPE, O.P., S.T.M., New York: Benziger Brothers. $1.35.

The topics treated in the present volume are those contained in General Introduction to Sacred Scripture and in Special Introduction to the Books of the Old Testament. Chapters I-VI have to do with General Introduction,—the Bible, its make-up, inspiration, canon, interpretation; supernatural narrative portions; the text and various versions; data from contemporary profane documents; information about Hebrew time, feasts, fasts, priests, sacrifices, money, measures, etc., etc. Chapters VII-X have to do with Special Introduction to the Old Testament. Father Pope has given us a book which will be useful and reliable to the seminarian; a book which every priest should have and read. The pursuing of this handbook will make one familiar with those events and facts which are essential to the right understanding of the Old Testament. For instance, the literary table, marks in neat and striking manner the various Egyptian, Assyrian, Sumerian, Akkadian, Babylonian and Phœnician documents in juxtaposition to the Israelitic and inspired writings; the approximate dates of all are given, and the various documents stand out in bold clarendon type.

Inspiration is treated very clearly, so far as it goes; though it does not go very far. One might expect, in a book like this, that the nature of inspiration would be more extensively treated. The new form of verbal inspiration is neatly explained; but another theory of inspiration taught in many schools is not even mentioned. The extent of inspiration and its effects are most important topics that Father Pope omits. Inerrancy of Holy Writ in matters of history and of natural science is a question that will quite naturally occur to both seminarian and priest. In the table of English versions of the Bible, we desiderate that of Kenrick. Lastly, is it certain just why the Bull "Aeternus ille" is not in the "Bullarium Magnum?" Le Bachelet has made out a good case against Father Pope's assumption. The Bull was never promulgated; and that is why it is not in the Bullarium. It does not seem fair to say that the omission of the Bull is due to its suppression from the 1593 edition of the "Clementine Vulgate" and the substitution therefore of Bellarmine's "Preface." In these moot questions, wherein the author has almost all Jesuit exegetes against him, he writes as if there were no controversy at all. Perhaps some of his readers would be pleased had he mentioned the fact that there was another side; and referred to a few of the books now being published to defend that side.

WALTER DRUM, S.J.

Hagar. By MARY JOHNSON. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Co. $1.40.

To show the beginnings of the spirit of feminine unrest and independence Miss Johnson goes back into the early '80's in the South to picture its workings in some women in that part of the country. Though the book is not equal to her former novels, she succeeds in giving us a delightful portrait of a lovable, if somewhat rebellious, little girl in her school days. But you can see what she is coming to all along, and at a point about halfway through the story she has found her vocation as writer and worker for "the cause." Thus far we are brought and thus far the story is a good one, for it moves. Thus far and no further. After that it drops to mere talk, and reveals no further climax. However, if she has done nothing more, and if her picture of the movement be a true one, she has done us a real service, in unmasking the true inwardness of the revolt. What lies there is startling. It is more than "Feminism." Many other "isms" bear it company. There is the old clap-trap, about "world-service," and "humanity," and "the ultimate divine in my neighbor and myself." "Evolution" (with a big E); much "mystic"—i. e. vague,—visioning of "women for woman," precious little religion, but much that is opposed, and, alas! hardly any logic at all. Decidedly, Mary Johnson is not yet the Harriet Beecher Stowe of the Woman Movement. The author, by the bye, forgets to tell us if that French curé's "widow" was a Feminist too. J. W. P.

Jus Decretalium ad Usus Praelectionum in Scholis Textus Canonici sive Juris Decretalium. Auctore FRANCISCO X. WERNZ, S.J. Tomus VI. Jus Poenale Ecclesiae Catholicae. Prati: Giachetti, Fili et Soc.

The "Jus Decretalium" by Very Rev. Francis X. Wernz, S.J., is a complete treatise on ecclesiastical law and not merely, as the title perhaps might suggest, a commentary on the decretals. The title of "law of the decretals" has been chosen on account of the importance that has always been attached to the decretals in the schools of canon law from the time when they were first issued as a legal code by Gregory IX. The whole work includes six volumes entitled respectively: Introductio, Jus Constitutionis Ecclesiae Catholicae, Jus Administrationis, Jus Matrimoniale, Jus de Judiciis Ecclesiasticis, Jus Poenale. There have been already two editions of the first four volumes; the fifth volume has not yet been published, but it is promised for next year. The delay in the publication of the last two volumes has been due to the fact that, of late years, the author has been unable to revise the lithographed editions that he had employed while professor of Canon Law in the Gregorian University; indeed it was only through the cooperation of Rev. Father P. Vidal, S.J., who succeeded him as professor in the same university, that he has been able to give to the public the present volume.

The order followed by the author is logical as well as practical. The Jus Poenale, strictly, is that set of laws that deals with specific crimes and defines the punishments to be inflicted on the perpetrators of the same. Hence, a treatise on the Jus Poenale, directly, would call only for the consideration of those specific crimes and specific punishments referred to in the penal code. But such a treatise would fail to be scientific if it would not also deal with questions of a more generic character such as are, for instance, those bearing on the essential elements of a crime, or on the power of the church to inflict punishments that are temporal of their own nature. Accordingly, in the first part the author treats of ecclesiastical crimes in general, in the second he deals, also in a general way, with punishments and their various kinds, and in the third he considers severally the chief crimes for which ecclesiastical law has set apart punishments and explains what these respective punishments are.

No doubt this volume will meet with the same approval with which the preceding volumes were favored and will be welcome not only to students but to professors as well. In it the author discusses clearly and thoroughly all the principles connected with the study of the Jus Poenale and has always in view the changes that in the course of time the church has wisely introduced into the enforcement of her penal laws by either mitigating their rigor or by suppressing them altogether. Suffice here to mention the paragraphs on the application to the ecclesiastical forum of the well-known formulas: nullum crimen sine lege, nulla poena sine lege (n. 14 ff.) on the bearing on ecclesiastical law of the distinction between a crime and the attempt (conatum) to commit it (n. 31, ff.) on the correct idea of degradation as opposed to deposition (n. 120, 127), on the present discipline concerning such punishments as exile, fines and the like (n. 101-104). The work is rich in foot notes containing references to ancient and modern authors as well as to all the sources of the laws explained in the text. Perhaps it would be more advantageous to many readers if the quotations from the law were always followed by references to some leading collection where they are to be found; but with the date of the document, which the author gives, it will not be difficult to reach the text that one wishes to consult. The language and style, while not lacking in literary distinction, are as clear and simple as a text-book's should be. H. P.

At first glance one would say that an author with the name Lucy Fitch Perkins was hardly the person to write for children a sympathetic book about "The Irish Twins." (Houghton, Mifflin Co., $1.00.) But as this story is merely one of a series by her which includes "The Japanese Twins" and "The Dutch Twins" and which may go on, no doubt, till representative twins from every tribe and nation under the sun have been put into books, we must not be too exacting. The writer carries Larry and Eileen through all the adventures that could well befall the children of an Irish cottager some fifty years ago. As she has followed a competent guide, she uses Irish idioms intelligently, and has wisely avoided the brogue. When the schoolmaster gave Larry these verses to learn:

"I thank the Goodness and the Grace
That on my birth have smiled,
And made me in these Christian days,
A happy English child,"

Larry naturally "wondered why he was called an English child, when he knew he was Irish. And he wasn't so sure either about the Christian days." The book is fully illustrated by the author.

"Our Common Road" is the title that Agnes Edwards has given a hundred bright and sensible "Morning Talks" contributed originally to the Boston Herald. It is women readers that she has chiefly in mind. She tells them, for example, "What Really Counts": not wealth and position, but integrity and kindness; she tells them of the "Things That Do Not Matter," such as the little irritating trifles of daily life, whatever is none of our business, all that cannot be changed or prevented; she touches on "Euphemism," observing that, "The trouble with many euphemistically inclined persons is that they only use the art in regard to themselves. Thus, when they are dull they call it pensive, but when you are dull they call it sulky; and she suggests a drive in an open ox team as the best of preparations for a holiday of relaxation, since "We Americans must learn to slow down." (Houghton, Mifflin Co., $1.00).

Francis Jammes is a Frenchman, notwithstanding his curious name. He wrote a number of books mostly in a lighter vein as their names would indicate. They are, for instance, "Clara d'Ellébeuse," "Almaide d'Etremont," "Clairières dans le ciel; de l'Angelus de l'aube à l'angelus du soir," etc., etc. There was nothing in them of a serious nature, and indeed they must have been dangerous reading for he confesses that he was at that time a pagan, but they attracted the attention of the literary world. Possibly that was a cause of grief to him afterwards, for like so many of the literary men of France he returned to the faith and is now a practical and devout Catholic.

He has written an account of his conversion for the Revue de la Jeunesse which others besides the young folk will read with pleasure. It is the outpourings of a grateful and humble soul. "The meanest and most obscure of conversions" he writes, "is mine. I did not come to Thee, O Lord, with flowers in my hand and honey on my lips. I was the gloomy child who lost his head and his feet and who was about to be lost when he saw the branch on the bank which the Blessed Mother held out to him when he was in danger of being lost in the flood. I had drunk at many a fountain and had eaten many a forbidden fruit. I had reached the limit of pleasure but sadness took possession of me and something like death was upon me because I did not understand that while I was doing wrong I could implore God for the grace to rise from my sin.

"One morning I awoke on my couch crushed in body and soul. I was a nervous wreck. When I revived I uttered some words that seemed to choke me. They were: 'Either that or nothing.' The word 'that,' meant the Catholic Apostolic Church which had begun again to teach me, although my second Angel Guardian, my friend; Paul Claudel, was far away over the seas.

"I arose and that morning—it was Sunday—I went to weep during Mass at the Cathedral of Bordeaux. In the depth of my soul a sense of joy began to make itself felt, and I asked myself could it be possible to experience such joy. For the first time, pagan that I was—I felt—how shall I express it?—the movement that God causes in the depths of souls that seem so far away from Him. For the first time, I recognized Thee, O God! as my father.

"But the gleam of grace that had penetrated into the narrow fissure of that block of clay that I was, had not yet completed its work. Scruples of the most terrible kind assailed me, and I asked myself, in doubt, if confession and communion were possible for me. Then reason came to my aid, and I argued that God could not turn from a soul that sought to reach Him, and in spite of the thorns and the serpents that I felt under my feet, I made up my mind to go as a pilgrim to Christ to ask him to accept the sufferings that perhaps some spiritual guides in their ignorance might prevent me from offering.

"I see now the poor little room where Father Michel heard my confession and gave me Holy Communion. It was July 7, 1905. Claudel was there and he served the Mass. His countenance seemed transfigured as he stood near the sacred chalice. I recall the melancholy of that moment, and my memory still clings to the pleasant picture of the vineyard and its caretaker, and how sweet was the odor of the vine.

"You, Paul, my spiritual father who went off to China in those days of the blistering heats of the Fête-Dieu, know that I have persevered; you know that I have continued to be strong; you know that when many of my faint-hearted friends doubted of my fidelity, I wrote my 'Christian Georgics'; you know that the Lord of Cana has blessed me; you know that I have fixed my tent, that I have established my hearth-stone, and that one of my children is your god-son held by you in God's shadows over the baptismal font. There he was called Paul, after you Paul Claudel."

E. P. Dutton & Co. have out a sumptuous holiday edition of "The Gathering of Brother Hilarius" the well-known story of Medieval England by "Michael Fairless." (Margaret Fairless Barber.) The Protestant author's Benedictine Monks of course act a little strangely at times, as when Brother Hilarius, for instance, is dismissed from the noviceship, wanders through Europe for six years, then returns and makes his profession after about three months' probation. The ravages of the "Black Death" and the terror it inspired are well brought into the story, and good pictures are given of fourteenth century life. There are eight beautiful illustrations in color by Eleanor Fortescue Brickdale. (Price, $2.50.)

"Mrs. Fairlie's Granddaughters" is a story Frances Noble tells about two cousins, Louise and Mollie. The former threatens to turn out a suffragette but through the influence of the more domestic Mollie, and through the timely appearance of Rupert Earlsleigh, happily marries instead. The moral of the story is one of which Mrs. Pankhurst would hardly approve—(Herder, 75 cents)—Margaret M. Kennedy has gone through the lives of the Saints and selected a dozen apparitions of the Divine Infant recorded there and made out of them for little ones an attractive story-book entitled "The Holy Child Seen by His Saints." The famous apparition to St. Stanislaus, strange to say, is omitted. Lindsay Symington furnishes the book with six pictures that will be enjoyed by the children. (Benziger Bros.)

Calendars for 1914 are on the market. E. P. Dutton & Co., New York, have sent us some specimens of their artistic panel designs in color which include Fra Angelico's musical angels, "Madonna Calendars" in large and small sizes, and a "Pearl Blotting Book Calendar, Containing Quotations from Great Authors and Spaces for Daily Notes." The Sentinel Press of E. 76th St., New York, has out the customary "Blessed Sacrament Calendar" with its appropriate thought for every day, and the Mt. Carmel Guild of Buffalo, New York, has published its "Catholic Calendar" with daily quotations from Catholic authors.

That bright little review, Catholic Book Notes, has recently had its attention called to the anti-Catholic spirit that pervades Fletcher and Kipling's "History of England." "We are not aware," remarks our contemporary, "that any Catholic protest was made against the book when it was first published in 1911, but in any case it may be well to call attention to it here. The fact that the copy before us was given to Catholic children as a Christmas present shows that a warning against it is necessary." In the issue of AMERICA for March 9, 1912, the book was reviewed and a few of its numerous misstatements pointed out. "Catholic children" was our concluding caution, "should not, of course, be given this book to read, nor should it be used in public schools."

THE DRAMA

Repetition of the Old

It is a sort of a relief to note that there has been no new "thriller" of late to help in the prosecution of the evil work the stage is engaged in at present, unless, perhaps, we are to understand from a hint in the New York Herald that a certain hodge-podge in English and German which is described as combination of comedy, melodrama and burlesque, and which shall be nameless is to be placed in that category. But although there are no new horrors, the old ones remain, and just as if there had been no interference whatever by the police, no condemnation by the courts, the papers still print in heavy type the attractions of "The Lure," "The Family Cupboard," "The Fight," etc. Of course such appeals for patronage make the pious utterances in the editorial section ridiculous. But after all most papers are commercial in their intent rather than educational or moral. Hence one can be reasonably sure that the play which is said to be shocking London at present and which is described by the Daily Express as "the most suggestive and salacious play that has been staged in London for twenty years" will soon be widely advertised in our New York dailies. "It will make lots of money," according to an English paper, because "it is so very naughty." It will indeed, "make money" for the proprietors of the papers as well as for the proprietors of the theatres. Its title is "Who is the Lady?" With the record she has no decent person would care to know who she is.

On the other hand, that we are not altogether hopelessly lost might be inferred from the way Shakespeare continues to be received when it is played by a capable artist. Thus in "The Merchant of Venice" by Sir Johnston Forbes-Robertson, we are told that "the audience preserved an absolute silence. It was a tribute both to the players and the play. Shylock was an old, shaking emaciated, revengeful creature whose hatred for the debtor was so tense that the audience felt a positive relief when each terrible scene was over." In brief "there is money" in decent acting.

But when we have the editor of the once conservative Harpers' Weekly stating that "artistic expression even though it take the form of brothel plays should not be suppressed but encouraged," and when several women in the audience he was addressing applauded this utterance one is almost inclined to think that the public perception of right and wrong is too utterly dead to be appealed to. In this respect the United States is as bad as England where we find Bernard Shaw assailing the Bishop of Kensington for daring to condemn certain plays as "suggestive." "The Bishop had no right to imply," he says, "that the word suggests sexual emotion." But why he should be angry at his Lordship is hard to make out, for in the next breath he insists that sexual emotion is a very good thing to suggest, for it has something or other to do with art. "In any case," he says, "if you don't want such plays, stay away." Thus he would thrust every foul, nasty, disgusting, shocking, obscene thing on the public notice and use every possible means to induce young and old to see it, and then shout "stay away" if you don't like it. Naturally the London Spectator declares very plainly that Mr. Shaw is bereft of common sense in assuming such a position and it advises this wild Irishman,—we are sorry he is Irish—to try to understand that if he has no common sense, others have. "When once he makes that discovery," it continues, "his curiosity would certainly be piqued, and there is no knowing how far such an able man might not be carried by the fascinating pastime of seeing things as they are, not as detached thinking can make them. Not only would he improve enormously as a decent fellow, but his art would profit by it. For the first time he would be able to import into his plays that touch of humanity the absence of which has always been very painful to admirers of his mental brilliance."

Maggie Teyte appeared and disappeared in New York. As she knew that a New York audience would not be able to read French she very probably omitted publishing the nasty text of the songs which she had formerly attempted to sing.

EDUCATION

New Educational Bill in Belgium—Carnegie Foundation Denounced in the South—French Bishop on School Possibilities in France

We are indebted to the London Tablet, November 8, for an illuminating review of the discussion of the Education Bill presented by M. de Brocqueville's Ministry to the Belgian Chamber some three weeks ago. The review makes it clear that the main object of the Anticlerical Opposition is "that the Bill provides for the maintenance of religious education" in the public schools of the country, and that it is around this phase of the proposed enactment the fight really centres. It has been remarked that, while the measure has been persistently and even venomously attacked by the enemies of the Ministry, up to the present at least no really relevant or effective argument has been urged against the proposed new legislation.

Readers of AMERICA will recall that the present Bill is one introduced by M. Poulet, of the Ministry, to take the place of the measure advocated by the late Belgian Premier, M. Schollaert. It concedes certain features long demanded by the Anticlerical Opposition. Among others, it proposes to bring in compulsory education and it will make provision for the medical inspection of school children. The essential and fundamental right of parents to be really free in their choice of schools for the instruction of their children, is, however, emphatically insisted upon. The bon scolaire proposal, contained in M. Schollaert's Bill, was objected to because, if some approved schools are accorded less support in the way of maintenance than others, then such schools are plainly penalized, and equally plainly, the parent's choice is so far restricted. The author of the Bill now before the Belgian parliament has, therefore, provided that the voluntary or denominational schools must not only be kept open, but as efficiently maintained as the communal schools, by reverting to the old device of the Government grant, long the acknowledged form of support to such schools.

Equality of maintenance, and hence of efficiency, in the case of schools supposes, as is clear, a diligent safeguarding of the interests of the teachers in charge of the different schools. In Belgium religious hold positions in the communal schools and in the voluntary schools. To assure equality of treatment M. Poulet's Bill declares that religious teachers in the former institution shall be paid on the same scale as their lay colleagues, whilst religious serving in these latter, who live in community, shall receive such salaries as may be agreed upon between the directors of the schools and the teachers in question.

This cursory statement of the principal details of the new Educational Enactment shows clearly the just and impartial lines on which it is conceived. Of course it would not suit the Anti-clericals to admit the excellent qualities of the measure—and, therefore, their persistent and venomous attack. Much as they prate about freedom they by no means are ready to secure to Belgian parents an unfettered choice in the choice of schools for their little ones. Although Clause 17 of the Constitution of Belgium declares education to be free, and although, as the Tablet points out, "that would be a mere empty word if the recognized voluntary schools were to be so heavily handicapped as to be unable to maintain their efficiency" the Belgian Opposition is intent on destroying these sensible provisions of M. Poulet's Bill. The ridiculous phrase of "the two Frances" so persistently upon the tongues of the enemies of Catholic schools during the unfortunate struggle which ended disastrously for our coreligionists in that country has found its way into the present discussion in Belgium. The Socialist leader, M. Vandervelde, we are told, "assured the Government with much fervent eloquence, that if they persevered with their Bill they would destroy the moral unity of the country by dividing them into two hostile camps." But it is surely much to ask, upon the pretext of securing a something that does not and cannot exist even in so Catholic a land as is Belgium, that the defenders of religious instruction should forsake their fixed convictions to permit their bitterest opponents blithely to sweep every vestige of such training from the schools. It was a Belgian, M. Carton de Wiart, who said: "In a country where education is not a monopoly of the State, but free, equality of treatment of all schools is the only logical and fair consequence of the lack of moral unity." The plea that the Bill is unconstitutional is, therefore, groundless; nor is there aught of effective force in the argument which defenders of non-religious schools elsewhere have used and which the Belgian Opposition have made their own. It is plain to any fair-minded man that, in a land where education by law is free, grants made by the Government to voluntary schools are not in any sense an endowment of Catholicism in general, and of the religious orders engaged in teaching in particular. Evidently, then, the fight in Belgium's Parliament is centred solely about the maintenance of religious instruction in the schools, and the record of the discussion thus far promises exceedingly well for the complete victory of the party pledged to sustain it.

Andrew Carnegie's Foundation for the Promotion of Teaching continues to find disfavor among the leaders of the Protestant body in the South, who, from the beginning have denounced it as an attempt to secularize church colleges and to destroy Christian education. On November 23 Bishop Warren Candler of the Southern Methodist Church and Bishop Albion Knight of the Episcopal Church denounced Mr. Carnegie's policy in sermons delivered in Atlanta. The former declared: "The skilfully devised scheme of Mr. Carnegie and those who act with him to secularize education in the United States is something worse than a blunder. It is a crime against civilization, or it would be if the effort could be successful. But it is absolutely certain that the efforts of these gentlemen will never succeed. All that Andrew Carnegie and his followers can do at most will be to denature some Protestant institutions and destroy others. But the great majority of the Protestant colleges will refuse to allow Carnegie to bribe the religion out of them. The churches are awake to Carnegie's plans and will thwart them."

However gratifying the boldness of the attack, one is inclined to question the optimism of Bishop Candler and of Bishop Knight, whose sermon was along the same lines. The record of the institutions already numbered in the list of the recipients of Mr. Carnegie's bounty hardly bears out the contention that "Protestant colleges will refuse to allow Carnegie to bribe the religion out of them." Yet one may find some comfort in the Bishop's assurance that "the churches are awake." For it is, after all, in the moral strength that the Carnegie Foundation possesses to influence through its affiliated colleges, the acquisition by a purely private corporation of a dominant control in educational legislation in this country that the real danger to religion in our schools is found. If the churches of the denominations "are awake to Carnegie's plans," as the Catholic body has been from the beginning, the evil threatening our colleges and schools can surely be averted.

The Paris correspondent of the Irish Catholic describes what has been termed "the startling speech" of Mgr. Touchet, Bishop of Orleans. The utterance was made during a meeting of the parishioners at Artenay and in the presence of the Mayor and a great gathering of notable personages, and was based upon a report that the present Government in France will probably call upon the Chamber to complete the discussion and adoption of the bills already drawn up seriously to hamper the working, if not to effect the suppression of, the Catholic primary schools.

After reminding his hearers of the abominable acts of persecution of which the educational religious orders have been the victims in France, the Bishop declared that what is being prepared is much more grave. He added:

"The screw is this time being put on strong. I will therefore explain, without hiding anything, the opinion which is now expressed by authorized Catholics. Supposing the State monopoly of education, complete, partial or disguised, should triumph in Parliament, then Catholics propose to retaliate in two ways—first, let us close all our schools at once, and at the same moment. We educate in certain dioceses half the children, in others a third, in others a quarter, more or less. Our schoolhouses and school teachers cost nothing to the State."

Mgr. Touchet then showed that the Government would be unable to provide for the education of the children thus thrown on its hands, or could only do so after long delay and with immense pecuniary sacrifices.

The second proposal of the Catholics would be the employment of the money thus expended for education, during a certain number of years, on press propaganda, electioneering, patronages, etc.

The Bishop of Orleans added:

"That conception—which would not be the end of civic strife, but perhaps the commencement—is most grave. It would have no chance of being put into execution unless it was previously generally accepted and ordered. And that order can only be given by the French episcopacy, duly enlightened by the lay Christians of each diocese."

Though the eminent prelate does not foresee any immediate necessity to have recourse to those measures of retaliation, he admitted that "it is possible to conceive the arrival of a critical moment when their adoption would be necessary. We know perfectly well that we must expect neither justice nor healthy liberty from a party which incarnates itself in M. Combes, who has forgotten nothing and learned nothing, and who would remorselessly send France to her ruin, provided it were he who led her."

ECONOMICS

Land Booms and Their Results

News is reaching Europe from Canada of considerable suffering among the immigrants into the Dominion. Canadians say that the reports are unfounded, which one can hardly believe, or that they are exaggerated, which may very well be the case. But it stands to reason that in a country in which activities were stimulated to excess, and which for this reason, drew to it men without means, living only by their labor, now that the reaction has come, must be a great many for whom no employment can be found. Canada has been enjoying a huge boom, long drawn out, for which there was the slenderest justification. We will say nothing about the morality of such a boom, since its immorality is self-evident, but will dwell for a moment on its economic aspect.

Reduced to its simplest formula, a boom is the selling of something at a price beyond its value. Sometimes what is sold has no value at all, as, for instance, town lots in a city never to be built, farms that never will produce, mines without enough ore to pay the price of extraction and reduction, and so on. This we shall pass over, as whatever we may say of the boom, as we have defined it, will apply à fortiori to it. Value is something relative. It measures the thing valued in terms of other things. The common measure of value is money. But this has no absolute value, but is rather a means of comparing values. When one says that a piece of land is worth fifty dollars an acre, he means that it will produce for the purchaser the same profit as fifty dollars invested in a cow, or a share of some company, or any other productive investment. If the land is in some settled region and the buyer intends merely to rent it to others, the comparison with an investment in shares, is made very easily. The shares produce say, 10 per cent. If the land will produce a net rent of five dollars an acre, the two are of equal value. But if one is going to live on the land the problem of relative values is more complex. The shares give nothing but their income. They do not provide food or shelter. These must be bought with the money that comes from them. The cow produces food, but at the cost of its own food and shelter, and of labor, which have to be taken into account in estimating the profit of the investment. The land will produce for the owner food, shelter, barns, implements, stock, but at the cost of his entire labor. One has to consider, therefore, the net result of the land investment compared with the share investment which leaves one free to give himself entirely to some profitable employment, to determine the relative value of each.

An investment in land in a settled region supposes a steady market easily reached. A similar investment in a new country demands a careful consideration of two questions, first, is there a market; and, second, is it attainable. The mere fact that there is a market is not sufficient. If it is not attainable, or if it be attained to more easily by others, the investment will prove a poor one. Land boomers are in the habit of setting before the eyes of their victims wonderful descriptions of the productiveness of the soil, which, though true for the moment, ignore the fact that it is a virgin soil, and therefore that its productiveness will not necessarily be sustained. As for the market, they often do not mention it, or if they do so, they do not say whether it is a practical market. This depends upon the means of communication, the railway freights, if there be a railway, the production of neighboring countries and their access as competitors to the market. We lived in British Columbia in the early days. The soil was productive, there was a market, but farmers were always poor. They had their houses and their food, but comparatively little else; and to work from morning to night for mere food and shelter is not worth crossing the sea for. The reason was that there was no access to the market except by wagon over rough roads. In the interior even roads were wanting, and men owning thousands of cattle were poor, because they could not get them to market. Produce raised in large quantities in California could be brought by sea more cheaply, than similar produce raised in small quantities could be brought over fifteen or twenty miles of country road.

Things have improved since then; but there are many who have gone out to Canada attracted by the accounts of land boomers, only to find themselves without a practical market. It must be said to the credit of at least the British Columbian Government, that it has warned such over and over again against buying land without inspecting it, or without taking the advice of its agent in England. Another great evil of land booming is that it holds out promises for the future that are not always to be fulfilled. Were one to believe the boomers, and unfortunately too many do, Western Canada is to be filled up within the next few years with great cities, railway centres, and one has only to buy a hundred and sixty acres of wilderness in the neighborhood of the coming towns of Smithville or Fort Jones, to be a millionaire ten years hence. Men and women leave their homes attracted by such promises, only to find that the wilderness is the wilderness and that the winter is beyond their physical powers to sustain. They get into debt, lose even the land they have paid so dearly for in money and vitality, drift into the towns to join the ranks of the unemployed to overflowing; to struggle for employment with workmen skilled and unskilled, already far in excess of the country's needs. H. W.

Agricultural School Farms

The very successful Lincoln Agricultural School Farm which the Christian Brothers have been conducting for several years at Lincolndale, Westchester County, for the boys of the New York Catholic Protector, has a rival in Maryland. In an excellent paper on "The St. Mary's County Idea" contributed to the Philadelphia Ledger, the Rev. John La Farge, S.J., tells of the equal success the Xaverian Brothers have had in arousing enthusiasm for farming among the young Marylanders who attend St. Leonard's Hall Agricultural School at Leonardtown:

"Each boy," we read, "has his own 'pets,' of which he has full charge and responsibility: Dutch-belted calves, pigeons, guinea-pigs, lambs, Pekins, Wyandottes or Plymouth Rocks, guinea-keets, Belgian hares, hogs, etc. Boys rear broods of chickens and ducks, construct concrete duck-ponds, make concrete bottoms and wire sides for chicken-nurseries, do every conceivable kind of light carpentry work, put up hundreds of yards of woven-wire fences and steel posts, demonstrate the use of dynamite for splitting logs, removing stumps, hewing trees, draining swamp-lands, subsoiling and excavating, harvest the corn with a harvester, cut corn, cow-peas, etc., with a whirl-wind feed cutter for the new concrete silo,—(the second silo to be erected in St. Mary's County)—watch each detail in the preparation of the land,—though they do not themselves do the heavy work of ploughing and harrowing,—lay off fields, test soil, construct hog-runs, build drive-ways, drain, roll and perfect their baseball diamond, tennis-courts, etc., operate the School auto-truck, motor-boat, gasoline and steam engines, record and report readings on the various instruments of the U. S. Weather Bureau, make cheese and butter, cultivate and experiment with beneficent bacteria, report to the U. S. Department of Agriculture on the insect pests, which they collect and describe, study the dressing of hogs, beef and poultry, and so become practically acquainted with animal physiology, regulate their own heating and lighting apparatus, and so on. The boys have helped materially in the erection of the new farm-buildings, and studied the advantages of Loudon stalls and cork-brick flooring.

"With such a training therefore the boys of Leonard Hall felt themselves pretty well competent to run a County Fair; and it was the boys that ran the Fair. Not a single employee was needed, except a few colored men hired by individuals to feed their stock. Boys were gate-keepers and ticket-sellers, treasurers and secretaries. They put up tents and stands, sold toys and confectionery, transported passengers from the village to the school, arranged box-stalls and exhibit-rooms, escorted visitors and gave information to strangers, ran the telephone-booth and check-room, and a dozen other features. Nor was it anything very novel; merely an extension of the daily round of absorbing duties. They were the official aides to the St. Mary's County Fair Association, composed of the most prominent farmers and friends of agriculture in the County. The Association had been organized in May, 1913, after a modest initial Agricultural Exhibit had been held at Leonard Hall in October, 1912. Committees were appointed in May for the organization of a Fair along the lines of the Hagerstown and Frederick Fairs, and the ladies of the St. Mary's Alumnae Association, who are the social leaders of the County, volunteered their services in serving refreshments and dinners in the inimitable old Southern Maryland style.

"Was it a success? Not if you looked for horse-racing, or gambling, or fakirs, or 'Midway'; for none of these attractive features were present. But no one in the County regrets their absence. On the contrary, St. Mary's County is proud that in the words of an editorial in the Baltimore Sun, St. Mary's County has set an example to every other County in the country by eliminating all those objectionable features which impoverish instead of benefiting the farmer, which do not improve the breed of stock needed for farm purposes, and draw undesirable classes. The great number of visitors who came during the three days of the County Fair, October 28th, 29th, and 30th, represented the very best that St. Mary's County afforded in the way of intelligent and progressive friends of agriculture. As someone remarked, it was like an enormous and overjoyed family gathering, all congratulating and chatting with each other in the whole-souled Southern way. St. Mary's County Fair was for a purpose; and the best testimony as to the accomplishment of that purpose is found in the expert testimony of Dr. O. M. Stabler, of the Office of Farm Demonstration, U. S. Department of Agriculture, who was one of the judges of the exhibits, together with Prof. Jesse M. Jones, of the same Department, and Dr. S. S. Buckley, of the Maryland State Agricultural College," all of whom praised highly the exhibitions that the boys of Leonard Hall gave of understanding nearly every branch of farming and stock raising.

Albania and Its Prince

An Albanian journal, Tarabosh, published in Scutari has the following leader on the proposed new ruler:

"We are told a certain Prince of Wied is to reign over us. Wied? Wied? What does the word signify? It is unknown to us, men of Albania. However humble we are in the eyes of Europe still we deserve a Sovereign who is somebody. And our efforts to learn anything particular about the Prince of Wied have failed. Beyond a notice in the 'Almanach of Gotha' and that he is by courtesy a major in the Prussian army, he is as unknown to the world as to ourselves. He has a brother, however, who is secretary at the German Legation in Christiania. . . .

Without unfairness it may be said that his negative qualities alone recommended the Prince of Wied for the throne of Albania. The land of Skander Beg, Ali Pasha and Mehmed Ali is to be ruled by a cipher, an obscure Prussian officer. It is at once absurd and humiliating. So deeply does Europe despise us! We are not considered worthy of a Prince who had distinguished himself in some great and good work of philanthropy, or some feat of arms, or even who had a patrimony sufficient for his own and his family's support in the honorable post offered him, without drawing on our impoverished resources. No; the Prince of Wied's one qualification is—his Protestant faith! But will this recommend him to either Catholics or Mahommedans? Even to the handful of the orthodox among us he is only a heretic. A sad bungle surely, this candidature of a Protestant nonentity."

According to the Times correspondent of Avlona the Moslem tribes are petitioning the Powers for a Moslem Prince. The Christians show no sympathy for or confidence in the Prince of Wied.

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

On November 21, the closing exercises of the first triduum for Catholic physicians took place in the chapel of St. Vincent's Hospital, West Eleventh Street. Those who attended, receiving Holy Communion, listened to a short discourse by Rev. T. J. Shealy, S.J., and received the papal blessing, which was followed by Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament. The triduum marked an innovation in religious activities among Catholic professional men. The physicians who participated included some of the most widely known Catholic medical men, professors in medical and academic institutions, specialists in various branches, writers and lecturers of note, as well as many of the younger physicians, who, after the closing exercises, were the guests of Mother M. Josepha, and the Sisters at breakfast. Doctors Constantine J. MacGuire, Thomas Kelly, John Aspel, Charles E. Nammack acted as a reception committee. Dr. Jose Ferrer, President of the Medical Board of St. Vincent's Hospital, presided and welcomed the physicians on behalf of Mother Josepha and the Sisters of Charity. Rev. Father Shealy, who was conducted to the hall by Doctors Francis J. Quinlan and Simon J. Walsh, was warmly greeted. At the close of the breakfast Dr. John G. Coyle, on behalf of the physicians not connected with St. Vincent's, expressed the gratitude all felt for the many courtesies extended by the Sisters and for the spiritual advantages that all had derived through the exercises directed by Father Shealy. Dr. George D. Stewart of the visiting staff of the Hospital, who was one of several non-Catholic physicians who attended some of the exercises, made a brief speech, which was pleasantly received. This triduum marks a new and successful departure in spreading the apostolic spirit among Catholic laymen. Catholic men of other professions will doubtless be reached by similar methods and a certain outcome of such exercises is a greater and more powerful extension of the lay apostolate, which promises so much for the advance of Catholicism in America.

OBITUARY

The Catholic press of Buenos Aires chronicles the death of Mr. Miguel Carroll, a leader in the Catholic activities of Argentina. Mr. Carroll was one of the founders of the Irish Catholic Association, of the Círculos de Obreros and of the Asociacion Catolica. An example worthy of imitation by the Catholic layman everywhere was the part he took in teaching Catechism every Sunday at the Oratory of the Salesian Fathers. A great concourse of mourners attended his funeral on October 21.

The New Orleans Province of the Society of Jesus suffered a great loss in the death of Rev. Augustine Porta, S.J., November 16. Father Porta was one of those many-sided men whose rarely efficient powers enabled him to do work to God's greater glory in widely different directions. A scholar of brilliant parts he was for years a distinguished lecturer and a professor of recognized ability in the various Jesuit colleges in the Southland; a discreet and prudent counsellor, he won the confidence and esteem of a wide circle of troubled souls who looked to him for guidance and direction; a devoted father to the little newsboys of New Orleans he was to them the last refuge in all their needs who, better than any one else, saw beneath their apparent hard exteriors wonderful possibilities for things good and true; and the devoted friend to men eminent in business and professional life, "his boys" whom he had trained in their college years, he was their ever-ready mentor in the frequent interviews they sought with him when the worry and bustle of their lives made helpful direction a solace and a comfort.

Father Porta was born in France, of Spanish parents, on August 24, 1860. His father, a distinguished leader of the Carlist party, had been exiled shortly before Father Porta's birth and he died whilst the latter was still a young child. Educated in the Jesuit school of Avignon, France, young Porta early volunteered for the American missions of the Order. He made his novitiate partly in Grand Coteau, La., partly in Florissant, Mo., and after a year of study in this house he followed the usual round of young teachers of the Society, in Spring Hill College. Ordained by Cardinal Gibbons after his theological studies in Woodstock, Maryland, in 1893, he returned to his home province to fill the position of lecturer in ethics and metaphysics in different colleges. For the last fifteen years he has labored in New Orleans, and it is in that city, especially, that his memory will be held in benediction by the many sorrowing friends who will miss his genial, helpful influence.

CHRONICLE

Message of the President.—President Wilson delivered his annual address before Congress on December 2. It was the fourth time the President had appeared personally before the two houses. Interest in the message centred chiefly on what he would say on the Mexican problem and on the question of anti-trust legislation. In both instances the President's remarks were reassuring. He denounced Huerta as a dictator and usurper whose power is crumbling day by day, but he expressed the belief that this country would not be obliged to alter its present policy of "watchful waiting." In regard to anti-trust legislation the President made it clear that he would not advocate any change in the Sherman anti-trust law, but would favor merely supplementary legislation of such a character as to reduce the "area of doubt" that has harassed business men. He promised a special message later on the trust question. The prominence which he gave to the method of electing the President of the United States aroused more interest and comment perhaps than any other feature of his utterances. He recommends the enactment of legislation doing away with nominating conventions and permitting the selection of the nominees for the Presidency by direct primaries. The President also urged legislation "to facilitate the credits needed by farmers"; the construction of a railroad by the Federal Government in Alaska, and prompt action on the currency bill. He reminded Congress that every step was being taken by the new administration in Manila to give the Filipinos an opportunity for self-government as rapidly as possible, and promised to "satisfy the obligations of generous justice towards the people of Puerto Rico, by giving them the ample and familiar rights and privileges accorded our own citizens in our territories." He also pointed out the justice of passing a railway employers' liability law, and a law that will reduce the hazards at sea. President Wilson omitted altogether any attempt to summarize the work of the Executive Departments, stating that he would submit the reports of the Cabinet officers to Congress. The address was, therefore, much shorter than any annual message of recent years. The President received a cordial greeting from Congress. The applause was spontaneous and in marked contrast to the stiffness and formality that marked his appearance on previous occasions.

Mexico.—The American press has been largely given over during the week to the reported exploits of General Villa, the rebel leader in Northern Mexico. If numerous dispatches can be believed Northern Mexico is irretrievably lost to Huerta and the capture or at least the investment of the city of Mexico is a matter of only a few weeks. The provisional President states that several places were evacuated by the Federal troops under his instructions. It was reported that Queen Wilhelmina, on behalf of the powers represented at the Hague Tribunal, had submitted to President Huerta a plan for his elimination and the pacification of Mexico. Later this was stated to be a pure invention. One of the metropolitan papers December 5 gave a graphic account of the entrance of General Villa at the head of his army of 5,500 rebels into the city of Chihuahua. "The people of Chihuahua City welcomed Villa with unbridled joy. The Governor's palace was decorated in his honor and the cathedral bells pealed him welcome." The press, December 6, reported that Villa had not entered Chihuahua but with 7,000 rebels had tarried half-way down the line at Ahumada.

Mazatlan, on the West Coast, was said to have been captured from the Federals, but again the report was denied.

Bill for Volunteers Passed.—Representative James R. Mann, of Illinois, the floor leader of the Republicans in the House of Representatives, asserted openly in a speech in that body his belief that the rapid passage of the Hay Volunteer Army bill through the House on December 3, indicated that the Administration was preparing for a war with Mexico. The Hay bill provides for raising a volunteer force in time of actual or threatened war to a strength of 242,000, exclusive of militia or regulars, to be utilized by the President in the event of hostilities. A similar measure was passed in great haste in April, 1898, three days before the declaration of the war with Spain. Mr. Mann was not opposed to the passage of this measure. He said he was willing to vote for it since it was advised by the House Military Committee and the War Department. "I should greatly regret a war with Mexico," said Mr. Mann, "I have no complaint to make of the attitude which the President has taken in his dealings with Mexico, although I confess I can see no end to the road which he is now pursuing. I do not see any escape from chaos and anarchy in Mexico under the plan we are now pursuing." Chairman Hay made no denial of Mr. Mann's assertion that the rapid passage of the bill through the House pointed to war. In his discussion of the measure Mr. Hay was very guarded and refrained from even mentioning Mexico.

Zelaya Set Free.—General José Santos Zelaya, former President of Nicaragua, who was held in New York at the instance of the Nicaraguan Government, was discharged from Federal custody on December 3. It was given out that Nicaragua had withdrawn its request for extradition with the understanding that Zelaya would leave the United States and would not return to his native country.

Canada.—Sir Wilfrid Laurier's free food policy has been accepted by the Liberals of the western provinces. They demand in addition an increase of the preferential rebate on British goods, a lowering of many items of the present tariff and free agricultural machinery. By increasing the British preference they hope to increase imports from England, and thus to bring ships to carry their wheat from Canadian ports. But as the reductions they demand would stimulate trade with the United States, it would seem that these would neutralize the effect of the first measure.—The Conservatives won the bye-election for the provincial legislature in East Middlesex, Ontario. The majority did not come up to their expectations.—The Canadian Northwest is reported to be full of cattle buyers from the United States, and of collectors from the merchants to whom farmers and retailers are indebted. The consequence is that farmers are obliged to sell at whatever price is offered. In the meantime trade with New Zealand and Australia is growing fast. One steamer from New Zealand to Vancouver had in her cargo 17,479 boxes of butter, 255 carcasses of veal, 212 quarters of beef, 25 carcasses of mutton, 73 bags of meat, 274 cases of eggs and 50 tons of flax. This can hardly be called satisfactory.—In hearing an appeal in England the Lord Chancellor called attention to the error of calling Canada a federation. To be such it would have had to originate solely in the free consent of the provinces, whereas, though this consent was a condition, the formal union was effected by the British North American Act of the Imperial Parliament.—The Government has determined to deport the Indians freed by order of Chief Justice Hunter of British Columbia. If necessary, it will amend the Order-in-Council under which the Immigration Department acts to remove the technical flaws the Chief Justice found in it.

Great Britain.—The police met Mrs. Pankhurst on her arrival in Plymouth and carried her off to prison. Mrs. Drummond and her army seem to have been unequal to the occasion. One may be sister of a general and yet nothing of a strategist. Of course, Mrs. Pankhurst got out in a day or two. We forget how many years her sentence calls for, and just how many days she has done up to the present moment.—Female suffrage is beginning to interest the dignitaries of the Established Church, some of whom are writing stirring letters to the press for or against the demand and the feeding of hunger strikers.—The strike on the Great Western Railway, which began with the refusal of a crew to move a train containing goods that had been handled by Dublin strike-breakers, has been settled.—Lord Crewe, one of the chief members of the Cabinet and a former Secretary for India, recommends a commission to investigate the troubles of the Indians in South Africa. All parties, nevertheless, seem agreed that the Imperial Government cannot interfere. The Times argues that exclusion is no real grievance for the Indians, pointing to the fact that the Dominions exclude hundreds of Englishmen every year. But exclusion is not the precise grievance in South Africa. This includes the special treatment of Indians brought into Natal as indentured laborers after their term of service has expired. Moreover, Englishmen are not excluded as Englishmen, but individuals are excluded for certain personal defects that would make them a burden instead of a help. If an Englishman has these defects he is excluded just as is a German or an Italian on the same conditions.—The seal of the Corporation of London, which has been in use since 1381, has been replaced by a new one. After 532 years of service it is worn out.—Mr. Asquith traveled lately from London to Leeds by motor car. His car was defended by means of wire gauze, and he was escorted by four cars of police, all to protect him against Suffragists.

Ireland.—The Ulster Unionist boast about arming to resist Home Rule does not appear to be justified by the official returns of gun licenses issued during the last year, the figures being 21,546, as compared with 21,857 in 1911. There has been very slight alteration in the figures during the past ten years. Indeed, since restrictions on the carrying of arms were removed, about seven years ago, there has been only an increase of 2,000 gun licenses issued annually for the whole of Ireland. No licenses, of course, are required for "dummy" rifles.—The anxiety of the Government to bring about a settlement of the Home Rule question by consent is shown by the character of the speeches of different members of the Ministry. Unionists are declaring that more or less authorized emissaries of both sides are feeling their way towards a common basis of agreement. This delicate task, the Unionists say, is in the hands of men who are in touch with the leaders of the two parties, but who are without the political standing or the power to commit either side to any definite proposition.—Trade conditions in many sections of the country have been disastrously affected by the prolonged dock strike in Dublin, and the holiday outlook is most unfavorable. Meanwhile a fresh element of bitterness has been introduced. Strike-breakers are imported in considerable numbers, and as a consequence angry feeling is spreading amongst the toiling classes.—Lord Chief Justice O'Brien, who has held the office for twenty-four years, has resigned because of ill-health. He is seventy-two years old and was, before his appointment to the judicial post, Irish Solicitor-General ('87 and '88) and Attorney-General ('88 and '89) during Mr. Balfour's Chief Secretaryship.

Rome.—The ex-Patriarch of the Syrian Monophysites, Ignatius Abdul Messih, who abjured his schism last May, arrived in Rome to make his official submission to the Sovereign Pontiff. The number of conversions of this kind that are continually increasing in the East are particularly consoling because of the exalted rank of the converts.—Cardinal Oreglia, Dean of the Sacred College, died in Rome, December 5, at the age of 85. He received the red hat in 1873, was made Bishop of Palestrina in 1884, and of Ostia and Velletri in 1896.—Cardinal Maffi, Archbishop of Pisa, early in the year sued the Corriere Toscano for libel. An accusation of the misappropriation of money intended for the erection of a church, brought to the manager of the newspaper a sentence of imprisonment for one year, three months, and five days, with a fine of 1,820 francs; while a similar sentence was passed upon the editor. Moreover, the court ordered Dr. Del Nero, proprietor of the Corriere in conjunction with the manager and editor, to make good all moral and material damages caused to his Eminence by the libel, and to publish the sentence in his own paper and the Giornale d'Italia of Rome. An appeal against this sentence resulted in a confirmation of the decision of the lower court. A letter now appears in the Italian Press from Italo Palliacci, the editor of the Corriere Toscano, declaring that he had been made a tool of by the authors of the articles, who failed to furnish him with the proofs they promised in support of the accusation. He begged the Cardinal to use his influence in obtaining pardon for him, and his reception by his Eminence has been a hundred times more gracious and more favorable than he expected. He has now resolved to put his pen to better use in future.—The Jubilee year ended on the 6th, 7th, and 8th of December in the Archbasilica of St. Mary Major. Sermons were preached in various languages, and on the 8th, Cardinal Vincenzo Vannutelli celebrated high Mass at the Papal altar. In the evening the students of all the colleges in Rome assisted at Vespers and Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament. During the year immense pilgrimages had come from almost every country in Europe. Since last April about five thousand people assembled each week for the papal blessing in the Court of St. Damaso.

Spain.—The rebellion in Morocco is not yet quelled and reports arrived from Melilla on December 2 of an engagement of Spanish infantry with a strong Moorish force, ending, however, with the defeat of the tribesmen.

Italy.—The Radicals who collectively are the preponderating party in Parliament, are causing constant disturbances in that body. Cicotti the Socialist is especially conspicuous in the disorder. On December 4, he assailed the Government for wasting money on armaments and driving people out of the country. He recalled the scandal of the Bank of Rome and hinted that the Premier was involved in it. The tumult that ensued was ended only by adjournment.—The defeat of the ex-priest Murri in the election is notable because he was sustained by the Lodges, the Radicals, Socialists and Republicans and by Nathan himself. The great falling off among the Deputies in the number of those who profess allegiance to the Masonic body is attracting much attention.

France.—On December 2, by a vote of 290 to 260, Premier Barthou's Cabinet collapsed on the question whether the $260,000,000 loan for military purposes was to be exempt from taxation. Caillaux, who had once been Prime Minister and Minister of Finance, opposed the measure for the reason that it exempted a large class of citizens from taxation. This is the second ministerial disaster since Poincaré became President. The Radicals and Socialists are jubilant over the event because the Cabinet represented the policies of proportional representation and three years military service. Up to Friday the Government had not succeeded in finding a successor for Barthou. Many were thought of, such as Caillaux himself, Deschanel, Delcassé, Doumergue and Ribot. The last named has been offered the post although he has for some time been considered Poincaré's enemy. They were rivals in the fight for the Presidency of the Republic. Finally, Doumergue accepted the post provisionally.

Germany.—The disorder which led to the proclamation of martial law at Zabern, in Southern Alsace, appears to be the culmination of a series of disturbances which have taken place at that place intermittently since young Lieutenant von Forstner stirred the passions of the people by a disrespectful allusion to Alsatians early in November. The outbreak early this month of anti-German and anti-military sentiment among the Francophile population of Zabern appeared so serious that troops with fixed bayonets and ball cartridges took possession of the streets and public squares. The official report states that the battalion threatened to open fire unless the crowds dispersed. Many arrests were made, amongst others two Judges and the State's Attorney, who were on their way to their homes after leaving the court house, were hustled off to prison. There is an impression in many quarters that the military authorities, in consequence of their overwrought nerves, are not handling the situation with tact and cool-headedness. Prompted by the Emperor himself, the Government at Berlin ordered a thorough inquiry. —The whole affair naturally was a subject of discussion in the Reichstag, and with serious consequences, since, following a four-hour debate on December 4, the Reichstag voted a lack of confidence in the Imperial Chancellor and the Government. This censure, by the decisive vote of 293 to 54, is ascribed to three main causes, the anti-German outbursts in Alsace, the harsh retaliatory tactics used there by the military, and the utterances of Chancellor von Bethmann-Hollweg and War Minister Falkenhayn in Parliament the day before, in which they declared that the "mailed fist" would continue to be the supreme authority in Germany. The vote brings about a crisis, and it is thought that the Government will now have a difficult time carrying out its program. —By a singular coincidence on the very day that witnessed the last outbreak at Zabern, Prince von Bülow, formerly German Imperial Chancellor, abandoned the silence which he once affirmed he would maintain, even after death. He does this to warn his countrymen that inveterate hostility to Germany is the soul of French policy. He expresses this conviction in a review of German politics written for his forthcoming book on Emperor William's reign. He speaks of "the folly of ignoring the inbred hostility of the French," and adds that "it is idle to hope for a reconciliation with France without restoring to her the provinces of Alsace and Lorraine." —Germany will be represented officially at the San Francisco Exposition. Various parties of the Reichstag at special sittings of their parliamentary groups decided to support an appropriation of $500,000 for a German building, to be known as the "Deutsches Haus." This action of the party groups insures the passage of the bill by a large majority. The "Deutsches Haus" is to be a splendid example of modern German architecture, and the exhibit it will contain will be composed of the principal arts and crafts and a rather elaborate display of many products of German industry. —A startling number of workers without jobs is reported from Berlin and other German cities. Those engaged in the building trades appear to suffer most, but other industries are also affected. The unemployed are joining in a movement to seek the aid of the Reichstag; insurance against lack of employment is said to be one of the propositions they ask to have considered. The situation has its own difficulties in the present crisis facing Chancellor von Bethmann Hollweg.

Hungary.—The Catholics of the kingdom are congratulating themselves over the extraordinary success of their general Congress, which convened in Budapest early in November. With the exception of Bishop Mailáth, now in Rome, the united episcopate of the land, headed by the Primate, Prince-Archbishop Czernoch, was present throughout the sessions. This was the first occasion in twenty years, by the way, to witness such a gathering of Catholic Church dignitaries, and the immense crowd assembled from all parts of the country greeted their spiritual leaders with enthusiastic acclaim. Three members of the Cabinet, the Minister of Worship, of Agriculture, and the responsible Minister for Croatian affairs found place in the meetings in neighborly proximity to the leaders of the Opposition, Count Zichy, Count Apponyi and Karolyi, and in friendly harmony joined with them in all the proceedings. A strong delegation came from the parliament, the Opposition party and the followers of the Government being equally conspicuous in the various discussions. Their attendance was accepted by all as a happy evidence of the strength of Catholic opinion in Hungary, a theme developed in masterly fashion in the opening speech of Count John Zichy, and equally insisted upon by Cardinal Bishop Hornig, who used it in his vigorous argument demanding that the Government respect public morality in the legislation favors. One prominent Catholic leader disappointed the assembled body. Count Khuen-Hédervary, leader of the National People's Party, and a Knight of the Catholic Order of the Golden Fleece, did not deign to meet his coreligionists, though he found time, during the Congress, to deliver an eloquent address before the Protestant assembly convened to protest against the Beilis trial in Russia.

Albania.—It was announced on December 3, that the Powers had all agreed to accept William Frederick, sixth Prince of Wied, as King of Albania. He is forty-two years old; his principality takes its name from a small river that flows into the Rhine. His family name is Runkel. He is a Protestant in religion, but he will find few, if any, of his coreligionists among his subjects. They are made up of Moslems, Catholics, and schismatical Greeks. The population is estimated to be between 1,200,000 and 1,600,000.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

Coming Over to Rome

We may be pardoned for reprinting the following notice of the services conducted in a Protestant Episcopal Church in Brooklyn, New York. The notice is taken verbatim from the New York Herald of December 1:

"St. Andrew's Day was observed as feast day in St. Paul's American Catholic Church, in Brooklyn, with special services yesterday, the occasion being the unveiling of the shrine to the Blessed Virgin Mary and a life-size statue of St. Peter. Father Andrew Chalmers Wilson, the rector, preached on St. Andrew at high mass, when the priests wore, for the first time, a gorgeous set of vestments of Spanish red and gold cloth, which were imported recently.

"Following the sermon Father Wilson blessed the shrine of the Virgin. This is a memorial by Mrs. Edmond Burke Lombard. After the rector had blessed the shrine E. B. Lombard lighted the first candle, invoking the blessing of the Virgin upon his household. Each member of the Lombard family then lighted a candle and said a Hail Mary.

"Previous to the service the life-sized statue of St. Peter also was unveiled. This is a beautiful gift of E. Crawford Sanford, junior warden of St. Paul's, and will be blessed at the midnight mass, Christmas Eve."

What were the sentiments of the readers who scanned the foregoing notice in the Herald? The members of St. Andrew's parish, we venture to say, felt a thrill of exultation that public recognition was thus given to their claim of being Catholics, not plain Catholics it is true, for that would mean Roman Catholics, but Catholics albeit with the differentiating title of American. Perhaps their feelings of exultation would be considerably modified if it were suggested that the term American as they use it cuts them off from the Church Universal, which is the Church of Rome, as effectively as the qualifying term of "Old" separates the bearers of the name "Old Catholics" from the same Church.

Father Andrew Chalmers Wilson was tickled to see himself dubbed Father. But to be termed Father no more establishes a right to the title than calling oneself pope would make one the successor of St. Peter. Other readers, and they were numerous, smiled at the assumption. The term "Father," according to the latest unabridged Standard Dictionary, means specifically "A Roman Catholic priest who is a member of a religious fraternity: in the United States and Ireland also, a secular priest." But dictionaries or custom and tradition will not help us in this anomaly of dubbing oneself Father and thumbing the pages of the Book of Common Prayer, authorized as the title-page declares for the use of the Protestant Episcopal Church in America. It requires a wonderful intellectual somersault, which only a past-master in sophistry could accomplish, to make the American Catholic Church an Algebraic equivalent for the Protestant Episcopal Church. It shows the vast capabilities of the English language that will allow the unheard of extravagance of making Protestant and Catholic synonymous and a Protestant parson the same as a Catholic priest.

However, there is no sham or pretence about the setting up of a statue to the Blessed Mother of God, of lighting candles and of reciting the Hail Mary. The Catholic Church, Roman Catholic if you will, claims no monopoly of devotion to the saints or of the pious practices in use among her children. The Church of Rome from the beginning has vindicated her claim to be the Catholic Church par excellence, and the nature of her organization and mission demands such vindication. But the Blessed Virgin's protection and assistance is a thing which the Church teaches is good for all, saints and sinners alike, for those in the fold, as well as those out of it, for pagans, Jews, heretics and infidels, as well as for her own children, whether good or bad. It is a good sign when even Protestant Episcopalians set up and bless with the sign of salvation statues of the Queen of Heaven that were ruthlessly hammered and pulverized by the direct ancestors of Father Andrew Chalmers Wilson.

Only one comment shall we add. Where is the obedience and respect due to the Protestant Episcopal Church at large which voted down at its recent convention in New York the motion to consider a change of name, or at least put off its consideration for the present? But, after all, that is only a trifle. There can be no obedience where there is no recognized head.

Times are moving fast. What with statues and chapels to St. Peter, St. Patrick (save the mark!), St. Columba, and St. Martin of Tours we are not surprised to behold at last a statue erected in honor of the Blessed Virgin. If the Protestant Episcopal Church is to become the American Catholic Church, it must needs acquire some semblance to the title. Recognition of the Pope's supremacy will come in due course. Father Andrew, probably without knowing it, is steering his bark straight for the Church of Rome, in which he will soon land, let us hope and pray, his confiding passengers.

Don Alejandro Pidal

Catholic Spain is in mourning over the great loss sustained by the country and its national literature and science by the death, in his sixty-sixth year, of Don Alejandro Pidal y Mon, early last month in Madrid. With him there passed away a great Christian philosopher, an eloquent orator, a statesman of distinguished note, and a rare master of the Castilian tongue.

Of Don Alejandro Pidal some of his contemporaries used to say, that he was the Montalembert of Spain. I believe the comparison to have been a just one. One who is acquainted with the character of both men will find little difficulty in discovering the common traits that show a family resemblance. Each had the same lofty eloquence; the same wonderful love for the Church; the same spirit of conciliation, eager always to secure harmony among those who ought to work for one end; the same zeal in the defence of his high religious ideals.

Entering into public life at a time marked by momentous changes in the political and social order of his country, Pidal aimed to begin his career by holding himself aloof from every fashion of party strife. One ideal filled his mind: to unite all Catholic factions, whether Carlists, or Integrists, or Alfonsists, under the one flag of their Catholic faith, and to bring them to labor together for the common cause. With this object in view he founded and conducted for many years a daily newspaper called La Union Catolica, whose name plainly indicates its program, scope and aspirations.

Unhappily he failed in the undertaking and his dream of Catholic union of action was never realized. Convinced, however, of the need of genuine Catholic influence in the political activities of the day, and fully aware that such influence may not be exerted by one who neglects to enter into the arena in which is waged the struggle for the vital issues of his country, Pidal, early in the years of the Bourbon Restoration, 1878-1880, joined the Conservative party. Canovas del Castillo, the then head of that organization, had just made his solemn and public promise to defend and guarantee the rights of the Catholics in Spain.

This is not the time to recall the bitter censure passed upon his conduct in doing this by both Carlists and Integrists. Pidal paid no heed to the shameful abuse they heaped upon him, but serenely pursued the way he had chosen to walk. Twice Minister in the Cabinets of Canovas del Castillo, president of the Cortes during several terms of Parliament, Ambassador to the Holy See from 1900 to 1902, Pidal never failed to use the opportunity these exalted charges gave to him to labor strenuously for the best interest of the Church among his people. He was especially active in securing the reestablishment of the religious Orders proscribed in Spain in the unhappy days of the Revolution in 1868.

Contemporary Spain has known no more distinguished son in the field of oratory, of philosophy, of literature, or of science. His eloquence was of the impassioned order—majestic and solemn. Like Donoso Cortes in his style, he delighted in rounded paragraphs, in sonorous periods, in majestic development of his thought, and in the use of brilliant, almost dazzling, imagery. His voice, full of passion; his knightly figure; his action, always noble and impressive; his manner, that of a valiant challenger, gave admirable strength to his profound thought and splendid diction, and made him a very king in the tribune.

Pidal's classical discourses on our knowledge of God, delivered during the first Catholic Congress of Spain, the one he gave two years ago at the Eucharistic Congress in Madrid, his funeral oration before the King in honor of Menéndez y Pelayo in May, 1912—not to recall others of a more remote date which marked the course of his long duel with Castelar in the Cortes, will always be read and universally admired as masterly examples of erudition and doctrine and eloquence.

Don Alejandro Pidal was, as well, a distinguished writer on philosophical themes. An ardent admirer of St. Thomas Aquinas, the "Summa Theologica" of the Angelic Doctor was a work he studied and loved to consult and meditate upon throughout his life. Jointly with the Cardinal-Friar Ceferino Gonzáles, of whom he was the beloved pupil and intimate friend, Pidal may be regarded as one of the genuine enthusiasts for the restoration of Thomistic teaching to the schools of Spain. His work on the Angels of the Schools, written whilst he was still a young man, offers sufficient reason why Pidal's name should be placed high on the roll of Spain's sons distinguished for philosophical and literary merit. That work alone justified his election to the presidency of the Royal Academy of the Spanish language, a post which he filled from 1906 to the day of his death.

But what made Pidal a truly splendid figure in the eyes of his coreligionists was his robust and unshakeable Catholic faith, of which he never hesitated to make public profession, no matter what his audience or what the occasion. And his faith, best of all, was a living, practical faith. Invited a few years ago to a banquet to be held in commemoration of the independence of the Argentine Republic, Pidal sent a note declining the invitation. It chanced that the date of the gathering coincided with the eve of St. Peter's feast, a fast-day in Spain, and, as he wrote, he could not permit himself to take part in a banquet whose menu proclaimed the violation of one of the precepts of Holy Church.

When Pidal's growing infirmities brought him to what he recognized was to be his death, he called one of his sons to his bedside and bade him summon the priest, that his father might confess and prepare worthily to receive the Holy Viaticum and Extreme Unction. "When I shall have thus made ready, death may come when it will. It will find me nestled in the arms of Divine Providence, in whose embrace I shall take my refuge as a child in that of its father. Crucifix in hand, to kiss it with my lips and to look upon it with my eyes, and fortified by the loving prayers of my children, I shall await death's coming."

Such was the death of the exemplary Catholic leader whose loss all Spain deplores. His remains, clothed in the white habit of the sons of St. Dominic, whom he regarded with sincere affection all through his life, now rest at the feet of the Virgin in the historic shrine of Covadonga. A fitting resting-place—since it was in that lovely nook in the Asturias the plans were laid which introduced the most glorious epoch of our country's history, the reconquest of Spain by her Christian sons after the land had fallen prey to the Moslems in the invasion of 711. May he find there the rest his worthy life deserves.

Text-books in Seminaries

The Holy Father continues to perform without human respect the duty of every chief pastor, to watch over those preparing for the priesthood and to ensure the purity of their faith and doctrine, no less than of their morals. Accordingly Cardinal de Lai, Secretary of the Sacred Consistorial Congregation has addressed another letter to the Ordinaries of Italy on the subject of the books used in their seminaries, either as text-books or books of reference. He praises them for having carried out his previous instructions, but goes on to say that the abuses brought to light by the Apostolic Visitors have not ceased entirely. The Sacred Congregation learned during the course of the present year "that there are in use scholastic manuals deserving censure, either for the historical and doctrinal errors they contain, or for their dangerous principles, and in general for their scientific spirit out of harmony with Christian and Catholic sentiments and the teaching of the See of Peter, the supreme chair of truth."

The Sacred Congregation recommends, first of all, the exclusion from the preparatory schools of the seminaries of those anthologies of prose or poetry and those manuals of secular history which offend the purity and sanctity of the faith, or even the profound veneration due to the Church and the Roman Pontificate. In the same way must be excluded those text-books of philosophy which are contrary to Catholic sentiment, or are even out of harmony with the directions of the Holy See for the teaching of that science, as, for example, "Il Primo Passo alla Filosofia," of Luigi Ambrosi. Nor is the pretext that they are employed to point out errors and to combat them of any value; since to start pupils by a false way in order to turn them back to go forward in the true, to teach them error in order to instruct them in the truth, is to upset every right principle of pedagogy.

As regards the theological schools, the Sacred Congregation would have excluded from the seminaries those text-books of ecclesiastical history which "pass over lightly or omit the supernatural part, which is the true, essential, indispensable element in the annals of the Church, without which the Church itself becomes incomprehensible" (Circular Le Visite Apostolique). Such are the manuals of ecclesiastical history of F. S. Funk and of F. S. Kraus.

The Sacred Congregation recommends much diligence in the choice of text-books of patrology. No one is ignorant of the great efforts made by rationalistic criticism to destroy, or at least to weaken, the authoritative and venerable testimony to the Catholic Faith of the Fathers of the Church, distorting their writings by a caviling exegesis, or, still worse, diminishing the loftiness of their genius and the value of their doctrine. It is necessary, therefore, to deny entrance into the seminary to such works as can dim in the virgin minds of youth the high idea the Church has of her Fathers, and to select only those that, taking account of modern culture, do not wander away from the safe rules of Catholic theology. Such is not the manual of patrology of Rauschen, in which the doctrine of the Fathers, even on the fundamental dogmas of Christianity, is expounded frequently in a manner alien to the objective truth and to the sense of the Church. Hence the Ordinaries must be careful to eliminate it from their seminaries.

The Sacred Congregation ends by reminding the Ordinaries of the regulation of the Sacred Congregation of Bishops and Regulars in the General Scheme of Studies of May 10, 1907, namely, that the text-book of philosophy and of theology is to be proposed by the council of professors and submitted to the bishop for approval. By order of the Holy Father this rule is to be extended to all the scholastic text-books of the seminary and even of the preparatory schools. Moreover, the text-books prohibited in the schools are not to be allowed to seminarists for their private use. Hence to these are absolutely forbidden those works of consultation and erudition not conforming to the rules already laid down. Such are the "Légendes Hagiographiques" of Delehaye, and similar works.

The Poet of Hope

"I care not who makes the laws of a nation so that I write its songs" might possibly be the dream of a certain French poet of to-day named Charles Péguy, who is beginning to attract considerable attention, but who, as far as we are aware, is almost unknown outside of his own country. Indeed, he is not mentioned even in "Qui Êtes-Vous?" the French "Who's Who," of three years ago, in spite of the fact that for the last thirteen years he has been editor-in-chief of the Cahiers de la Quinzaine, a review of politics, literature, sociology, art and kindred matters which is credited with having taken rank as soon as it appeared with the Revue des Deux Mondes, the Revue de Paris, and the Mercure. He is one of that remarkable set of French literary men who have in the past few years been won back to the faith of their fathers; and his conversion in particular is considered to be as influential for good as that of Brunetière.

The supernatural grace by which he was brought back to God would seem at first sight to have been only the natural result of his previous pursuit of a certain line of thought in connection with his literary work. He had frequently written against a theory accepted by many of his associates, that a poetical ideal does not necessarily imply a reality, actual or possible. The contrary, he maintained, was the case, and he insisted that an idealist always strives to realize his dreams. His especial dream was the betterment of the human race, and that ideal he fancied was going to be achieved through the instru-mentality of Socialism. Hence, among the early contributors to the Cahiers, we find the names of such men as Jaurès, the present leader of the French Socialists, and Vandervelde, their oracle in Belgium. There are others also who inspire scarcely less terror. Strange to say, Péguy was also an ardent Dreyfusard; not that he liked the Jew personally, but he regarded him as the victim of a cabal.

He grew wiser as he grew older, and whatever he may have thought of Dreyfus, his illusions about Socialism soon vanished. "Looking back," says a writer in the Nineteenth Century, "at the spectacle of human history, he saw that during all the peaceful changes and violent upheavals, all the bloodshed, and cataclysms, and untold sufferings that constitute the record of Europe, one light had remained shining, at times dimly, at others brightly, whilst all around it sunshine and shade have fast succeeded each other. The shadows have not extinguished this light, neither have the fitful gleams of sunshine rendered it superfluous. This light, which seems to defy the ages, and which is the light of Christianity, represents a great force of humanity; it represents the principle of stability, of permanence, whereas elsewhere we find nothing but the unstable and the fleeting. No social reformer, no idealist, can neglect this force."

M. Péguy did not neglect it, and to restore Christianity in the nation that had for so many centuries gloried in its title of the Eldest Daughter of the Church, became his life's ambition. He saw around him a generation which had not only been robbed of its Faith, but had been saturated with a philosophy which denied everything spiritual in man's nature, refused him even liberty of will, scoffed at the doctrine of a future life as a delusion, and waived aside with contempt the belief in a Supreme Being, to whom man is accountable for his actions.

The inevitable consequence of this philosophy ensued. The buoyant resiliency of the French character, its enthusiastic optimism in great undertakings, and that gaiety of disposition which had always defied defeat and disaster, was now being succeeded to a very alarming extent, by a gloomy pessimism which saw only ruin ahead, and which began to discuss and even admit the doom of their political system as a nation, and even the decline and degeneracy of the race itself. Against this growing pessimism Pégoud sounds a note of hope, of hope founded on the Catholic Faith. He bids his countrymen remember that the Church had lifted up the nation from more abysmal depths than those in which it is now plunged. He summons from the glorious past the figures of Joan of Arc, of St. Louis, and others who were great French patriots, while remaining loving children of the Church; he calls upon his countrymen to look beyond the hideous epoch of the French Revolution, which the enemies of their Faith had taught them was the real beginning of French history, and to contemplate that splendid period when France dazzled the world by her achievement. His theme in brief is: Let France be Catholic again and her greatness will return.

As you look at a volume of Péguy's verse you are surprised to see it sprawling all over the page. It is like Walt Whitman's in its structure. It has neither rhyme, nor rhythm, often no punctuation, and the poetry of it not unfrequently runs off into the flattest of declamatory prose. All the old stateliness and rigidity which until lately was the characteristic of French versification he tosses aside, but perhaps it is that very emancipation from the usual poetical fetters that has helped to attract notice. For the reader it is annoying at first, with its endless and apparently needless repetitions, but after a while the spell is wrought and you began to read with pleasure. Often his utterances affect or copy the parallelism of psalms, as, for instance, when addressing the Blessed Virgin, he speaks of her as one "Who is infinitely high

Because she is infinitely humble Infinitely great!
Because she is infinitely small
Infinitely appealing
Because infinitely appealed to."

Though at times he is not over careful of the orthodoxy of his statements, he knows that his countrymen understand, and he continues to sing recklessly. He is almost too familiar in addressing the Almighty, but while making Him utter unusual language, though audacious he is never irreverent. The helplessness of childhood captivates him because he hears God say: "Les enfants sont plus mes creatures que les hommes. Ils n'ont pas encore été défaits par la vie de la terre,"—an allusion to the helplessness of France at the present day, which his readers understand. It suggests also the hopefulness which is characteristic of childhood; a virtue that he is anxious France should learn.

Night is also one of his favorite themes, because it is the time of silence and of reflection, and he recalls especially the night of the crucifixion, which was followed by the Resurrection. France and her future are always before his eyes in such pictures.

In brief, he is odd, original, erratic, picturesque, but according to a French critic "you find in his writings a multitude of reflections, replete with thoughts that touch our life in every fashion; he gives you beauty, spirituality, comfort, elevation, completeness and satisfaction. He is a spiritual pioneer who knows how to speak to men of his time of the eternal verities which each generation longs to hear. Those who slake their thirst at his source will quaff a living water. The horizon he opens is vast; and he satisfies and enchants by the full and strong response he furnishes for our needs and our aspirations."

His French admirer asks, will this strange poet exert an influence? He answers: It is too soon to prophesy. But his English friend of the Nineteenth Century has no hesitation in saying that if the Government does not head him off they will soon have to make a bonfire of his books on the Place de la Concorde. At all events, it is certain that in the midst of the marvellous Catholic movement that is now going on in France for the rehabilitation of Catholicity in all its ancient glory, whether that movement is manifested in the paintings of artists like Maurice Denis or Frère Angel, or in the writings of distinguished litterateurs like Pierre Claudel or Francis Jammes or Bazin or Jules Lemaître, or in associations like those of the Jeunesse Catholique, or the Action Française, not to speak of the triumphs that are being continually won by the hierarchy and priesthood of the country, the new and strange singer of hope, Charles Péguy, "who knows his religion thoroughly, whose politics are pure and intellectual, even if he has not yet arrived at the sublimity of humility or charity, is sure to exercise a vast influence for good in the regeneration of France." X.

"The Pagan à Kempis"*

Certain authors who have rejected Christianity are accustomed to make a great deal of the imperial Stoic Marcus Aurelius Antoninus. His times, his writings and his career have been praised with enthusiasm by men like Gibbon, Arnold, Renan and Mill, and their present-day disciples echo and prolong the eulogy. The accepted pose is to look back with longing on the age of the Antonines, to regret the passing of that "period in the history of the world during which the condition of the human race was most happy and prosperous," before the triumph of Christianity had blocked the wheels of liberty and progress, put an end to freedom of thought and cast a pall of gloom over the joys of life.

They delight, too, in setting up such men as Socrates and Marcus Aurelius against the Church's saints. For this purpose "the last of the Romans" is perhaps the greater favorite. Socrates, for all his wisdom, looked indulgently upon the vile impurities of the Greeks, but the character of Marcus appears to be so upright and his morals so correct that Matthew Arnold calls him the "purest of men," on whose "truth sincere . . . no shadow ever came," "perhaps the most beautiful figure of history" and a man "morally and intellectually" nearer our times than St. Louis or Alfred the Great. Men who have no faith in the supernatural point proudly to this great pagan, and "after-Christians" who are "in love with a moral code which brings with it no sanctions, a generation sick unto death with skepticism, seek pleasure in an undogmatic philosophy of life" like that taught in the "Meditations" of Marcus Aurelius; a book of reflections composed by the emperor for the guidance, it is believed, of his worthless son Commodus. Father Joy has done well, therefore, in choosing for a little "Study in Ideals" the writings and career of this great Stoic. The book is not out of place in the "Iona Series," for without depriving the emperor of merited renown, the writer shows that the man who stood so high above the pagans of his time was yet for true greatness of soul the inferior of the humblest Christian martyr that suffered death in his reign.

Marcus Aurelius was a very remarkable man; there can be no question of that. "Even in a palace" he led a virtuous life. As emperor of Rome he had at his command the means of gratifying every unworthy ambition and evil desire the human heart can conceive. He was faithful, however, to high natural ideals. Even the early Christians found the example of his goodness an incentive to sanctity. "If unregenerate nature could do so much," they reasoned, "how ought not the regenerate blush for their tepidity?" When Cardinal Barberini had translated the "Meditations," he dedicated the work to his own soul, "in order to make it redder than his purple at the sight of the virtues of this gentile." Many a passage can be found among the imperial Stoic's words "to himself" that might well be made the food of a Christian's prayer and reflection. For example:

"Does some bubble of fame torment you? Then fix your gaze on swift oblivion, on the gulf of infinity this way and that, on the empty rattle of plaudits and the indiscriminating fickleness of professed applause, on the narrow range within which you are circumscribed. The whole earth is but a point, your habitation but a tiny nook thereon: and on the earth how many are there who will praise you?" In another place: "When you wish to delight yourself, think of the virtues of those who live with you; for instance, the activity of one, the modesty of another, and the liberality of a third." Or: "Do only things necessary, things which in a social being reason dictates and as it dictates. For this brings the cheer that comes of doing a few things and doing them well. Most of the things we say or do are not necessary; get rid of them, and you will gain time and tranquility." Even if men persecute and insult you, "What has that to do," he asks, "with your understanding remaining pure, lucid, temperate, just? It is as though a man stood beside some sweet, transparent fountain, abusing it, and it ceased not to well forth draughts of pure water; nay, though he cast in mud and filth, it will speedily disperse them and wash them forth and take no stain. How then can you create a living fountain within? Imbue yourself in freedom every hour, with charity, simplicity and self-respect."

Indeed so frequent in the "Meditations" are passages like the foregoing that the admirers of Marcus Aurelius call him "the pagan à Kempis" and draw comparisons between the mystic and the moralist, in which the latter, of course, does not suffer. Though the two authors have many maxims in common, the similarity, as Father Joy observes, is merely verbal. "The same words do not express the same spiritual attitude in the two writers." The outlook of the one is wholly natural while the thoughts of the other are transfused by his glowing Catholic faith. The Stoic bids his soul retire into proud solitude; the Christian leads his into humble communion with God. Aurelius has much of the self-sufficiency and arrogance of his school. Like all the pagans, he has no conception of humility. He cannot say with à Kempis: "We are all frail; but do thou think no one more frail than thyself," but finds strength, rather, in considering the private vices of those who offend him and in reflecting on his own virtues. Such a grim reality as suffering he tries to brush away by cold reason. He would comfort a sorrowing heart with a syllogism. But our poor human nature, as à Kempis knows full well, needs something higher than itself to cling to; and requires strength from a source that is divine. So he offers both as a model and a comforter Our Blessed Lord Himself, whereas the duty of blindly obeying changeless laws is the highest and most consoling motive Aurelius can suggest for living an upright life. "A sentiment of sorrow and a deep disheartenment," says Dr. Döllinger, "cast as it were a black veil of mourning over the whole of his system of contemplation, and almost every one of his reflections," and even Arnold admits that no one can rise from the reading of the "Meditations" "without a sense of constraint and melancholy, without feeling that the burden laid upon man is well nigh greater than he can bear." Moreover, is not "Marcus Aurelius Antoninus to Himself" an overrated book? Because an interesting emperor wrote it, and he the solitary "saint," as many think, of paganism, modern unbelievers have never ceased to praise the beauty and profundity of his thoughts. But are they deeper and fairer than those of his master, Epictetus, and, not to mention the "Imitation of Christ," will his book bear comparison with St. Augustine's "Confessions," or even with Sir Thomas Browne's "Religio Medici"?

Though Marcus Aurelius recommends "retiring from life," if virtue becomes too hard to practice, he himself bravely waited for "the retreat to sound," doing his duty to the very last. He was a polytheist and a pantheist but not an atheist; a slave to the popular superstitions of his time, but his morals were better than his religion. A persecutor of the Christians, he gave the Church such martyrs as Polycarp, Justin, Felicity, Sanctus and Blandina, but it was a mistaken patriotism, apparently, that made him countenance such cruelties. "War was to him," says Dr. Rendall, a "hateful 'hunting of Sarmatians,' yet 'duty made him a great captain,' and he stayed the barbarian till Western civilization was Christian, and safe."

But Marcus Aurelius, be it remembered, was by no means a typical Roman of the second century, for Stoic philosophers as consistent as he were very rare. Moreover Rome still carried "its own moral corruption into all lands and they again poured back their own into a vast reservoir." We must go to Döllinger rather than to Gibbon for a true picture of the period. Slavery, the avoidance of marriage, the exposition of new-born infants, the practice, even by such "good emperors" as Trajan and Antoninus Pius, of loathsome Greek vices; the prevalence of public immoralities which imperial decrees tried in vain to put down; the horrors of the amphitheatre; the abominations of the temples—all these evils were quite or nearly as characteristic of Roman life in the time of Marcus Aurelius as in preceding reigns. The ideals and practices of the imperial Stoic were far higher, we may be sure, than those of the men he governed. To-day "the humblest Christian," says Father Joy, "has as his birthright truths which were the fruit of years of training and much struggle in the noble pagan soul; and he has much more," while to realize how far a Christian saint transcends in beauty of character a "saint" of paganism we have but to compare with the life and writings of Marcus Aurelius Antoninus those of St. Francis of Sales.

WALTER DWIGHT, S.J.

Religion in Schools

What do men mean to-day by the terms "religion" and "religious." Once upon a time, people had no difficulty in understanding just what was signified by the words, but in our day, when every "thinker" appears to concede himself the right to fashion phrases to his liking and to use terms as his own sweet will inspires, religion and religious, are words apparently as lacking in stability of signification as the weathervane lacks definiteness of direction in a wild atmospheric disturbance.

In the saner days of logical thought every one used to accept "religion," as the name of the virtue which is based on the complexus of the many-sided relations subsisting between man the creature, and God the Creator and Lord Supreme of the universe. As a virtue it connotes that habitual disposition on the part of man, which moves him to those acts of reverence, love and service toward his Maker implied in the relation of his absolute dependence on his Creator. In it are involved the knowledge, of course, of this dependence and the free and voluntary process of the different moral acts consequent upon the light of that knowledge. How then can we, in practice, have moral training or training to good and wholesome action without relation to religious formation or instruction in religion, since the ultimate "why" each free agent has the right to ask when urged to moral conduct, reaches back inevitably to the Lord Supreme, His Existence, His right to command, His expression of that command, His manner of communicating that command to us, and the extent of that communication? And since practically all these various phases of religious instruction are matters regarding which men and women of different religious beliefs are hopelessly out of accord, how is it possible to conceive a union of all denominations of Christians and Jews, and of all pagans, and atheists and agnostics as well, in some form of fundamental religious teaching that may be employed in our public schools, to secure the authoritative effect in the moral training of children good people are beginning to insist upon as a part of their school training!

AMERICA has urged this thought over and over again, and has drawn the only possible conclusion: it is imperative, if moral training be desired, to plan the re-introduction of religious teaching into the public school in a way that shall give to all the liberty of religious profession the law demands. Probably it is a vain repetition of a suggestion which should appeal to every one who studies the question. Yet we presume to repeat it because of the strange attitude of assistant superintendent Charles J. Koch of the Baltimore public schools recently described in the Sun of that city. A discussion arose, it seems, in Baltimore over the declaration that many agnostics had arisen among the school children of New York, who had professed a dislike for the songs or hymns sung in their class-rooms. It was contended that the abandonment of the song-singing in New York, because of the protests against the use of the name of the Deity, resulted in a strong leaning toward agnosticism, which had become a menace. Some went so far as to advocate the teaching of religion in these schools.

Mr. Koch was doubtful in the matter.

"The question of teaching religious principles in the public schools is a big one," said he, "and there is a good deal to be said on both sides. We have classes now in moral training, but there is a distinct difference between that and inculcating religious morality. The latter seems to have more effect—there is more authority behind it." Mr. Koch declared that he did not wish to commit himself to the suggested plan of having religion taught in the schools, but he showed that he had the subject deeply at heart. That it would be difficult to have all denominations of Christians and Jews to unite on some form that might be employed in the schools, he said, was true, yet it might not be impossible of accomplishment."

It will be possible of accomplishment only when the minds of sincere men shall have undergone an impossible change in the concepts now obtaining, regarding faith and revelation, and the duty of obedience to God on the part of man, once man has come to accept the light of His Maker's revealed truth.

The Price of Automobiles

"In the single month of November," according to the New York Times, "thirty-eight persons were killed by automobiles of one kind or another in Greater New York, and the record of fatalities since January 1 is 277." If to these figures could be added the sum total, whatever it is, of all the fatalities, not to mention the cases of serious injury, that have occurred throughout the country during the past year owing to the reckless violation of the speed laws, it would be found that as a nation we are paying a much higher price for our automobiles than the statistics and advertisements of manufacturers would indicate. If all the people killed by motor cars in America during the past year had perished in a single disaster of some kind, the tragedy would doubtless become historic. But should not the thirty-eight lives that were sacrificed in New York alone during November to the speeding automobile impress at least a little the imagination of the public? A few of these accidents were due, of course, to the negligence of pedestrians, but the rest were directly caused by the criminal carelessness of the chauffeur and the insensate passion for speed on the part of those who sit behind him. Moreover, the social and economic problems of our time will not be made any easier to solve, if people who are rich enough to ride in automobiles can run down with impunity those who are not.

The laws that have been framed for the protection of pedestrians should be rigidly enforced. As a result of special vigilance shown for two days recently by the police of New York, 500 arrests were made of chauffeurs caught exceeding the speed limit, and most of them were promptly fined $50 apiece, or were given the alternative of ten days in jail. The loss of that comfortable sum by the chauffeur or his employer will lower perceptibly, no doubt, the death rate of the Metropolis for the coming year. If New York's police, and those, too, of every city in the land, continue to keep a watchful eye on speeding autoists, and if magistrates will see that a reckless driver's second or third offense is punished, besides the fine, by the withdrawal of his license, and if our courts will try for manslaughter chauffeurs who run down and kill pedestrians, more of our citizens will feel that they can cross a street with safety. As conditions are now it is dangerous.

"Annulment" Needless

Mrs. Wharton's "Custom of the Country," a novel which "everybody is reading," of course, and which the "Holiday Number" of the New York Times Review of Books places, for some mysterious reason, at the head of the fiction list in its "One Hundred Best Books of the Year," is the object of the following well-merited strictures from a writer in the Catholic World for December:

"That this book could have been written and could be published by an American publisher, is a striking, thought-provoking commentary on our country. What makes it impossible for the reader to discriminate between the satirical and the non-satirical, is the defence or the excuse offered for this woman of iniquity. She is frankly materialistic; selfish, disloyal, faithless to everything that could possibly be sacred; a liar, an adulteress; and yet she is not responsible for all this, since institutions and customs have made her, and she could hardly act otherwise than she does." There are offensive references in the story to the large sum that Undine Spragg, the heroine, would have to pay the Pope in order to secure an "annulment" of her "marriage" to the man who succeeded her first and only real husband.

"The truth of the matter is," says the reviewer, "that there was no ground for annulment, since Undine was never really married to Marvell. Marvell commits suicide, and then Mrs. Wharton thinks the road is clear. Undine marries the nobleman and becomes a Catholic! But, again, the truth is that had she attempted to become a Catholic, she would have had to speak of her former marriage, and would not have been allowed to live as the wife of this Frenchman. Later she deserts the Frenchman, and throws herself at the feet of her first and her only husband, Moffatt." Mrs. Wharton is justly blamed for venturing to write about the Catholic teaching upon matrimony without taking the trouble to find out what it really is. "If she treated of any secular subject, if she wished to employ a figure from physical science, she would, undoubtedly, have made sure of its accuracy. But a matter of Catholic teaching seems doomed to a different fate. There is no responsibility to treat it honestly and intelligently." "Why is it," the writer asks in conclusion, "that women novelists of to-day, treating of women, always depict them without character, without moral strength, the abject slaves of social conditions? The picture of Undine offering herself to Moffatt at any price, under any condition, is one of the most loathsome in all modern fiction."

CORRESPONDENCE

The Silver Jubilee of the Institut Pasteur

PARIS, November 18, 1913.

On November 15 the Institut Pasteur, in Paris, celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of its foundation. The ceremony was a simple one. Dr. Roux, the present Director of the Institut, gave a brief summary of the valuable work carried out during the last quarter of a century. The President of the Republic, who from the outset has been connected with the Institut, was present, as well as the members of Pasteur's family: his daughter, Madame Valery-Radot, her husband and children, and his only son's widow, Madame Jean Baptiste Pasteur.

It is seldom that a scientist leaves behind him a record so glorious, both from a public and from a private standpoint, as Louis Pasteur. Those who knew him were struck, at the outset, by his simplicity of manner, his earnestness of purpose and kindness of heart. He was singularly indifferent to externals, and his first discoveries, those that revolutionized the scientific world, were made at the laboratoire de l'Ecole Normale, in two small rooms under the roof.

In spite of his constant dealing with human suffering, Pasteur never lost his tenderness for the sufferers; he put the interest of the patient first, that of science afterwards. In 1885, a little girl, called Louise Pelletier, was brought to him; she had been bitten by a mad dog thirty-seven days before. Pasteur's new treatment for hydrophobia was just started, but a condition of success was that the injections of the anti-rabic serum should be made promptly; in this case the long delay made success impossible. Pasteur was advised not to apply the treatment to Louise Pelletier; his invention was new, it was much discussed and violently attacked by those to whom novelty is synonymous of danger; to apply it to this hopeless case was to give his adversaries a weapon against him. Pasteur did not hesitate: "If I only had one chance out of ten thousand of saving this child, I must make the attempt." He therefore applied the treatment. Louise Pelletier succumbed, but her father fully appreciated Pasteur's generosity. "No man ever seemed to me so great," he wrote to M. Valery Radot. "I do not know any one who to save our dear little girl would have, as he did, simply out of charity, risked his reputation as a scientist and risked also a painful failure."

There is a striking contrast between the cramped precincts of the great scientist's first laboratory and the stately building that has borne his name for the last quarter of a century.

The Institut Pasteur was founded by a national subscription in 1888, as a direct consequence of Pasteur's famous discovery of the treatment of hydrophobia. It was on October 26, 1885, that Pasteur announced to the Academy of Science, in Paris, the discovery of this treatment; he had successfully applied it to a little boy of nine, Joseph Meister, who had been so frightfully bitten by a mad dog that the leading physicians of the day looked upon his death as inevitable. No certain cure for hydrophobia existed, and not only was the discovery remarkable for this reason, but it also seemed to open a prospect of other valuable discoveries; for the treatment used in this case might, it was thought, be modified and applied to other maladies.

So far, Pasteur and his colleagues, MM. Chamberland and Roux, had worked in an old building that was clearly ill suited for the important work that was now on hand; a subscription was set on foot to build a new house; it met with a generous response and in November, 1888, the Institut Pasteur, at Vaugirard, was inaugurated by President Carnot. Many magnificent donations contributed to secure the future existence and development of an Institute that undertook to apply the treatment against hydrophobia gratuitously to all those who needed it. In addition to this special mission, its members were bound to serve the cause of science, for the welfare of humanity, according to the methods created by their chief. In 1888 only a handful of favored disciples had been initiated in these methods; in the new Institute their numbers rapidly increased. Four of Pasteur's chosen followers: Duclaux, Chamberland, Roux and Metchnikoff, directed the studies of the younger men. Dr. Roux was in charge of the patients threatened with hydrophobia. One of the conditions of success being the prompt application of the treatment, other Instituts anti-rabiques were founded, as soon as possible, in different parts of France, at Bordeaux, Lille, Lyons, Marseilles, Montpellier and Nantes. The inoculations in Paris take place in the morning, and the success of the anti-rabique treatment, if applied in time, has never been known to fail. Let us add that the first two patients treated by Pasteur: the shepherd boy Jupille and little Joseph Meister, now middle-aged men, are both employed at the Institut. Pasteur's methods with regard to hydrophobia have been used to cure other diseases, diphtheria among others. The use of the serum against diphtheria was publicly explained by M. Roux, in 1894, at the Medical Congress of Buda-Pesth. He was then able to state that whereas 60 per cent. of the sick persons treated by ordinary methods died, only 24 per cent. of those who had been inoculated with the serum succumbed to the disease.

Pasteur had the joy of assisting at the partial development of his inventions; he died on September 28, 1895, and was given a national funeral at Notre Dame. But Madame Pasteur and her children wished him to be buried on the scene of his labors. They therefore erected an underground chapel at the Institut itself, and there, under the shadow of the Cross, one of the greatest scientists of modern times sleeps his last sleep. Since 1910 his devoted wife, the unselfish and helpful partner of his laborious life, has been laid by his side. Pasteur's private character was as lovable as his public career was glorious. He was a believer, and died with the Sacraments of the Church. He was conscientious, modest, disinterested and generous, a loving husband and father, a kind friend and a true patriot.

When we consider its comparatively recent foundation, the Institut Pasteur may be said to have done much for the advance of science and for the relief of suffering. But its members are, and must be, ever on the track of new discoveries and developments. They are now studying the question of tuberculosis, but so far with no definite result. They have been more fortunate in their discovery of the microbe of typhus and, in several cases, the inoculation of this serum has produced excellent results. Another important question, that of cancer, is still wrapt in obscurity, but it is studied and discussed with passionate interest by Pasteur's successors. A military doctor, who belongs to the Institut, Dr. Laveran, has lately discovered the microbe of intermittent fever; and Dr. Roux and his colleagues have discovered that of the plague.

The activity, intelligence and devotedness of the members of the Institute have done much to win for it the interest of the public, and large sums of money, the gift of wealthy benefactors, have been expended in improving and enlarging the building. A hospital has been added that is served by the nuns of St. Joseph of Cluny, where poor patients are cared for free of cost.

The methods invented by Pasteur have been carried by his successors to the ends of the civilized world. Dr. Calmette has founded an Institute at Saigon, on the lines of the one in Paris; another Institut Pasteur exists in Annam, others at Tunis, at Algiers, at Tangiers and Brazzaville. Pupils of the Paris Institute have been requested to take the command of similar institutions, founded by foreign Governments; thus the Institut bactériologique of Constantinople and also that of Brussels, are directed by Frenchmen, all of whom have been trained at the big house that has just celebrated its silver wedding.

Pasteur's reverent attitude with regard to God and the spiritual world contrasts with the shallow impertinence of men less learned and less eminent, who pretend that religion and science must be antagonistic. He thought otherwise. "On the threshold of the unknown world to which his studies had led him," says M. René Doumic, the distinguished French critic, "he saw opening before him a promised land, which is that of faith. . . . Those who, on this subject, pretend to have lights that Pasteur did not possess seem to me curiously presumptuous. . . . One of the most useful lessons that the man who so often conquered nature has given his contemporaries is to teach them to bow before the supernatural."

Catholic Congress in Hungary

BUDAPEST, November 15, 1913.

"One is at a loss to understand," exclaimed an interested visitor who had closely followed the filled up program prepared for the great Catholic Congress held in Budapest early in November, "how Hungarian Catholics, with the strong organization they possess, fail to make their influence more effective in the political life of their country." The remark was prompted by the magnificent showing made by the many societies which held their annual meetings during the Congress, and whose sectional gatherings contributed in striking fashion to the remarkable success of the general Congress. The speaker's astonishment is scarcely to be wondered at; no one who is not acquainted with the local and national causes that hold Catholics from united action in Hungary can fail to marvel at the absence of effective strength so splendidly disciplined an organization ought to bring to the leaders who seek to safeguard the interests of the Church. Only to mention a few of the bodies whose well-attended special meetings attracted attention, there were the Christian Social Workers, the League of Catholic Women, the Catholic Young People's Society, the National Committee of Marian Sodalists, representing an enormous body scattered all over the kingdom, the Society of Catholic Secondary School Teachers, the National Association of Catholic Workingwomen, the Catholic Young Men's Institute, the St. Stephen Society, the Pazmann Press Association, the St. Thomas Aquinas Society, the Women's Auxiliary to the Press Association, the Temperance Society and a long list of others. Specially worthy of note was the enthusiastic mass meeting of the Catholic People's League, an organization numbering 297,000 members in 2,600 electoral districts of the country, which was held on the Sunday afternoon immediately following the Congress.

Two speeches delivered during the course of the great gathering aroused widespread attention. Bishop Szmrecsanyi spoke of the long struggle Catholics have had to wage for their simple rights, a struggle that has already lasted sixty-five years. "And yet," said that prelate, "Catholics ask merely that their natural claims be heard, that in their foundations and schools and in the matters belonging to their religious worship they be left free to follow the principles of their Catholic belief. The Catholic who is not true to his Church cannot be true to his country, cannot be a genuine patriot; nor will one's pretended zeal for the national cause ever justify him in neglecting the rights and the interests of his Church."

Professor Mihályfi, Professor in the Royal University of the capital city, described, in an impassioned speech on the press, the havoc being wrought in Hungary by the freethinking forces which have made almost their own the entire press of Hungary. "Every evil weapon it has seized upon," he said, "to awaken the meanest instincts and the wickedest passions of a people easily aroused, and destroying, as it does, the finer characteristics of the Hungarian character, it threatens alike the future of the Church and of the nation." Professor Mihályfi averred he was not an anti-Semite, but he could not bring himself to accept without protest the state of affairs now facing Catholic Hungary. In that land of holiest Christian traditions more than 80 per cent. of the journalists and nearly every one of the proprietors of newspapers are professedly freethinkers of the Hebrew race.

The "Sun's" Cartoon

The cartoon in the New York Sun of December 6, is a sermon, an instruction, an exhortation. At the foot of the picture is a slimy, slushy river which, contrary to the usual course of such fluids, is making rapid progress over a territory which is designedly represented as low. Here and there are groups of people, mostly young, none of whom seem to be of the class in which poverty, according to the modern philanthropist, compels to vice. On the contrary, their apparel suggests that for them virtue is easy. At the left are two dainty little maids, each poring over a book picked out of the ooze. Though their frocks and hands are dirty, they are unaware of it, for they are learning about the "White Slave Drama" and "The Sins of the Father." In the middle and up to his knees in the sewage is a man gripping in one hand a closed book that drips defilement all over him, while he stops to peruse another that he has captured in the swirl. Near him, and likewise in the current, are two "newly-weds," arm in arm; she solicitous about her skirts, and with her veil down, though both feet are in the mire; he, defiant of the dirt, has waded into its depths. They are both staring at "Suggestive Pictures." On the other side a boy and girl kneel or bend over the river, unconscious of the poisonous odors they inhale while they are gloating over a book on "Immodest Dress." Down further the tango is being performed, and finally a boy in knickerbockers is immersed in the "Sex Problem."

The cartoon is called: "They wonder where it all comes from?" The answer is indicated by an elegantly attired young female who stands quite close to where the torrent comes down from above. It splashes her badly, but she likes it, for is she not having first pick of the "Filthy Plays" and "Songs" before they reach the people below? She is apparently a literary and dramatic first-nighter. The flood flows from what the artist calls "The Enlightenment Machine."

On its successive tiers are arranged in a gigantic keyboard four series of flattened heads, labelled "editors, novelists, publishers, writers, musicians, costumers, managers, etc." Their domes of thought have been crushed into so many keys by the fingers of the Devil, who is seen working with both hands on this infernal machine. Below it is a scoop which pours out the stream continuously.

It is a matter of history that His Satanic Majesty has played on this machine from the beginning. If you eat the forbidden fruit "you shall be as gods knowing good and evil." Of course, it is the evil that is wanted, not the good. Hence, the intellectual and moral density that one so often runs against at the present time among people who, in spite of their Christian education and the bit of common sense they ought to possess, whether educated or not, insist on flinging that execrable lump of stupidity at you: "We ought to know how those things are done." We trust that the Sun's picture will give these seekers for information a proper and much-needed shock, and compel them to understand that under present conditions Enlightenment means Defilement, and is the devil's own instrument to deluge the world with wickedness of every description, so as to sweep more effectually and more expeditiously unthinking multitudes of men and women to destruction. Respectable people ought to thank the Sun's cartoonist, and ask for more.

Churchill's Quest

The Century for December has an article on "The Modern Quest for a Religion" by Winston Churchill, in which that well-known novelist says: "It is a curious fact that there are some who look with longing eyes at the Church which still stands for external or what may be called supernatural authority; but which we cannot enter, because we perceive that every institution in our modern government, every discovery in our modern science from the telegraph which encircles the globe to the cure and prevention of disease has been accomplished against the principle for which that church still stands: the principle of having our thinking done for us."

Borrowing Mr. Churchill's own words, we beg him to remember another "curious fact," namely that not one of all the civic, scientific or sociological triumphs he names or intimates has anything to do with the supernatural order and that consequently the Church is not specifically concerned with their promotion. But far from impeding she has always fostered them and had it not been for her, Mr. Churchill and his timorous friends might be untutored savages to-day.

Did he ever think that the very inspiration to write about the "Quest for Religion" came from that same Church? that it was prompted by Michael Angelo's picture of the Creation in the Pope's Chapel? And did he ever reflect that he might never have known that there was such a thing as "Creation" except for the supernatural authority of the Church? But incidentally how did he find out it was Michael Angelo's picture? Did he discover that himself or did he take someone's authority for it? In brief would he tell us how much of all he knows or any one else knows is the result of individual research? Is it not to a vast extent based on authority?

There is one authority, however, that he bows to; that of the Personality of Jesus Christ. "With that wonderful figure rising before us," he says, "we find ourselves exclaiming: 'This is in harmony with that Personality! That is not! He could not have said this; He could not have done that.'" He forgets that there is one thing which this wonderful Personality said and did. He said He would establish a Church to which He would teach all truth and in which He would abide for ever; and He did establish it. Would it not be proper for Mr. Churchill to find out this Church and hearken to it? There can be only one. It would be very dangerous for him to do as another conspicuous man once did in the presence of that Personality. He asked "What is the truth?" and went away. We know the consequences.

"Book Hygiene"

A writer in the December Catholic World suggests the formation of a new society to be called "The National League for the Promotion of Book Hygiene." Just as the laws that forbid spreading the bacteria of physical disease are sternly enforced, this organization would see that scattering the germs of mental and moral disease by means of bad books and papers is rigorously prohibited.

"It matters not that the authors do not know, or that they accept theories and doctrines other than those accepted by a normal, healthy community. A factory owner who did not accept the germ theory, and who in consequence hung a roller towel in his employees' wash room, would be arrested and fined, nor would the court have any patience with his speculative theories. No more should the ignorance or the egotism of authors give them permission to scatter the germs of sickness and death. We bar the guiltless leper from the society of men. Book hygiene will teach us at once to bar the leprous writer from the public bookstalls, and the libraries, and the mails, and the express companies."

The writer is quite enthusiastic over the wonderful vogue this new movement would probably have. As the craze for "hygiene" of one kind or another is now seizing nearly everybody, he prophesies that zeal for "book hygiene" will spread like wildfire.

"Public exhibitions will be held showing the disastrous effects of bad books and irresponsible newspapers. The wealthy who have funds at their command, and who are so interested in the real welfare of society, will endow the movement. Public bodies will take it up and further it. Boards of Education will require a special course on it from teachers, and appropriate money for text-books in this new science. Class instruction will be given in our schools."

Would that this glowing forecast were something more than a flight of fancy, for the harm that our countrymen are doing their minds and morals nowadays by the habit of unrestrained reading might well be the object of a "National League for the Promotion of Book Hygiene. It would be a truly patriotic organization. For there can be no graver menace to our American institutions than that an entire generation should be flagrantly violating the natural law by holding in theory and practice, as so many do to-day, that there is no book or periodical published, however subversive it may be of authority and morals, that they have not a "right" to read.

New Year's Orgies

According to orders issued on December 1, by Mayor Harrison, of Chicago, horns, confetti, and other nuisances will not be allowed on the streets of that city New Year's Eve, and meanwhile the sale of such articles is prohibited. If these wise regulations were adopted and enforced, not only in the other large cities of the country, but in our towns as well, the measure would doubtless contribute a great deal toward making our American New Year's Eve celebration less like a pagan orgy. Why men and women who, at least in public, behave decorously for 364 days a year, should think that the night of the 365th day can be fittingly observed only by parading the streets and insulting inoffensive citizens, or by entering restaurants to share in drunken and indecent revels—that is one of the problems that must grieve and perplex the angels themselves.

Last year, in our issue of December 21, attention was called in an editorial on this same subject, to the efforts some Catholic pastors have been making to induce their flocks to observe New Year's Eve as Christians should. One bishop, after holding an appropriate church service, invited the men who had attended it to a pleasant social gathering in the parish hall. That is the right idea. Pastors should arrange a New Year's Eve program that will attract not only the men of the parish, but the women, too, and the young people most of all. The Te Deum and Miserere, a short but appropriate discourse, and Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament could be followed by an innocent merry-making of some kind that would keep Catholics off the streets and out of the restaurants on New Year's Eve.

The Right View

The New York Times very properly called a certain Presbyterian minister to task for showing displeasure at the President's action in being present at the Catholic Thanksgiving celebration in Washington, among the members of the Pan-American Union. Another Presbyterian divine, Dr. James M. Ludlow, of East Orange, N. J., fully acquiesces in the editorial utterances of the Times, and declares that the attitude of his brother minister is not at all in keeping with the spirit of Presbyterianism. "The peculiar circumstances of his appearance in the Roman Catholic church at Washington," he adds, "put upon President Wilson almost an obligation of courtesy to do as he did. The representatives of Pan-Americanism—chiefly from Roman Catholic countries—were the guests of our nation. They honored our peculiar American Thanksgiving custom by observing the day with religious service. Nothing could have been more gracious than for our President to join them in their worship."

This is the proper view of the case. The President's attendance was a simple act of courtesy, and not a repudiation of his own belief or practice; nor can any sensible person imagine for a moment that it was an attempt on the part of Catholics to make their celebration of Thanksgiving a quasi-Government function.

Mrs. Shorter, writing in the London Daily Chronicle on the movement against indecencies of the stage, remarks on the insincerity, or else the folly of those who are always harping on "our daughters" in the matter. She points out very appositely that the danger for "our daughters" is insignificant in comparison with the danger for "our sons." "It is," she says, "for our sons, for their allurements—that is, commercially speaking, for their money, and, spiritually speaking, for their destruction—that these shows are produced." No truer word has been spoken. If the agitators are not insincere, at least the spirit of the world that infects them is such. It assumes tacitly that our young men must necessarily tread the "primrose path to the everlasting bonfire." It is the spirit of the Prince of this world, "a liar" and "a murderer from the beginning."

As December 25 draws near shopkeepers are making the usual display of so-called "Christmas" cards which have nothing about them to indicate the sacred character of the festival they seem to commemorate. Just as Easter is becoming, except in the Catholic Church, merely the feast of returning spring and has no religious significance whatever, unbelievers are trying to make Christmas "The Feast of St. Friend," as one of their writers puts it. Catholics who have Christmas cards to buy can do a great deal to counteract this pagan tendency, if they will avoid purchasing any card, however artistic it may be, of which the design and inscription have nothing about them to show that the peace and good will which pervade the world at Christmas are due to the fact that that day is the anniversary of Our Saviour's birth.

A new arrangement of the forty-eight stars in the American flag has been accepted by the War Department. The design is somewhat on the order of the Union Jack, and is so placed as to give more room in the blue field for the additional States that have come into the Union.

In the centre is a huge five-pointed star composed of thirteen stars, representing the thirteen original States. About this design is a circle of stars representing the other thirty-five States. A miniature flag with the new star arrangement has been presented to President Wilson by Wayne Whipple, of Washington, for his approval.

LITERATURE

The Old Spanish Missions of California. By PAUL ELDER. San Francisco: Paul Elder and Company. $3.50.

The interest that the ruined missions awaken in all who visit California is most noteworthy. Through them the old Franciscan friars, though dead, speak to tens of thousands who otherwise never come under Catholic influences. Bayard Taylor, Bret Harte, and many others of less fame whose names are to be found in Mr. Elder's volume, felt their spell. If at times they were over-romantic in their utterances about vesper-bells and censers, which seem to appeal to the non-Catholic imagination; if Bayard Taylor speaks of "nocturnes merging into matins"; if all take for granted that the zealous sons of St. Francis were missionaries by day and Carthusians by night, and that two or three of them stationed at a mission were sufficient to sustain the full burden of a monastic choir; it is not for us to find fault, where there is so much evidence of good will. The fact is that no one can enter these deserted places without hearing in his soul the testimony they bear to lives loftier in aim and nobler in execution, than the life which extinguished them, than the life of California to-day. Let us hope that many who thus hear again in the western world the words spoken centuries ago by the Jordan: "There stands one in the midst of you whom ye know not," may be led to open their eyes to the Catholic Church to which, eloquent in their silence, the old missions bear witness.

Mr. Elder has evidently studied his matter carefully. He knows, for instance, the difference between a mission, a pueblo, and a presidio, and the churches, or chapels connected with them. His tone is entirely sympathetic; and if he quotes a somewhat unpleasant remark of Mr. Wharton James concerning the Indians of San Luis Rey and prayers to the saints, we are sure he does so in all simplicity, and that Mr. James's breach of decorum is to be attributed to his ignorance.

The volume is a very handsome quarto, printed on grey paper, handsomely bound in boards and buckram and finely illustrated. It is in every way an artistic work and reflects great credit on its publishers.

H. W.

Italian Yesterdays. By Mrs. HUGH FRAZER. New York: Dodd Mead Company. 2 Vols. $6.00 net.

The somewhat puzzling title which the distinguished author of this new book has adopted comprises not merely the yesterdays of last week or last month, but extends to the yesterdays of years and of centuries. Events that she has read of, places she has visited, personages who have ruled or ruined the various peoples or principalities or races of the beautiful Peninsula are made to pass before the reader not so much for themselves as for the fact that they afford an opportunity to describe for us the splendors of the land and sky and sea of the country in which she has so long lived and of which she is passionately fond.

Indeed it would be hard to find her equal in this particular style of writing. It is her work of predilection and the opening chapter of these Yesterdays is one of special brilliancy even for her gifted pen, but it must be confessed that she does not invest her historical characters or historical events with the same charm, nor inspire her readers with the same sense of security that they really are as they are described. In brief we would not be tempted to refer back to these stories as historical documents. Nor apparently is such her intention. She merely chooses them as so many shattered monuments of the past and covers them again with some of the glory which shone upon them when they attracted the gaze of the world. The publishers deserve great credit for their beautiful press work. C.

The Story of St. Elizabeth of Hungary. By WILLIAM CANTON. Illustrated by ELEANOR FORTESCUE BRICKDALE. Boston: Dana Estes & Co. $1.50.

Though the author of this book admires the "Poor Men of Lyons" and considers the "regularized asceticism" into which the idea of St. Francis of Assisi developed, to be the destruction of "perhaps the most noble of the large spiritual movements in the history of the Church," nevertheless he has followed Montalembert so closely and writes so intelligently and sympathetically withal, about the "dear St. Elizabeth" that Catholic readers will often think that one of their own faith is relating the story, while Eleanor Fortescue Brickdale's eight illustrations in color are admirably conceived and executed. The "hasty flippancy" with which Carlyle in his "Frederick the Great" summarized the life of St. Elizabeth Mr. Canton thinks "true Thomas" would never have been guilty of, had he "been concerned to know more about her."

Sweet-Scented Leaves, and Other Stories of Conduct and Character. By VIOLET BULLOCK-WEBSTER (Mrs. ARMEL O'CONNOR). With a Foreword by LLEWELYN BULLOCK-WEBSTER. Ludlow, England: Mary's Meadow. 51.

"Beautiful plant! possessing that quality which of all others I most admire: the worse you are treated the sweeter you become. What a lesson that teaches! If only one could imitate so lovely an example!" That is what a sweet-scented geranium taught Miss Devereux, the central figure in the first story in this volume. More than a year ago we praised in these columns the author's earlier book "The Idea of Mary's Meadow," and her gift of delicately blending piety and humor. She has now gathered together fifteen tales treating for the most part of the little joys and sorrows of the Catholic poor. Stories so true to life and so sympathetically written as the one giving the book its title, "John and Sally," "My Beggar Lover," "Little Boss-Eye" and "The Way It Was Done," indicate that the author loves and understands the poor and suffering. Those who would like to see the picture of "Violet" have only to turn to the frontispiece.

Vincent de Paul, Priest and Philanthropist. By E. K. SANDERS. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $4.00 net.

As the title of the book intimates, Vincent de Paul as a Saint is not considered. Indeed he is not once spoken of as such from the beginning to the end of the book. The last word on the last page is like the title, plain "Vincent de Paul." Nor indeed is there any real study of him as a priest, only in so far as he exercised the corporal works of mercy in a way that gave him such a distinguished place in history. Hence the "Life" is for sociologists rather than for the students of the spiritual life. Nevertheless it is extremely interesting as a contribution to history. It covers the whole field of his enterprises, the establishment of the Lazarists, the foundation of the Congregation of Sisters of Charity, with their associated lady helpers, the inauguration of the work in "the Galleys," the foreign missions, etc., all of which were necessitated by the appalling poverty and irreligion which resulted from the constant wars that devastated the country. Vincent, simple, poor, not gifted intellectually to any remarkable degree, nor endowed with great learning, was nevertheless one of the great personages of the period in which he lived. The style of the writer is virile and the interest in the narrative is maintained to the end, but as has been already said it is not a book, nor was it intended to be such, available for what Catholics call "spiritual reading." Not a word is said of Vincent's canonization as a saint.

A reviewer in the London Times is moved to say that the "Life" shows us the Saint "as an abnormal moral genius, a wrong thinker who solved life's problem because he unknowingly transcended his own shortsighted notion of personal salvation, and forgot his safety in the good of others"—a view which goes to show what insufferable nonsense finds its way into print, even in such publications as the London Times. St. Vincent was not "a genius"; he was certainly not a "moral genius"—if indeed there could be any such thing,—he was not "abnormal"; he did not "forget his own personal ambition in the salvation of others," he was simply a devoted priest who faithfully performed the work that God had set for him, seeking first of all his own salvation, and obtaining it by a life-long devotion to the relief of the temporal and, above all, of the spiritual wants of his neighbors. But viewing him solely as a philanthropist gives only an incomplete understanding of the great man's personality. It has evidently upset such readers as the critics of the Times. C.

Unsere Liebe Frau. Ihr tugendliches Leben und Sterben. Von MORITZ MESCHLER, S.J. St. Louis: B. Herder. Ninety cents.

This is a splendid holiday book and its price is easily within the reach of all. It is the last work of Father Meschler, beautifully illustrated with nineteen full-page pictures by Johann von Schraudolph. With a book devoted to the praise of Our Lady the author began his literary career and with the Life of Our Lady he closed it. In his last work, written when he had already passed his eightieth year, we miss nothing of his wonted charm. There is a winsomeness and delicate beauty of style, an alertness and human interest, a delight in color and line and in all that can enhance the preciousness and glory of his subject, which speak of a heart that always remained young. He was a chosen minnesinger of Our Lady and it was fitting that his swan song should likewise be of her.

"An ancient man," he writes in his short preface, "who looks back upon more than eighty years of life, attempts to intone the song of our dear Lady. Trembling hands and lips—what can they still accomplish? But the song pours forth from a youthful heart, from the consciousness of the great happiness and honor of standing enlisted under the banner of Mary. Much has the old man seen, and wide was his experience. One thing he has learned, that there is nothing greater and more beautiful than Mary, that there is no higher honor than to be called, and in reality to be, her servant."

Art, poetry and devotion are combined in the present work, which is more than a mere holiday present. We would like to see it not only in the hands of our sodalists but of the faithful in general. It will teach a love of beauty and of purity together with a mastery of style. J. H.

The Life of Mother Mary of Jesus, Emilia D'Oultremont Baroness D'Hooghvorst, 1818-1878. By PETER SUAU, S.J. English Version by Rev. DAVID GALLERY, S.J. New York: Benziger Bros. $2.20.

We are glad to see an English version of Father Suau's excellent "Life of Mother Mary of Jesus," the saintly foundress of the Society of Marie Réparatrice, an order whose apostolic work has been for a generation or two so favorably known in Europe and in recent years no less favorably in America, for there is a community of these nuns at St. Leo's, East 28th street, New York. The career of this remarkable woman cannot fail to interest the reader, especially on account of the circumstances connected with the founding of her institute. That a woman of noble extraction and living in affluence should enter religion, or even found a religious order, is not a matter of surprise to readers of ecclesiastical history, but the story of the foundation of the "Réparatrice" reveals a type of woman in the foundress which is rarely met with. When engaged in starting her first community she was the widowed mother of several children, who, although far past infancy, stood in need of her maternal care. She was consequently obliged to divide her time and attention between the interests of her family and those of her institute; so much so that she was compelled to live alternately with her natural offspring in the world and those whom she had begotten in the spirit in religion. Naturally enough, opposition was excited, and for a long time Reverend Mother Baroness D'Hooghvorst was an object of ridicule; but sustained by her undaunted spirit, by her conviction that she was doing the will of Heaven, for she had had many remarkable supernatural visitations, and withal by the approbation of wise and experienced directors, she persevered till her efforts were crowned with success and all opposition vanquished:

The distinctive object of the Society of Marie Réparatrice is, as the name indicates, reparation for the sins of the world in union with the spirit of reparation which must be preëminent in our Blessed Lady. Expression is given to this desire for reparation in daily and nightly adoration of the Blessed Sacrament and in efforts made to extend the kingdom of God, especially through the medium of spiritual retreats given to persons in the world. Those who have been made acquainted with the work and the personnel of the "Réparatrice," either in America or in Europe, have had abundant evidence that the spirit of Mother Mary of Jesus still lives in her daughters.

The Quest of the Ideal. By GRACE RHYS.

Childhood. By ALICE MEYNELL. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. 75 cents.

These are two of the "Fellowship Books," a series with a single essay in each volume. Of the two authors here represented, Catholics will naturally find Mrs. Meynell more to their taste than Mrs. Rhys. For the latter is an Evolutionist who traces the earliest quests of the ideal back to the romantic dreams of pterodactyls and brontosauri, and she seems to think the best basis for the ideal to be a thorough knowledge of the evil in the world. She writes quite forcibly, however, and there are occasional flashes of true insight from her pages as when she exclaims, for example: "The lovers of the concrete, the worshippers of the material for its own sake, the masters and mistresses of the art of grab, how they get on! Well, let them! Why should you, oh good man! oh good woman! covet their festering rubbish heaps? Do you know the venom generated by a great pile of ill-gotten fermenting money?"

As the author of "Childhood" besides being a poet and critic has brought up a family of boys and girls, her essay is written with as much literary grace as motherly discernment. She has studied the ways of children well and has gained a remarkable knowledge of their mental attitude toward shoes and ships and sealing-wax, to say nothing of cabbages and kings. That children "love their ugly and old toys best," that they like stories with a moral, that they do not care much for books that are written down to them, that they do not really believe in fairies at all, that they marvel at "hillsides in wild flower, calm summer seas, and those aspects and phases of nature to which Tennyson gave his perfect word in return for a perfect emotion," that their sense of justice is very keen, that their idea of humor is not at all that of their elders, that their eyes are bent on the earth not lifted to the stars, that they find the long days of childhood very tiresome—these are some of the conclusions to which Mrs. Meynell's observations have brought her. It is not of English children only that she writes. She calls attention also to the amiable characteristics of Italian, French and American boys and girls. To the latter she pays this tribute: "What I saw of American children was quite different from what is thought to be true of them by English people at home. They were very, and very unexpectedly, childlike, there seemed to be some resolve to keep them so in their language; a child was not to say that the faces in a picture were 'sad' but only that they 'looked sorry.' The children, however, were one and all trained to be sweetly courteous; it was not held that roughness was childlike. They had lovely considerate ways, and were readily affectionate." The "Fellowship Books" are neatly bound in blue, the type, paper and title pages leave nothing to be desired and Mrs. Meynell's essay in particular, mothers will like as a Christmas gift. W. D.

The Epistle to the Ephesians. An Encyclical of St. Paul Translated from a Revised Greek Text and Explained for English Readers. By the Rev. GEORGE S. HITCHCOCK, D.D. New York: Benziger Bros. $2.50.

Dr. Hitchcock has already published two volumes on Isaiah and two on sermon writing and delivery. He now enters the field of New Testament exegesis. The plan is markedly individual. After an introduction on the interest in character, chronology, textual criticism of the Epistle, there follows a commentary of more than four hundred and fifty pages on this short letter of the Apostle. The division of the chapters is retained as the analysis of the thought. This makes the reading of the book useful for comparison with other editions of the text or versions thereof, but is not as clear a setting of the Apostle's thought as an analysis that disregards the division into chapters. The introductory notes are excellent and give a vast deal of information collateral to a right understanding of St. Paul. The chronology is especially good; although it puts Galatians before the Apostolic Council of Jerusalem without saying that Catholic scholars generally assign a later date. In the clear and easy flowing section on textual criticism we find no mention of von Soden's theory and text; the latter has only just appeared, but the former has been long current.

The commentary is as the editor describes it: "In writing this commentary, I have tried to save the reader trouble. This is my excuse for repeating dates and other notes." He aims at literalness despite the uncouthness of the result. Taking it that St. Paul, a Semite, invariably wrote in parallelism, Dr. Hitchcock crushes the thoughts to get them into the proper mould. This is a gratuitous plan. The modern Semites use parallelism; but neither they nor any other Semites show such artificiality as to be incapable of saying anything otherwise than in this balanced form. Many will find the omission of footnotes a convenience; and will enjoy reading the text and commentary through from start to finish without a doubt as to the date and meaning of A. B. C. D., etc. Scholars are likely to desiderate the customary compact footnotes and succinct manuscript nomenclature; and to find themselves bewildered by the absence of such usual critical paraphernalia.

Dr. Hitchcock's explanation of the Ascension of our Lord is misleading. "When a cloud received Him from their sight forty days later, Acts I, 9, He did not pass beyond the stars. He passed into an invisible order." (p. 115). If He "did not pass beyond the stars," then His glorified Body is still this side of the stars; It is still in visible space, not only sacramentally but also non-sacramentally; It is not beyond the utmost bound of real space. How then is He in heaven? Does Dr. Hitchcock mean that heaven is this side of the stars? Does one go to heaven merely by becoming invisible? Certainly not. Jesus not merely became invisible but also ascended into heaven. Dr. Hitchcock seems to say He did not ascend but only disappeared. Of course, this seeming meaning is not intended by the doctor, as it would be heresy.

WALTER DRUM, S.J.

As few Christmas presents are better than a good book, readers of AMERICA before doing their gift-buying will wisely call to mind some of the works we have commended in our literary department during the past year. Besides those favorably noticed in our present issue we have praised books like the following: Mgr. Benson's "An Average Man," "Come Rack! Come Rope!" "Confessions of a Convert," and "Paradoxes of Catholicism"; John Ayscough's "Gracechurch" and "Levia Pondera"; René Bazin's "The Marriage of Mademoiselle Gimel"; Percy Fitzgerald's "Worldlyman"; Mrs. de la Pasture's "Michael"; Pierre L'Ermite's "The Mighty Friend"; Father Coloma's "The Story of Don John of Austria"; Sœur Thérèse, the Little Flower of Jesus, the "Poems" of Alice Meynell and of Francis Thompson, the biography of Lacordaire by D'Haussonville; of J. H. Pollen, by his daughter; of Henry Livingston Richards, by his son; Father Grisar's "Luther"; memoirs of Father Galloway, Father Chase and Baron de Neuville; Von Reville's "Study of Catholicism"; new volumes of the "Iona Series" and the "Notre Dame series of Saints' Lives"; other good books like W. M. Letts' "Songs from Leinster" and John La Farge's "The Gospel Story in Art" which we have not yet had time to review; excellent books by Mgr. Benson, Fathers Finn, Copus, Spalding, Earls, and Grace Keon for Catholic children; and these works which we recommended last year to Christmas shoppers: Mr. Ward's "Newman"; John Ayscough's "Faustula"; Mrs. Fraser's "Reminiscences of a Diplomatist's Wife"; Miss Repplier's "Americans and Others"; Father Garrold's "Black Brotherhood"; Mr. Maurice Francis Egan's "Everybody's St. Francis"; Violet O'Connor's "The Idea of Mary's Meadow"; René Bazin's "The Children of Alsace"; T. A. Daly's "Madrigali"; Father Vassall-Phillip's "The Mustard Tree"; Mgr. Benson's "Christ in the Church"; Father Kane's "God or Chaos"; Miss Brégy's "The Poets' Chantry"; Father Stewart's "The Greater Eve"; Kathleen Norris' "Mother" and many other recent works by Catholic authors.

"The Bible Story and Its Teaching for Children" the richly illustrated book which Baroness Freda de Knoop has prepared and E. P. Dutton & Co. publish is not a suitable present for Catholic boys and girls, because it is about the Protestant Bible that the author writes. Though her chapters on the New Testament show that the Baroness believes Our Lord to be divine, her Old Testament stories indicate that she has gone to the destructive critics for guidance. The children are told, for example, that "Let us make man, etc.," is only "the plural of majesty," that the "rib origin" of Eve is merely "a beautiful allegory of the essential oneness of woman and man," and that the account of the Fall is, "like the rest of the Creation narratives, to be taken symbolically, not literally." Thus the so-called "higher criticism" is invading even the nursery.

"The Unworthy Pact" by Dorothea Gerard is the story of a young Catholic who after being left a fine estate discovers a will that disinherits him because he is a "Papist." He is so fond of his newly acquired property that to keep it he is ready to renounce his Faith. But just as he has been brought to a better mind and is about to relinquish his claim, a later will, free from all conditions, is found. There are well drawn characters in the novel, some good polemics are adroitly brought in and Adrian's struggle is described in an interesting way. (Benziger Bros. $1.25).

With such characters as a malignant pursuivant who calls out at unseasonable hours, "Open in the Queen's name"; a newly ordained priest who says Mass in secret; a conforming knight who persecutes the "recusants"; a loyal servant or two who repeatedly save the situation; and several heroic women who make suitable speeches when the occasion requires; with such "properties" as a country house, priests' hiding places, the rack and the prison; with a plentiful sprinkling of phrases like "methinks," "an it please," "what means it," "God save you," "it be so fair without," etc., a readable Catholic novel of Elizabethan days can be constructed. This is what Mary Agatha Grey has done in "The Towers of St. Nicholas." (Kenedy, 75 cents). It is too bad Cedric had to be such a bloodthirsty father, but no doubt it could not be helped.

The December Atlantic opens with a paper by Mr. W. L. George "a prominent spokesman of the Feminist movement in England," who was invited "to state quite clearly the terms upon which leaders of his party will be willing to negotiate a lasting peace." "Generally," he says, "the Feminists are in opposition to most of the world institutions." They "have designs," particularly, "upon the most fundamental of human institutions, marriage and motherhood." They are not merely "opposed to indissoluble Christian marriage," but in the opinion of their protagonist, "the ultimate aim of Feminism with regard to marriage is the practical suppression of marriage and the institution of free alliance" and he bids his readers look forward with composure to a "state of society where man will not figure in the life of woman except as the father of her child." From these choice specimens of the "reforms" triumphant Feminism would bring about in the world it is easy to understand the lack of enthusiasm shown for "the cause," by all who consider themselves heirs to twenty centuries of Christian morality.

If those who paid $9.00 last year for Wilfrid Ward's "Life of John Henry Cardinal Newman" had only waited they could get the work now for just half that price, as Longmans, Green & Co. have recently published a third impression of the two volumes, omitting all but one of the portraits that were in the former editions. In a newly discovered letter that is printed in the preface of this edition Newman says of William George Ward, the author's father, "as he had in so many words or their equivalents, called me a material heretic, I called him a doctrinal Novatian." That the whirligig of time should make the "Novatian's" son the writer of the "heretic's" biography is one of life's ironies.

Those who would like to have in prose a good digest of "all the world's great epics" will find H. A. Guerber's "The Book of the Epic," an entertaining volume. The famous Greek, Latin, French, Spanish, Italian, German and English poems of heroes are well summarized by books or cantos, and less known epics in other tongues are not omitted. In these days when so many are content to read about masterpieces rather than the masterpieces themselves, there is a demand for books of this kind, and in cases where the original poems or close translations of them would be unsuitable for young readers, a volume like Mr. Guerber's is very useful. All except one of the illustrations are unobjectionable and that can be easily removed. (J. B. Lippincott Co., $2.00).

No reader of the London Times omits the personal column if he have any sense of humor. There one meets from time to time the gentleman in misfortune who would like somebody to set him up in business again with a thousand pounds, the young man zealous for self-culture, who wants a kind person to send him traveling round the world for two years, the person who would experience the sensation of being rich, and hopes to find one to gratify his desire for a year, the still more audacious university man who seeks a wealthy eccentric who will adopt him for good and all. A late number contains the advertisement of an elderly lady, an invalid, for a companion who can tell good ghost stories.

London is a great city, and must contain not a few very strange people, poor and rich. Moreover, the Times is read all over the British world. Nevertheless, though the elderly lady was listening, no doubt, to the good ghost stories within a reasonable number of hours, we ask ourselves somewhat incredulously, has the gentleman ever got the thousand pounds; or the young man gone on his travels; or the person in search of experience, ever played the part of Christopher Sly; or the university man, found a father or mother by adoption? Are there really people sufficiently hopeful of getting such things as to pay the price of an advertisement in the Times? It is a curious world. But perhaps these advertisements are cryptograms, to be understood by only one reader. Anyhow, a story-teller might find in them the foundation of many a joyous tale.

In a review of "My Cosmopolitan Year," a recent book by an anonymous writer, the London Times Literary Supplement observes:

"He [the author] is particularly eloquent on the subject of the American magazine habit. It is a habit, he assures us, arising out of the principle that 'time is money.' Time, like money, should not be expended without calculation, and therefore in the magazine the rushed business man, and the equally rushed business or society women, has a literary quick lunch that can be swallowed in convenient bites at odd moments during the day.' They—or at all events the women—speak, we believe, of that kind of desultory reading as 'research'; and to quote our author, 'They hoodwink one another, each practising the same deceptive game of superficial show, yet never suspecting any of the rest.'"

We can always profit by seeing ourselves as others see us. To realize how widespread this "magazine habit" is in this country one has but to notice what a vast quantity of trash is displayed and sold daily by the news-stands.

We read that a number of Oxford professors led by the Poet Laureate have formed a league to preserve the English language against degradation. They are going to open the war with an onslaught on all that say "naychur" instead of—we are not told what. "Naychur" may be a degraded pronunciation, though there is room for two opinions on the subject. But, however that may be, the preservers are beginning at the wrong end. There are many clear vulgarisms to the correction of which they might devote their energy before attacking "naychur."

MUSIC

Liturgical Congregational Singing

November, the twenty-second, of this year marked the tenth anniversary of the promulgation of the "Motu Proprio" on Church music by Pope Pius X. The special, if not primary object determined by the Holy Father in this decree was the restoration of the Chant "to the use of the people so that they may take a more active part in the services, as they did in former times." Without doubt, this celebrated document has had notable effect upon the musical world of Catholic America, through the individual efforts of some few who have followed faithfully the instructions enjoined by the Supreme Pontiff.

That the readers of AMERICA and especially those who have at heart the success of Church music reform may obtain a knowledge of the work that is being done along this line, the writer has prepared this account of the Thanksgiving Day celebration in St. Paul's Cathedral, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania.

The celebration which marked the fifth one of its kind in the diocese of Pittsburgh was significant in purpose and successful in result. Eleven hundred children representing eight parochial schools of the diocese assembled in the Cathedral to sing the Ordinary of the Mass in honor of St. Cecilia. Three-quarters of an hour before the Mass the long procession of children entered the church. They came in groups of hundreds from all parts of the city, young Crusaders, rallying to adore, give praise and thanks to God in "the chant proper to the Roman Church." And the manner of their singing en masse was inspiring to the three thousand worshippers who filled the church. As the preacher of the day, Bishop Regis Canevin, eloquently expressed in his sermon: "they caught up, repeated and echoed the music, the melody of the plain chant as sung in the Church almost nineteen hundred years ago." The refinement of exaltation, the purity and tone of their soprano voices were finely contrasted with the full, deep-toned singing of the men's choir and gave variety to the programme which was as follows: Hymn, "To Jesus' Heart All Burning," by the Rev. Ludwig Bonvin, S.J., sung by the children's chorus. Introit, Gradual and Communion, Gregorian Chant, sung by a choir of men in the loft. The Kyrie, Gloria, Sanctus, Benedictus and Agnus Dei from the Eleventh Mass, "In Dominicis infra annum" (Orbis Factor), of the Vatican edition of the "Kyriale" were sung alternately by the children's choir and one hundred cantores chosen from different schools. The First Gregorian Credo was sung alternately by the men in the choir loft and the chorus of children. After the recitation of the proper Offertory text, the choir of men sang a capella, "Tibi Laus" by Orlandus Lassus. After the Mass the children sang the "International Eucharistic Hymn" by Felix Nowowiejski as sung for the first time at the Eucharistic Congress in Madrid, Spain, in 1911.

The manner in which both choirs acquitted themselves in this liturgical function was a triumph for the "supreme model of sacred music," the Gregorian Chant. The spontaneous attack of the children's choir at the beginning of each phrase, their fluent, rhythmical interpretation of every number adequately conveyed the deep spiritual content of the Chant. As already noted the singing of the children was in fine contrast with the deep, vigorous tone of the men and this feature was specially marked in the Gradual and Offertory. In the former number the men seemed to realize the true expressive joy of liturgical worship, "Benedictus es Domine, in firmamento coeli, et laudabilis in saecula. Alleluia, Alleluia," voicing their praise to God in a brilliant manner and producing a sublime effect upon the congregation. And this praise to God was all the more strikingly conveyed in their a capella singing of the Offertory, "Tibi Laus," a polyphonic composition of the sixteenth century by Orlandus Lassus. One witnessing this imposing spectacle of eleven hundred children and hearing the tremendous volume of their melodious praise could not fail to realize without emotion that the holy Mass was a "sacrificium laudis."

The training and direction of such a large chorus for the celebration no doubt will interest those in charge of choir organizations and the training of the people in liturgical singing. To such minds the practical aspect of the Pittsburgh celebration will suggest itself. How was this celebration and the similar one of the past five years planned and worked out? The simple and practical method adopted for the training of the children was as follows:

1—At the beginning of the school year the Superintendent of the diocesan schools announced the date for the school Sisters to assemble in the Cathedral school for the study of the Gregorian Mass and hymn to be sung at the Thanksgiving celebration.

2—Between sixty and seventy religious representing eight different communities responded and attended regularly the weekly classes for the study of the Gregorian Chant. From their own singing of the Mass, as the rehearsals progressed, they built up in their imaginations an ideal performance and afterwards endeavored to impart this ideal to the children under their charge.

3—As soon as the various school groups began the study of the Mass the choirmaster of the Cathedral visited each in turn every week until the performance took place in order to secure uniformity of delivery without a joint rehearsal.

A fact not to be overlooked was the generous and spontaneous co-operation on the part of all participants, a co-operation which made possible the choral celebration and the weekly parochial rehearsals necessary for it. In less than two months the greater number of the children were able to sing the Ordinary of the Mass from memory. All the children who studied the Mass did not participate in the celebration for the obvious reason that the Cathedral could not seat their number. But this obstacle may easily be overcome next year by having all the schools represented with a smaller number of children from each school. The significance of these yearly celebrations and the results obtained from them are noteworthy.

First, the children have acquired during the past five years a repertory of the following Gregorian Masses; Number two, "In Festis Solemnibus"; Number four, "In Festis Duplicibus"; Number eight, "In Festis Duplicibus" (Missa de Angelis); Number nine, "In Festis B. Mariae Virginis" (cum júbilo); Number eleven, "In Dominicis infra annum" (Orbis Factor).

Secondly, the children sing these Masses in their respective parish churches on the Sundays throughout the year and thus have the joy of singing to God instead of listening to a choral exhibition.

Thirdly, in many of the schools the teaching of Gregorian music is made part of the curriculum so that by earnest, respectful and systematic study the laity will eventually be trained to sing the entire Ordinary of the Mass. Six or seven years from now the older children in the schools will be the men and women of the parish. They will not forget the Gregorian Masses studied in school. When they hear the old melodies of the Chant sung in church, they too will join in rendering praise to their Eucharistic God and thus take the legitimate place which Catholic laity formerly enjoyed in the sacred song of the Church. The dissemination of right principles and methods for singing the Chant in the schools has already brought about a marked improvement in the music of many churches, a result which argues well for the future.

EDUCATION

Vocational Schools—Jesuit Ideals in Education

Wise and patriotic educators in this country, facing as they do the sharp, positive disagreements in educational methods that prevail, and the almost chaotic condition of educated opinion, recognize that a mighty task is laid upon them. To provide opportunity for the growth of men of letters, for critics and for lovers of life in its richest and most serene aspects, to defend this country against the accusation of universal materialism,—this is their task. And opposed to them is the onrush of the unintelligent, or at least of the unreflecting multitude who forget that "the end of education is the development of intelligence." Too often to-day one hears it said that educational training should have a practical purpose. Too often, because, while the phrase sounds reasonable enough, when we inquire what is meant by practical, we usually find that practical means money-getting. We are told that learning is only valuable if it helps a man in the struggle for life. What manner of help is usually signified is understood from the characterization recently given to the "uselessness" of a college education by a well-known Chicago merchant. Speaking of a young friend who had not "made good" in a business sense, he declared: "The poor fellow had gone through college with no specific end in view,"—that is no money-making avocation,—and had come out of it as unfit to meet the world as the day he entered it." And strong in the "righteous" indignation he felt, the Chicago merchant affirmed his wish to enter his protest "against the aimlessness of an untechnical college course."

To such a man it avails little to insist upon the fact, which daily experience confirms, that the educational course he would favor necessarily denies the aim of true intellectual training; that young men who begin specialization, in order to fit themselves the better to make a living, during the high school years, or immediately at the close of them, are liable to be narrow, and are not only unable to take the place which is accorded by society only to well-rounded men, but they actually cannot attain the highest places in their chosen walks in life. The class of men, of which our Chicago merchant is a bright example, is well-described by Dr. West, of Princeton, in his splendid paper on Vocational Training: "Some of them are superficially versed in a number of things somewhat badly understood, some of them are sharply clear in a narrow way—precise to the dot in little things and helpless in all else; some only vaguely aware or wholly unaware of the relative importance of different topics, and usually lacking in steady, sensible judgment." Such minds are not big and broad. Mentally their light is darkness, they see only one phase of the world's bivouac of life. Material success in life is their one standard and immersed in its narrowness they simply will not and cannot understand the wisdom of the policy that upholds the scholarly courses ever in high repute among genuine educators.

The defender of the technical and practical in educational training as opposed to the untechnical and cultural cannot evaluate the wisdom of the formative processes which teach the studious college man to find entertainment on every hand, to have placed upon his shelves the masterpieces of literature, and to have extracted joy from his own thoughts. The man who measures education by its results in the capacity to make a living cannot appreciate that the personality acquired by the studious college man is of far more use to him in "living"; than a technical training would prove in helping him "to make a living"; that the drill given to the latter's mind enables him to adjust himself to all circumstances, and does not hold him bound to the narrow groove in which the vocationalist must specialize. Nor should it be forgotten that a large part of the work done in the world is not taught in technical colleges, but must be taken up by persons of ability and executive force. For these a general, all around education is an imperative need, since it alone can awake in their minds a knowledge of values which is worth more than training in any one trade or profession possibly could be. Men who have been blessed with such a training are prepared to face life, no matter what visage she may turn to them.

Probably a practical illustration of the confusion begotten where vocational education is "working to a logical conclusion," may help to the understanding of the reactionary spirit that is coming to be daily more in evidence against the intemperateness of the extreme partisans of vocationalism in education. Los Angeles, so we are informed by a letter to the Nation, which appears in its issue of Nov. 27, has fairly won a record in vocationalism. "So extensive have the operations of a modern school system become, that at the opening of the current year the Board of Education found itself one-half million dollars short." Americans, to be sure, are not prone to worry themselves over extravagant civil expenditures, provided they are able to show a worthy return for money spent. But the description of the school situation sketched by the writer of the Nation letter,—it is dated, by the way, from Stanford University, an institution which itself boasts no little share of advanced thought,—is hardly one to soothe the feelings of the thoughtful educator. "High schools," he tells us, "intermediate schools, and grammar schools, with grammar abolished and vocational training substituted, cover the city. Superintendents dash about town delivering strenuous addresses on industrialism. Classrooms are in a flutter of excitement over the daily prospect of 'Auditium' calls, where distinguished, self-made men tell children how to become educated without studying. The Los Angeles schools are an evolution. Year by year they have crowded out culture; first grammar from the grammar schools, then Latin from the Polytechnic High School, then prestige from the one academic High School."

The writer is sharp and bitter in his characterization of the results achieved. Whether he exaggerates one may not say; at least he is on the ground and whilst an honest indignation may arouse him to snappier utterance than the occasion demands, yet the student of the vocational developments among us has seen phases no whit less objectionable cropping out nearer home. "The pupils," the Stanford writer continues, "are noisy, 'happy' and empty. The teachers are compelled to take an informal oath to the vocational slogan of loyalty, efficiency, personality and power. Persons who show formal scholarship in their teaching are levelled or dismissed. . . . The Teachers' Institute meets at Christmastide to talk about social obligation and brotherly love and to sneer at intellectual effort and attainment. Meanwhile the products of the vocational movement are coming up to college . . . the victims of professionalism in education. College responsibility is great. In four years or more, students must be cured of twelve years of petting and sent forth equipped with a profession and with a decent sense of values."

At the half-yearly meeting of the London Catholic Truth Society, held in mid-November, his Eminence, Cardinal Bourne, who presided, made a felicitous reference to a letter which had appeared in the London Times of the very day of the meeting. The writer, A. Hilliard Atteridge, a name pleasantly recalled by every reader of AMERICA, addressed the Times to correct certain very misleading statements occurring in a letter over the name of a Mrs. Gibbon on "The Ideals of Loyola and Thring" which was published in the Educational Supplement of the Times of an earlier date. Mrs. Gibbon wrote:

"Very few people realize the extraordinary influence that the ideas and ideals of Loyola still possess over English education. The French seminary was the direct descendant of the colleges established by the Jesuit Order in the sixteenth century. Loyola with the instinct of genius, captured and systematized education at a time when it was in a state of intellectual chaos. He based it on ideals very foreign to our race. . . . Teuton civilization is founded on the dignity and sanctity of the family. . . . Loyola's ideals were sex separation and ascetic morality. The marvellous success he achieved has stifled the development of Teutonic nations on their own lines for centuries. The re-action is beginning. . . . Anglo-Saxon ideal has always been the making of a man. . . . The Jesuit aim and achievement was and is the mind without the man." Much in the same strain followed.

Mrs. Gibbon's views regarding Jesuit ideals in education drew from Mr. Atteridge this letter to the Editor of the Times:

"In your Educational Supplement there is a letter from Mrs. Gibbon under the heading, 'The Ideals of Loyola and Thring: Effects of the Conventual System,' in which the writer strangely misrepresents the Jesuit ideal in education, and shows that she cannot know much of the history of its evolution. In the first place, it is historically misleading to speak of the Jesuit system of education as if it were the direct creation of the founder of the Order. It grew up gradually, and the first code of legislation on the subject, the famous 'Ratio Studiorum,' was not drawn up until the generalship of Claudius Aquaviva (1581-1615). It was the work of a Commission, which included several men of northern birth, and was based largely on the methods then in use at the University of Paris, at Louvain, and in the schools of the Netherlands. It has been remodelled at various times, and a decree of the twenty-third General Congregation of the Society of Jesus (the legislative assembly of the Order) lays it down that non-classical schools are proper to the society as well as classical institutions, and only three years ago the present General of the Order declared that 'as the early Jesuits did not invent new methods of teaching, but adopted the best methods of their age, so will the Jesuits now use the best methods of the time.'

"So far from 'Loyola' having invented (as Mrs. Gibbon seems to think) the great boarding school college, all the colleges of the first centuries of the society were day schools. The pupils lived with their parents, or, if they came from a distance, approved lodgings were found for them. There were no educational fees, and the sons of rich and poor sat side by side on the benches. This was the original ideal. It had to be abandoned later because the competition of these free high schools called forth the fierce hostility of those with whom they competed. In modern times the lack of endowments has made the free system impossible.

"I remember hearing one of the most distinguished Jesuits I have ever met, the late Archbishop Porter, of Bombay, say: 'The great barrack school was not our original ideal. It was forced upon us by the barrack school becoming a fashion.' There are still many Jesuit Colleges which are day schools. I myself was educated at one of these, which, among other distinguished pupils, gave a Judge to the English Bench.

"Mrs. Gibbon is therefore, all unwittingly, misrepresenting plain facts when she writes that the object of the Jesuits was to 'isolate their pupils from family life.' She is equally wide of the mark when she says that 'the Jesuit aim and achievement was the mind without the man,' and her sneer at the 'emasculatation of the Jesuits' is in the worst of taste. To take one test only of the kind of men the Jesuit colleges produce, those in England have given a fair number of soldiers to the Empire, some of whom wear the V. C. in testimony of their manhood, and I remember how before the Republican Government of France suppressed the college of the Rue de Sèvres in Paris one of its halls was decorated with a series of memorial tablets that bore the names of more than 200 former pupils of the college who fell sword in hand on the battlefields of 1870 as officers of the Imperial Army and of the new levies raised by Gambetta."

SOCIOLOGY

Catholic Charity and Its Rivals

"I so fight, not as one beating the air," said St. Paul. Christianity, with its gaze fixed on Christ our Lord, had made of the spiritual athletic a perfect art. It is not an agreeable one; because it makes the chief adversary, not something vague and uncertain outside of us, but our own corrupt nature. But when it has been learned we know every trick and feint of the enemy, his weak points where every blow will tell, and so our fighting becomes effective achieving a perfect victory. This practicalness is characteristic of Christianity of which the object is, not to interest men, but to convert and reform them individually, and so to reform the whole world. Its rules are few and all can understand them, the sinner as well as the saint, the barbarous as well as the cultured. Were it not so, were Christianity an esoteric system like the so-called philosophies that would rival it, it could not be for all the world. Yet a Christianity that is not world wide in its mission would be an illusion, contradicting its very fundamental principle: "Teach all nations."

As in striving for personal sanctification the Christian wastes no energy in blows that do not tell, so also in working for social sanctification, he fights not as one beating the air. We were going to write "for social betterment"; but adverting to the fact that there can be no social betterment without social sanctification, and that social sanctification is the only social betterment, and remembering our own principle we have often insisted on, than no one can say anything worth while unless he uses specific, not general terms, we substituted "sanctification." There are so many now-a-days fighting against social imperfections, who waste their energies in beating the air. They imagine that they are going to abolish poverty, sickness, misery of every kind, ignoring the fact that to do so, they must first abolish sin. Legislation, constitutional reforms, for instance, will never bring about a just distribution of material goods—a just distribution does not mean an equal distribution—so long as selfishness exists in those who would have the redistribution of them, to vitiate the work. Until this world shall have been cleansed by the fires we are meditating on during this Advent season, and the new heavens and the new earth come forth to be the home of eternal justice, things will be much as they are. So it is better to teach people how to use their afflictions for their sanctification than to hold out to them vain hopes of the abrogation of the inevitable law of fallen mankind. Once this solid foundation is laid then let every Christian man and woman work according to the divine law of charity for that amelioration of social conditions which will facilitate the sanctification of the individual, and procure his eternal salvation, the only reason why this world exists with the individuals that are born into it.

Others fight the air because they base their social work on ridiculously false statistics of disease and its effects on men and women, which they accept blindly from utterly incompetent calculators. Others because they have a completely wrong idea of human nature. This they hold to be good, not merely essentially, but in its actual concrete existence, in its tendencies, in its actions, in its ideals, whereas the contrary is the case. Created by God good, both naturally and supernaturally, it has been corrupted by original sin, and its corruption is made worse by countless actual sins. Men and women are inclined to evil from the beginning of their days and the only correction of that evil is to be found in the Christian religion filled with restorative grace. Playgrounds and summer excursions are not going to save children; increased wages are not going to save girls. Were this so, we should find those who enjoy wealth and all the gratifications it procures, to be of stainless virtue: whereas, the very contrary is the case. They divide their time, too often, between the seeking of new gratifications, which are the more welcome as they are the more sensual and immoral, and the framing of sophistical apologies more loathsome, if possible, than the gratifications they are supposed to justify. Christian mortification is the only road to virtue.

It is pleasant to turn from such "beating the air" to the consideration of Catholic charity, which wastes no energy on theorizing, being content with the principles of the Gospel. A very interesting work that does not busy itself with charts or statistics, or social theories, but rests all its activity on Christianity, pure and simple, is the Christ-Child Society. It was founded about 1900, in Washington, by a lady who had the very elementary idea, to do something for the poor of Christ. From Washington it spread to other cities; and we have before us the report of the Chicago branch organized in 1907. From it we learn that the object of the Society is to provide clothing for the children of the poor, which comes to them as a gift from "The Christ-Child," thus "blessing him that gives and him that takes," by the supernatural atmosphere that raises giver and receiver alike to the things that are above. "The Christ-Child box" for a boy contains a good suit of clothes, a sweater, two suits of woolen underwear, two pairs of woolen stockings, a stout pair of shoes, a pair of mittens, a cap, a blouse, a toy and a little book, "The Story of Bethlehem." For a girl it contains an equally substantial outfit and The Story of the Christ-Child. Each box costs five dollars. The cheapness results from the buying from manufacturers and wholesale dealers at the close of the wholesale season broken lots and samples at a very low price; and, as regards the girls' boxes, from the fact that their contents are in great part the work of the members themselves. Gentlemen become associate members by paying five dollars a year. The regular members are ladies paying six dollars a year and meeting at stated times in their sewing circles. During the year ended March 1, 1913 the Society distributed 11,425 garments, clothing 734 children completely and 824 partially. It also provided 81 poor mothers with layettes and clothed 55 children under two years of age. Its membership has grown from 309 to 882 in the six years of its existence and its income from less than $1,100, to more than $4,100. The Security Audit Company, in auditing the treasurer's accounts remarks on the fact characteristic of all Catholic charities, that the expense of administration is only about 10 per cent. of the income, namely, $444.63. Of this $75 was paid to an Express Company for transportation of goods, $89.79 for postage, $187.84 for printing reports, for the necessary boxes and their wrappers, all items entering necessarily into the work, while for wages merely $75 was paid out. We have only one complaint to make: Why are not such branches multiplied a hundredfold? H. W.

Cancelled Stamps for Foreign Missions

Brother Justinian, C.S.C., Notre Dame, Ind., has charge of the scheme by which old stamps of every kind can be used in promoting the admirable missionary work of Mary Immaculate in China and India, where houses of refuge have been established for unfortunate children who would otherwise perish. All can contribute to it by sending old stamps. Every little helps.

In the Ave Maria of Nov. 29, is the following answer to the oft-repeated question, "In what way can old postage stamps possibly be used to promote the work of foreign missions?"

We answer that the innumerable cancelled stamps of all countries and denominations which for a long time past have been collected through the Ave Maria are forwarded yearly to the head office of the Work of Mary Immaculate in Paris, where, after being carefully sorted, they are utilized in various ways. The more valuable specimens are sold to collectors, and in some cases they command a high price. Common stamps are cut into tiny pieces, out of which are made plaques, trays, etc.; these are sold at bazaars and otherwise for the benefit of foreign missions. We have seen really artistic objects, the only ornamentation of which was formed of these seemingly useless bits of colored paper. Cancelled stamps are also used as borders for wall-paper and other decorative purposes. The postage stamps of some countries are beautiful pictures in miniature, fine specimens of engraving and coloring, and are valued as such by collectors.

"It will be seen that the millions of cancelled stamps collected every year must represent a considerable amount of money, and that the slight trouble and expense of saving them and sending collections to missionaries who can utilize them in any way is well worth while."

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

Fifty years ago the Xavier Alumni Sodality was founded by the late Rev. Louis Schneider, S.J. Its members commemorated the golden jubilee of its organization this week with a three days' festival. There was a Communion Mass last Sunday morning at St. Francis Xavier's Church and at the breakfast that followed it several addresses were made appropriate to the occasion. In the evening at the Solemn Vespers his Eminence Cardinal Farley presided and the sermon was preached by the Rev. Daniel Quinn, S.J. On Monday evening a civic meeting was held in the college theatre, the speakers at which were the Rev. Joseph W. Rockwell, S.J., moderator of the Sodality, F. S. Gannon, Jr., its president, Dr. James J. Walsh, Andrew J. Shipman, and Thomas Woodlock. A jubilee banquet, attended by a large number of the members, and many distinguished guests, was given at the Hotel Plaza on Tuesday evening. A souvenir medal of the jubilee has been struck, and Mr. Henry J. Sayers, one of the few survivors of the founders, and an early president is compiling a history of the Sodality to which will be added the details of the jubilee celebration.

To celebrate suitably its twenty-fifth birthday, the Sacred Heart Review of Boston undertook to raise the sum of $25,000 this year for the erection of an altar to the Sacred Heart in the new Basilica of the Holy Cross that is being built in Rome by the Holy Father. He thus marks the sixteenth centenary of the granting of civil and religious liberty to the Christian subjects of the Emperor Constantine. The gratifying announcement is made that the required sum is now completed. AMERICA unites its congratulations with those of all the friends of the Sacred Heart Review.

The will of the late Hon. John Sharples of Quebec leaves to religious and charitable institutions the sum of $125,000 divided as follows: To the Church and Catholic Cemetery at Sillery, each $10,000; to the Good Shepherd Asylum, $20,000; to the Hôtel Dieu of the Precious Blood, $30,000; to St. Bridget's Asylum, Sisters of Charity, $25,000; to the Jesuit Fathers, $10,000; to Jeffrey Hall, $10,000, and to the Salvation Army, $10,000. After providing for relatives and friends one-half of the remainder of his estate goes as follows: One-fifth to St. Bridget's Asylum; one-fifth to the Hôtel Dieu of the Sacred Heart; one-fifth to Jeffrey Hall and two-fifths to the Good Shepherd Asylum. The Hon. John Sharples was born in Canada, in 1848, and was educated at St. Mary's College, Montreal. He was head of the firm of W. & J. Sharples, timber merchants and a member of the Legislature Council of the Province of Quebec. In 1907 he, with his wife, established a special ward for children in the Hôtel Dieu, Quebec. His Holiness Pius X created him a Knight of St. Gregory.

We learn from the Salesian Bulletin that a fine monument to Our Lady Help of Christians has been erected at Punta Arenas in Southern Patagonia. The unveiling was performed by Mgr. Fagnano, a Salesian, the monument being in commemoration of the twenty-fifth year of the foundation of the Central House of the Salesian Missions in Patagonia. The monument is thirty-eight feet in height and rises at the side of the parish church. It has a broad pedestal with stone carvings, above which rises a graceful column, all one piece of polished granite, surmounted by a beautiful statue of Our Lady Help of Christians in white Carrara marble. On the front of the pedestal is a bronze bust of the Venerable Don Bosco; below it is inscribed: "To Mary Help of Christians—from the Catholic population of the Magellan lands; 1912."

On the opposite side of the pedestal is read: "An act of homage to the Heavenly Patroness of Don Bosco's Work, in memory of the twenty-fifth year of its foundation in this territory; 1887-1912."

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

A Noble Apology from "The Survey"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I am sending you in advance an editorial paragraph from the December magazine number of The Survey. It deals with the sketch "Holy Water," published in the corresponding issue of The Survey for November, with respect to which you printed a short editorial.

Correspondence has brought out that the incident of the sale of holy water was unfounded; the author unconscious of offence; and sincerely regretful that her attempt at portrayal of the distress of an immigrant girl who appealed for help with nothing but open hands—should do grievous injury to the fair name of a Catholic Sisterhood.

I should like to repeat to you personally that I am sincerely regretful of the occurrence. We have been endeavoring to open the sober pages of The Survey the past year to stories with human interest. This manuscript shows that the procedure in handling them should be as complete as in the case of our articles. Such sketches will hereafter be doubly referred—for subject matter as well as for style. And in any case where the subject matter deals with Catholic practice, the reference will, of course, be to a competent subscriber to that faith.

PAUL U. KELLOGG, Editor.

New York, Nov. 28, 1913.

The following is the apology printed in The Survey to which the editor refers in the foregoing letter:

"We published in our issue of November 1 a sketch entitled Holy Water. The sketch was founded on the real story of an immigrant girl, who, in desperate straits yearned for holy water to 'set things right.' She was represented as applying to Catholic Sisters for it. A Sister was represented as asking her, 'Have you money to buy it with?'"

"We have received a number of letters of protest from representative Catholics who take serious exception to this and to other features in the story on the ground that they misrepresent Catholic belief and practice.

"The story did misrepresent both. Being a sketch, rather than an inductive article, the subject matter of the manuscript did not go through the ordinary processes of criticism and reference. The Survey regrets exceedingly that the mistake was not detected in advance of publication, so that the author might have been protected from doing unconscious but grave injustice to the culture of a Catholic Sisterhood, and The Survey itself from spreading that injustice broadcast. The error was one of management, not of intention on the part of author or editor, but our regret is none the less sincere on that account. The Survey hopes that its well established reputation for fairness and accuracy in its field of labor will add force to this expression of regret."

CHRONICLE

Mexican War.—The revolutionists suffered several defeats during the week. Not for months has their cause met with the reverses it has since December 8. The important city of Torreon, described by military leaders as the gateway between the Northern States and Mexico City, was retaken by the Federals. The fighting incident to the retaking of the city cost the rebels 800 killed and more than 400 wounded. The only great victory the rebels can claim is the taking of Chihuahua City. This stronghold fell into the hands of General Villa without a struggle, the Federal General evacuating when he heard Villa was on the march toward the city. The latest reports announce that General Huerta's troops at Tampico have been victorious. They held the city during a four-day battle and finally drove the revolutionists into full retreat. Rear Admiral Fletcher notified the Navy Department that he had transferred 500 refugees from his battleships to the American transport Sumner. One American was slightly wounded during the fighting. The military hospital in Tampico has about 200 wounded. Secretary of State Bryan has sent George D. Carrothers, ex-Consul of the United States at Torreon, Mexico, as special representative of the United States, with a protest to General Villa against the latter's treatment of the Spanish residents of Chihuahua.

Huerta Named President.—The Mexican Congress on December 9 declared null and void the Presidential election which was held on October 26 last. The action of Congress in annulling the election was based on the failure of the majority of districts to make returns. Of 14,425 districts only 7,167 voted, or less than one-half as required by the constitution. The Congress thereupon declared General Victoriano Huerta President ad interim and authorized him to retain the Presidency till the first Sunday in July, 1914, which is the date fixed for the new election. The vote of 155 was unanimous, ten members of the Catholic party leaving before the roll call.

Peace Prize for Senator Root.—The Nobel Peace Prize for 1912 was awarded by the Norwegian Storting to Senator Elihu Root, of New York, and that for 1913 to Senator Henri La Fontaine, of Brussels, Belgium, who formerly was president of the Permanent International Peace Bureau of Berne, Switzerland. Senator Root in 1910 was made a permanent member of the Court of Arbitration at The Hague, succeeding as permanent representative of the United States the late Chief Justice Fuller. The report of the committee which made the award refers to Senator Root's eminent merits in the pacification of the Philippines and Cuba and in the handling of the American Japanese dispute. It praises his high political and international ideals, and his constant efforts in the cause of peace. Alfred Nobel, the Swedish scientist who invented nitro-glycerin and dynamite, left $9,000,000 as a fund, the income of which was to be divided annually into five equal parts and distributed as prizes among those who had done most to benefit humanity.

New Pan-American Building.—The board of directors of the Pan-American States Association have planned to erect the world's tallest building on the block bounded by Eighth Avenue, Broadway, 57th and 58th streets, New York City. The proposed building, which will be known as Las Americas, will be 801 feet high. The height of the Woolworth Building is 780 feet. The building will be used as a centre for prominent exhibits of the products of Central and South America and Mexico. The total cost, including the land, will be $16,000,000. A space of 22,000 square feet will be devoted to exhibition purposes. The first five floors will be known as Machinery Hall, where there will be a display of every kind of machinery that will interest buyers from South and Central America and Mexico. A floor will be set aside for the exhibition of pure food, and four or five of the top floors will be used as a library for books on Pan-American States. The money to carry the project through will be sought from rich Americans and South Americans. A contract for the construction, which is to begin next March, has already been awarded.

Santo Domingo Election.—American Officials have been sent to Santo Domingo to "observe" the elections of December 15. Mr. Sullivan, the American Minister had previously announced in Santo Domingo City that an American commission would be sent to "supervise" the elections. This plan was considered by the Dominican Government to be an invasion of the Sovereignty of the country and a vigorous protest to the Secretary of State in Washington was the consequence. In response to this protest it appears that the character of the American officials and the invasion was changed so that they might go to Santo Domingo in an "unofficial" capacity. It is assumed that the Dominican Government will understand that it is now impossible, with the American observers already there and the new policy fully announced, for the United States to recede from its intentions. Consequently it would be futile to protest further. As President Bordas has himself guaranteed the honesty of the elections, it is asserted by the Dominican Government that the presence of American observers in an unofficial capacity is as unnecessary as it is unwelcome.

Argentina.—At the end of September the population of Buenos Aires was 1,457,885, an increase of 64,085 for the twelvemonth. The only cities in the United States outranking it in population are New York, Chicago and Philadelphia, the census of the latter for 1910 being 1,549,008. The municipal statistics of the Argentine capital for September give 1,101 marriages, 4,386 births and 1,975 deaths.

Canada.—Parliament is summoned for January 15. —Mr. Justice Cassels of the Court of the Exchequer has given verdict against Mr. Justice Clement of the Supreme Court of British Columbia for $4,290 wrongfully obtained for travelling expenses by representing his residence to be at Grand Forks instead of Vancouver. —The Dominion Government proposes to settle the Indian immigration question temporarily by declaring that British Columbia has more labor than it can employ, and denying in consequence admission to any skilled or unskilled laborers.—The Canadian Northern Railway tunnel under Mount Royal is open from end to end, the borers having met 646 feet below the summit. The work of completing it for railway traffic is being pushed vigorously.—It is thought that Sir Redmond Roblin, whose health has not been very good lately, will soon resign the premiership of Manitoba, to be succeeded by Dr. Montagu, who has just entered the Cabinet.—Unemployment is beginning to be felt seriously. Public refuges in Montreal are finding their capacity overtaxed.—The Agent of the Bank of Montreal at Plum Coulee, Manitoba, was shot and killed while defending his charge against robbers. The holding up of the small bank agencies is becoming so common, that the charge of them is becoming an extra-hazardous occupation.

Great Britain.—Mrs. Pankhurst has joined her daughter, Christabel, in Paris, where the younger lady has been living comfortably for a long time on a good allowance. Unfortunately, after a short time, she paid a flying visit to England, of which the result was a new arrest for leaving the country without license.—The suffragists are still rioting and burning. As they began on one occasion to sing their intercessions for Emmeline Pankhurst and the other martyrs in St. Paul's Cathedral, the service was suspended until they were quite finished.—Whether the Postman's strike will come off or not, is still undecided. Mr. Samuel, Postmaster-General, will not give them the increase they ask. On the other hand, if they strike, they will lose their Christmas fees.—The New Zealand has reached home after its long journey round the world. It was visited by upwards of two million Colonials during the voyage. As the total number of Colonials is about 15 millions, this means that one out of every eight visited the ship. Thus the object of the voyage has been gained in a very striking way. We have now to see what the effect will be. Indians are pouring congratulatory addresses on Lord Hardinge, thanking him for his defence of their rights. The South African people, on the other hand, resent what they call his interference. Though why a Governor-General of India should not side with his own subjects in such a dispute is not very clear.—In the Wick bye-election the Government held its own. Ulster did not move the Caithness men to pity. In Lanark the Liberal position improved, and the "Unionist reaction" seems to have petered out once more.

Ireland.—Despite a great variety of statements and counterstatements by the leaders of all parties, the political situation is unchanged. The London Times stated, December 12, that the party representatives are interchanging views with regard to a basis for settlement by consent, but Bonar Law saw little prospect of a satisfactory result. Messrs. Redmond and Dillon insist that an undivided Ireland under a Parliament with an executive responsible to it shall be an essential condition to any compromise.—The English Trade Union Congress, after repudiating the Larkinite policies, sent a deputation to Dublin to settle the strike which Larkin had fomented, but already it was practically over. The port is open as usual, and the Dublin employers are generally held to have rendered good service in crushing the first organized effort of Syndicalism. Outside of Dublin, trade and general business are reported as prosperous.

—An official inquiry into the condition of the Dublin tenements has shown that they are far more habitable than their counterparts in London. Consisting largely of residential houses built in the prosperous days of the Irish Parliament, they have larger and higher rooms than the London tenements; and the rooms with more than two occupants have been found ten times less than the 20,000 previously reported. A scheme for converting a portion of Phoenix Park into lots and cottages for the dwellers in the slums is about to be taken up by the Dublin Corporation.—The Lourdes Pilgrimage Committee has donated $10,000 of its surplus funds for the benefit of the children of the slums and of the workers on strike, and a committee approved by Archbishop Walsh has collected considerable funds for the same purpose.—The much talked of scheme of connecting Blacksod Bay with Canada by the All-Red-Route in a three-day run seems about to be realized. Construction contracts of $10,000,000 have been signed, and Mr. Long, the American engineer in charge of the works, declares that in two years the largest liners afloat will be able to dock in the Sligo harbor.—The Government order forbidding the importation of arms appears to have been occasioned by the Nationalist volunteer movement rather than by the Orange Covenanters. Over seven thousand men of various political affiliations, meeting in Dublin, November 25, founded the Irish Volunteers, an organization intended not for aggression but, by military discipline within the law, to preserve Irish rights and liberties. The movement has spread into the provinces.

Rome.—The commission for the codification of Canon Law, which began its work in March, 1904, has completed the first draft of the new code, but the whole work is still far from completion. The observations and modifications by the bishops throughout the world to whom the draft copy was sent are now being collated and studied by the Cardinals of the Commission.

France.—Senator Doumergue, Radical Socialist, has formed a new Cabinet by a combination of Radicals, Radical-Socialists and Socialists, all but two of the twelve Ministers having served in former Cabinets. The Paris press receives the new Cabinet with disapproval, and predicts a short life for it. The Radical-Socialist Party, to which the new Premier belongs, is the strongest group in the Chamber of Deputies. Its principles are democratic, but are widely divergent from those of the Unified Socialists, who are the only true Socialists in the political groups of France. The Cabinet intends to apply the three years' military service law, but regards it in the light of a temporary necessity, and hopes to reduce the period of service as soon as the international situation appears to justify this action. An attempt will be made to compromise the outstanding differences between the Chamber and the Senate over electoral reforms, but the Government does not think that the measure can be passed before the elections of 1914. Finally, the Government is determined to maintain rigorously the non-sectarian character of the public schools. The first test of the stability of the new Ministry was made in connection with the question of taxing the new loan, the issue which had wrecked the Barthou Cabinet. The loan was simply withdrawn from the market for the present. On that point 150 members refrained from voting, but the Government won by 302 to 141. Briand, who had once been Prime Minister, bitterly assailed the Government for its abandonment of the army loan project, and was vigorously applauded. Possibly public feeling is accentuated in this matter by an event that occurred last month and of which little notice has been taken in the press outside of France. On November 11 solemn Mass was celebrated in Jerusalem to ask for the blessing of God on King Victor Emmanuel and not, as heretofore, on the French Republic. This marks the end of the French Protectorate in the Holy Land, and as diplomatic relations have been severed with the Holy See, no redress is possible, such as was obtained ten years ago. It happens also that just then the Government had ordered the French fleet not to touch at Jaffa, a landing always looked forward to by the French sailors and officers for a run up to Jerusalem.—After a stormy debate the Paris City Council rejected, on December 8, the proposal to restore Sisters of Charity and the members of other nursing Orders to the posts they held in the Paris hospitals before the Separation Law went into effect. Then by a vote of 41 to 35, the Council pronounced in favor of the principle of subventioning private hospitals in which Sisters were nurses, if these hospitals expressed their willingness to take as patients a certain number of poor. In flat contradiction with this political act, decorations are being continually offered to Sisters of Charity who distinguish themselves by their devotion to the sick in the army or colonies.—A new diocese has been formed with Lille as its see and Mgr. Charot as the first bishop.—The Pope has sent a letter of congratulation by Cardinal Merry del Val to the five bishops of Brittany who recently signed a collective pastoral on Christian education.

Italy.—The proposed exclusion of illiterate immigrants by the United States excites some of the Italian politicians. In the Chamber of Deputies, on December 8, the Government, in answer to a question as to what measures it intended to take in the way of a remedy, stated that intervention in the internal affairs of the United States was impossible. It was suggested that the only means to combat exclusion was through diplomatic influence, and by establishing schools in Italy for emigrants.

Spain.—The bishops of the Province of Granada have issued an appeal for the organized union of all Catholics of their dioceses in defence of the rights of the Church in Spain, a union that is to comprehend Catholics of all political parties, and is to make itself felt particularly in the polling booth.—Bishop Tubieta, O.P., of Urubamba, has sailed for Peru, with six other Dominicans. They go at the request of the Peruvian Government to assist in the civilization of the Indians.

Germany.—The aftermath of the Zabern disorders has already proved to be of a very serious nature. The leading parties of the German Reichstag, including the Centre, insist that the "lack of confidence" vote, passed against the Imperial Chancellor, is not to be taken as lightly as he apparently imagines. In refusing to hand in his resignation the Chancellor had told the House that he was responsible only to the Emperor, and that the vote of Parliament did not affect him. He declared it was unconstitutional to attempt to force his resignation. No German statesman imbued with monarchical principles could think of making such a concession to the parliamentary idea. His own position, he held, differed from that of parliamentary leaders in other countries. Votes of censure could not therefore impair his tenure. They signified no more than that he and his Parliament did not agree. Since the right of appointing and deposing a Chancellor belonged to the Emperor alone, it was unconstitutional and subversive of government to seek to influence the imperial will by votes of lack of confidence. They would merely substitute "the yoke of Socialism for the Imperial authority." He was answered by the Socialist Representative Scheidemann who declared that the Chancellor's refusal to bow to the Reichstag's vote of censure could not be tolerated by a body calling itself a Parliament. He urged the House to reply by declining the entire budget. Amendments to the constitution were likewise proposed by the Socialists to make the Imperial Chancellor responsible to the House for the acts of the Emperor, and to provide for his dismissal upon the demand of the House. The fate, both of the amendments and of the proposed refusal of supplies to the Government by declining to accept its budget, was decided by the Centre Party. Dr. Spahn on behalf of the Centre, announced that his Party would oppose the amendments and would vote the budget—not, however, for the Chancellor, but for the German nation. He then strongly censured the Chancellor's conduct in the Zabern affair. In a later session the Centrist leader Erzberger made an incisive speech seriously condemning the manner in which the Chancellor had received his condemnation. The Reichstag, he said, had not assumed any unconstitutional power, nor did it presume to appoint or depose an Imperial Chancellor; but no Chancellor with the lasting distrust of his Parliament resting upon him could continue in office. The same views were expressed by the First Vice-President of the Reichstag, Dr. Paasche, a leader of the National Liberals.

Austria-Hungary.—The worst scenes ever enacted in the Chamber of Deputies in Vienna have again been recalled by the tumult and uproar created in the Reichsrath during its session of December 10. The disturbances were begun by the Ruthenian Representatives who had moved to interrupt the session in order to discuss the Galician election reforms. Since this action would have been equivalent to a vote of lack of confidence against the Government, the motion was rejected, after it had been strongly opposed in a speech delivered by the President of the Ministry, Count Stürgkh. Pandemonium instantly ensued. The Ruthenians tore the lids from their desks to create with them the most deafening racket. Horns, trumpets and whistles were produced, until after an hour of uninterrupted noise and confusion the parties which had vainly waited to continue with the parliamentary business finally left the hall. The session was then formally closed by the President.

Holland.—The first crematory in the Netherlands was recently completed and dedicated in the Westerveld Cemetery, about fifteen miles west of Amsterdam. The building cost $34,000, and is a substantial structure, capped by an imposing dome, and includes a large hall in which funeral services may be held. In another apartment the coffin of a deceased person is lowered by an elevator through the floor to the oven. The ashes are placed in vases, but must be buried if they remain in the country, pursuant to Dutch law. A cremation society was formed in Holland in 1874, but efforts to establish a crematory were unavailing till the site in the Westerveld Cemetery was obtained. Heretofore bodies of deceased members of the society were taken to a crematory in Germany, near the frontier of the Netherlands.

East Africa.—An event of great economic importance will be the completion early in 1914 of the Central Railway in German East Africa. Construction was begun in 1904, and completed to Tabora, 530 miles from the seashore, in February, 1912. The railroad, when finished, will extend 786 miles—from Daressalam, on the Indian Ocean, to Kigoma, on Lake Tanganyika. The line divides the German colony into two equal areas, thus making a trunk system from which branches may be built over a great part of the colony. A vast and productive region is thus opened to commerce. It will also become the outlet for the broad hinterland, in which lies Lake Tanganyika, with its 400-mile stretch of navigable waters, tributary to which is a rich commercial region in the heart of Africa. Along the extensive shores of this lake products will be gathered and distributed by a fleet of ships cooperating with the railway. This recent development offers a bright prospect for the White Fathers, who have been in that region since 1878.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

The Little Laureate of the Infant Jesus

"I am going to tell you in all simplicity that the Lord showed me the same mercy as to King Solomon," wrote Sister Teresa of the Child Jesus—the "Little Flower," as she has been affectionately called—in answer to an order from her Mother Prioress. "All my wishes have been fulfilled; not only my wishes for perfection, but even those the vanity of which I understood without having experienced it. Seeing one of my sisters paint charming pictures and compose verses, I thought how happy I should be if I could paint also, could express my thoughts in verse and could do much good to others. Yet I would not have liked to ask for these natural gifts, and my wishes remained hidden in the depths of my heart. But Jesus, hidden likewise in that poor little heart, deigned to show it once more the nothingness of what passes away. To the great surprise of the community I composed poetry; I painted; it was permitted me to do good to some souls."

Such in brief is the story of her vocation as a poet, to which we owe her little volume of deeply spiritual verse, a handful of precious jewels glowing with many colors, but all transfused with the same light of Divine Love.

Although the poetry of Sister Teresa was all composed between the years 1893 and 1897, yet in her more than two score poems, she touched upon many themes, all closing in her love of God. Her favorite subjects were the Cross, the Holy Eucharist, the Saints and Angels, and the Mother of Jesus. To Mary her first and her last poem were dedicated. Particularly dear to her, as we might well expect, was the divine Babe of Bethlehem. No one was better qualified to sing of Him. Seldom had His likeness been so sweetly and wonderfully reproduced as in her soul. It is this one theme alone which we shall here consider, as the spirit of the holy season prompts us, which from earliest childhood had always been so dear to her.

"I loved with my wee shoe to grace,
Each Christmas time the chimney-place;
To find it there at morn how swift I'd race!
That feast of heaven—I hailed it well,
Noel!"

To her the Infant Christ is ever her own dearest "Little Brother." She is His "little sister," and with a sweet childlike simplicity claims to the full all the privileges which this intimate relationship implies. She would hide with Him beneath Mary's veil and be cherished with Him at the same virgin bosom, for is not Mary truly the Mother of us all:

"And I will shield thee 'neath my veil,
Near Bethlehem's Babe, so fair and bright.
Oh, thou shalt think the stars are pale Compared with this divine delight."

Her convent itself, in a playful little poem, composed during the Christmas of 1896, becomes the bird cage of the Infant Jesus, and the nuns are His singing birds, whose happiness is their sweet captivity.

One day, when earth and time are o'er,
And Thy clear call to us is given,
Then angel-hands shall ope the door,
Thy birds shall take their flight to Heaven;
And there, with charming, songful hosts
Of little cherubs glad and gay,
Thy happy birds from Carmel's coasts Shall praise Thy Holy Name away."

The Tabernacle, however, above all things attracts her heart. A mysterious influence goes out from it, drawing her with the force of an irresistible love. She would envy the little key that opens it, did she not realize that her faith can even more surely unlock its door; she would envy the light that burns before it, did she not know her own soul was ever burning with a far purer flame and her prayers were winning other souls for Christ; she would envy the consecrated altar-stone where, "as once in Bethlehem's blessed shed," the Eternal Word is daily born, but no cold stone will she offer her Lord. He shall come to her own heart, all warm with love for Him! So she continues to sing in her charming way of the paten and the chalice, of the grapes and the wheat. Always her own offering is the better. She hopes to have for her Christ something purer even than the snowy corporal of the Holy Sacrifice.

"O corporal that angels guard!
What envy of thee fills my breast!
On thee, as in His swaddling bands,
I see my only Treasure rest.
Ah, Virgin Mother! change my heart
Into a corporal pure and fair,
Whereon the snow-white Host may rest,
And thy meek Lamb find shelter there."

There is still one feature which we must not omit to emphasize here. It is her apostolic love for the souls of little children. This particular mission of praying and suffering for them, and asking others likewise to offer up their labors and their prayers for this purpose, is ever in her mind. In "The Angels of the Crib," a mask composed for the Christmas of 1894, the Angel of the Infant Jesus asks Him to cull abundant harvests of innocent souls, "fresh with their pure baptismal dew," before they have been tainted by sin. It is especially where danger of sin is greatest that Christ's mercy here becomes most evident. Yet who may know what a divine favor it may be even in the best of homes. God's love alone can best determine this—better than any mother's heart. He alone loves most truly the mother and the child. In the charmingly artless poem, "The Little Beggar of Christmas," the same thought recurs. It is familiar to every Christian mother, who prays that she may rather lose her little one for a few years of time than for all eternity. Teresa's own mother had given up to God four children in their infancy. Her five remaining daughters entered the religious life.

"Go, catch for Him some darling birds,
And in the stable let them sing,
For they are types of children's souls,
So dear to this Child Christ their King.
Their pretty hymns, their baby prayers,
His sleep like yule-bells gently break.
Pray for them then; in heaven one day
Those children's souls your crowns will make."

Childhood, in every phase, was sacred to her. She herself, in her candor, her sweet abandonment to the Divine Will, and her perfect innocence, always remained a child in that perfect sense in which we all are to be little children in the sight of God. It is a happiness for which the angels themselves might envy us, could they entertain such a feeling. This thought is expressed in the Christmas refrain which the angels sing around the crib of the newborn Saviour.

"In ecstasy would fain each seraph undefiled
Put off, O Jesus sweet, his grand angelic nature,
Would fain become a child."

Nowhere is her delight in childhood more perfectly expressed than in the poem, "To My Little Brothers In Heaven, The Holy Innocents," upon the text of Isaias, "The Lord shall gather together the lambs with His arm, and shall take them up in his bosom." Even from a purely literary point of view—a view which seldom enters into our thought when delighting in the sweetness exhaled from the Little Flower of Jesus—the stanzas we here quote are unexcelled. The poetic fancy representing the Holy Innocents as little child-souls playing in heaven about the Throne of God, could hardly be more perfectly expressed. The translator, S. L. Emery, deserves our thanks for the beauty of the English version.

In splendid courts on high, with tiny cherub-throngs
Gayly you play:
Beloved baby-band! your childish sports and songs
Charm heaven away.
God tells you how He makes the birds, the flowers, the snow,
The sunlight clear;
No genius here below knows half the things you know,
O children, dear!

From Heaven's azure vault you tear the veils that make Such mystery:
The glowing myriad stars in your wee hands you take,
Your toys to be.
Running Heaven's highway, there, your tiny footsteps leave
A silvery trace;
In the bright Milky Way, I think I see, at eve,
Each shining face.

To Mary's welcoming arms, when your gay games are done,
How swiftly you hie!
Hiding beneath her veils your heads like Christ her Son,
In sleep you lie.

Heaven's darling pets! audacity like this Delights our Lord;
And you can even dare caress and gently kiss
His Face adored.

So we take our leave of the Little Laureate of the Infant Jesus, repeating in our hearts her own petition for all the graces of childhood which can endear us to our Infant Saviour, and recalling to Him His own love for us which drew Him down from heaven:

"That tiny hand of Thine which stroked Thy Mother's face Sustained the world, held all things in their place;
And Thou didst think of me!
Ah, how I think of Thee!
Remember now."

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

Francis Thompson*

Francis Thompson, the poet, concerns the whole world of English letters. Francis Thompson, put forward as the typical Catholic poet of the age, concerns especially those of the household of faith. Now that it is before the world, we regret to say that, notwithstanding much that it contains of interest, we find his "Life" disappointing on the whole. It impresses us as not altogether sincere. From pp. 94-96, the reader would gather that Thompson had broken with opium forever; but only from casual hints here and there does he learn how short-lived was the reformation. That Thompson was a Catholic in all his instincts, is kept before us: that he was anything but a practical Catholic only an occasional word reveals. Why not say clearly what is not to be discovered except by careful comparison, as for example, that he went to Storrington to break himself of his habit, that he soon relapsed, and that the drug so destroyed his self-control as to make him physically incapable of the ordinary obligation of hearing Mass on Sundays and Holy Days? Having stated the fact, the author might then have made every excuse for it possible. The excuses would have been welcome; for none with our Lord's words in his ears may presume to judge his brother. If, on the other hand, the fact be not what it seems to be, clarity would have saved many from an error they would rejoice to have escaped. The stay at Pantasaph is another problem for the ordinary reader. Apparently it was another brave attempt to conquer opium, and all would have been glad to celebrate it as such. But was there nothing else in it? Page 247 has for its heading "The Spoiled Priest." Does this refer only to his early failure to reach the seminary, or has it also some relation to Pantasaph? The words, "Though nearly a Franciscan," give a color to the supposition, and it is not fair to leave the matter in doubt. Another reticence may be excused by a plea of delicacy, which, though we respect it, we are not inclined to admit. The charity of the author's parents for the poor outcast of London streets is one of the most touching things in all literature. They, no doubt, prefer to have it passed over lightly. We think that their son might have told with greater fullness the story of Christian charity that would make all the world the better for its hearing.

Sometimes the author takes a line of excuse by no means lawful. For all men there is but one moral law: the author seems to hold a not uncommon opinion that there is a special law for men of letters. Speaking of Thompson's secrecy concerning his opium habit, he says: "He had no burning desire to justify himself. . . . His pleading was not before man's tribunal, but before the higher court of conscience and poetry." He implies, it is true, that the victim did not hold himself absolved in this court. But that does not change the fact that there is no such court, not even for the poet. The tribunal for every man is that of the Divine Judge. There conscience is but a witness, it has no judicial functions, and to poetry the entrance is barred. Again, regarding Mr. McMaster, who took Thompson from the streets, he writes: "His charity was of such exceptional fortune as commends mankind to daily good works, lest great benefits be left unperformed, lest our omissions starve a Francis Thompson. The persuasion of 'Ye did it unto Me' may be varied by 'Perhaps ye did it unto a Poet.'" Our Lord identifies Himself with the poor for many reasons we need not mention; they cannot be transferred to anyone else. To substitute for Him a Poet, with a capital P is, to say the least, an irreverence which we might take for a slip of the pen, did not a review of this work by one who should have known better, in which the parallel between our Lord and Francis Thompson is drawn more than once, persuade us that it comes from a fixed mental attitude of a certain class.

There is another matter we are unable to pass over. Thompson wrote the "Essay on Shelley" somewhere about 1889, and sent it to the Dublin Review. However we may admire it materially as a piece of composition, the spirit that informs it is another matter. The article was refused; but in 1908 the Dublin, under its new management, published it. Had Mr. Meynell merely recorded the fact, we should have said nothing. Had he, going further, explained it by saying that the modern Dublin differs radically from the Dublin of former days, we should have made no comment on a thing so obvious. But when he quotes approvingly Thompson's literary executor as thinking "it right that the Review, for which it was originally designed, should again have the offer of it, since a new generation of readers had arisen, and another editor, in days otherwise regenerate," we must protest on behalf of the dead and of not a few of the living against the slur on the old Dublin Review and its editors, and all they stood for, contained in the term "regenerate." After this one can smile at the conceit which makes the nun, Thompson's sister, remember the names of seven Lancashire cricketers by associating them with the "seven joyful mysteries of the Rosary," all because they wore roses in their caps. Perhaps Mr. Meynell is not as familiar with the Rosary of Mary as he is with the poetry about her. Anyhow, whatever be the number of the joys of Mary in carols, the joyful mysteries of the Rosary are but five.

And now we come to the gravest blot upon the work. It sets Francis Thompson before us as a mystic. We are told that he himself was wary about the word: would that his biographer had been the same! Mr. Meynell divides mystics into two classes, the false, namely, mystics of the shade, and the true, mystics of the light. He takes Maeterlinck as the type of the former: the latter, whom he calls Catholic mystics, seems to include Henry Vaughan, Crashaw, Blake, Shelley, Swedenborg, Patmore, St. John of the Cross, George Herbert, St. Bernard—indeed we suspect he would not exclude from it many others admitted by such as take Miss Underhill for their guide. Mysticism, one of the most secret and profound of the sacred things of the Catholic Church, is not to be prattled of in literary coteries. We might enlarge upon its dangers, were it not that such prattlers know too little about it to incur them. They are not likely to become Quietists or the victims of diabolical illusions. Their worst evil will be the empty vanity that is the lot of all who dabble in things high above their heads. Their so-called mysticism is purely natural. It supposes an intellect of some penetration, preferring the essences of things as it apprehends them rightly or wrongly, to mere externals, an imagination keen to perceive analogies, real or fancied, and to express them in language far from commonplace. Of such is Vaughan's "great ring of pure and endless light"; which is not mysticism, but imagination. The "Hound of Heaven," under its splendid diction, has only the elementary Christian truth: While we were yet sinners Christ loved us. There is nothing of the profundity of mysticism in the magnificent "Orient Ode," though there is a noble imagination that stamps Thompson as a true poet. Moreover, this so-called mysticism is altogether objective. It uses a rapturous style concerning what the poet sees outside himself. But, as for the interior touch of God on the soul, with all its supernatural effects culminating in the mystic union, as understood by mystical theologians, it knows nothing about it, nor does Thompson's allusion to "the personal embrace between the Creator and the creature" prove anything to the contrary. Some may denounce us indignantly: the best proof that we are right is, that they can include St. John of the Cross, St. Teresa, St. Bernard among their so-called mystics, and mention them in the same breath with Vaughan and Blake.

The futility of literary mysticism may be gathered from its definitions. Of these, "Morality carried to the *n*th power," is a mere figure of speech. We may assume that it means morality becoming transcendental. It is true that morality rightly transcendental must lose itself in God. But so also must metaphysics or botany. Yet mysticism is not formally metaphysics or botany, neither is it morality. Indeed, should morality lose itself in God, the first beginning and last end of all things, it would be transformed into something much higher. We say this speculatively; for morality is not the ordinary way to mysticism. Again we are told that it is "an endeavor to find God in the soul." Von Hügel warns against exaggeration here, and for some Von Hügel is an authority, as Miss Underhill is for others. But exaggeration, or no exaggeration, mysticism is not an endeavor at all. Objectively it is a science, a branch of theology, and a most profound one. Subjectively the mystic state is not a state of endeavor, but the reverse; neither is it the effect of any endeavor. By mere natural endeavor one can find God within him. Reason tells us that He is there by His essence, His presence and His power. One might write a poem on this subject that would be hailed as the last word of the mystic poets, but it would not be mysticism any more than the Summa. By faith we can find God in our souls by the operations of grace, in the sacraments and apart from them. By our endeavor under grace we may find Him there still more clearly day by day. But to suppose this to be the mystic state is to betray one's ignorance of first principles, and this ignorance is summed up in the recommendation that Blake's "'Cultivate imagination to the point of vision,' be printed on page 1 of the first First Reader in mysticism."

We have no enmity for the so-called mystics as poets. On the contrary, we hold that as such they have a literary value, a very great literary value. Take away the Vaughans, the Blakes, the Coleridges, the Shelleys, the Thompsons, and to say that English literature would be the poorer, would be a banality intolerable. We would only have them called a more appropriate name. There is a foolish habit in some places of calling boys "Earl," "Lord," "Baron," etc., and the consequence is that one could have read in a newspaper lately how Earl Tompkins got into some scrape or other. Everybody can see the absurdity of the practice. Those who understand in some way how St. John of the Cross, St. Teresa, St. Bernard were mystics, perceive the same incongruity when the title is given to mere poets. We cannot forget that we were among the first in America to become acquainted with Francis Thompson, the poet. It is nearly twenty years ago that a dear friend said: "There is a new poet you ought to read," and we got the little volume of 1893, and read it for the first time in the train between San Francisco and Santa Clara. Since then our fidelity has not wavered. We hold that from him we have received some of the very finest, perhaps in small quantity, the very finest English poetry of the nineteenth century. For this reason we wished to see a life written, not an esoteric one for a small circle, but one that would tell us plainly of his struggles, of his victories, of his defeats, of his uplifting, of his growth in letters, and of his final passage in penitence, fortified by the holy Sacraments to Him Whom he never abandoned, no matter how far he strayed from Him in weakness.

HENRY WOODS, S.J.

"Denatured" Mother Goose

Some time ago one of our publishing houses had among its announcements a revised and expurgated edition of Mother Goose. Though that book of rhymes has charmed and delighted six generations of English-speaking children, it is now found to be not only of little "ethical value," but even to inculcate in some of its verses principles that will warp irremediably, if followed, the character of a modern boy or girl. Mother Goose, it is charged, so far from teaching her little hearers and readers a high ideal of life, actually holds up for their admiration in many a seemingly innocent jingle, cruelty, selfishness, cowardice, frivolity, greed, and other vices of no trifling moment. The dire catastrophe, for example, that is prophesied in the concluding lines of "Hush-a-bye, baby, on the tree-top," is considered unfit for infant ears. Even more fatal to a child's gentler instincts is the history in "Bye, Baby Bunting" of its father's quest for the skins of rabbits, squirrels and other harmless animals with which to provide luxurious garments for his offspring. Why, too, it is asked, should a coward like Miss Muffet, who fled so ignominiously from a friendly spider, be made a nursery favorite? Or Jack Horner, whose greed was only equalled by his vanity? Or King Cole, so infamous for self-indulgence? The punishment, moreover, meted out to the children of the Woman who lived in a shoe, instead of being richly deserved, as Mother Goose implies, goes directly counter to the practices of modern pedagogy. All such verses, episodes and characters, therefore, are doubtless excluded altogether from the revised and expurgated Mother Goose.

But the editor of this new edition has strangely missed in the very verses considered objectionable the lessons Mother Goose tries to drive home. Though the "Hush-a-bye, baby" rhymes seem at first glance to treat a serious accident lightly and unfeelingly, is not their deeper purpose to teach little ones how uniform and inviolable the law of gravity is, and to suggest the advantages from a hygienic standpoint of open air naps over those taken in stuffy nurseries? Nor was Miss Muffet a craven. She showed rather, for one so young, remarkable prudence by retiring to where she could sip her curds and whey in peace and quiet, for perturbation of mind, as is well known, is a grave hindrance to digestion. An action, moreover, like Jack Horner's indicates in a small boy commendable self-reliance, while the genial and sunny-hearted King Cole should really be praised for his moderation. Had he been a scandalously convivial monarch he never would have been content with but one bowl, a single pipe and only three fiddlers. We should hear rather of multiplied possets, innumerable hookas and large orchestras in constant attendance. As for the Old Woman who lived in a shoe, her commendably numerous progeny were not, as are so many modern children, spoiled and pampered. The fare with which she provided her little ones was plain but substantial: breadless broth, and obviously she ruled her family with a firm, impartial hand. "She whipped them all soundly," we read, thus securing the punctual observance of bedtime.

Whether such venerable rhymes as those about Jack and Jill, the Knave of Hearts, Mary, Quite Contrary, Little Bo-Peep, etc., which hold for the discerning so many priceless moral truths, have also been "denatured" by this misguided editor, we are not informed. Let us hope they have escaped her ruthless hand. The adventure, for instance, that befell those first named two is a beautiful allegory that even little children can be taught with profit. The height that Jack and Jill ascended with such toil and moil is that of social success, which is as worthless, even when attained, if we but realize it, as is a mere pail of water, and when won can be kept only by a sacrifice of principle that makes impossible the following of high ideals. So Jack is sure to tumble down, and Jill, finer though her nature is, will soon come tumbling after. Nor can we well spare from Mother Goose the lesson of just retribution taught by the fate of the Knave of Hearts. It is the Horatian Pede poena claudo brought down to the nursery. Moreover, a strong light can be thrown on the solution of modern labor problems by recalling the information Mother Goose gave Margery Daw:

"Jenny shall have a new master;
And she shall have but a penny a day
Because she won't work any faster."

The rhyme of Contrary Mary, who, nevertheless, kept her garden in an orderly and thriving condition, is doubtless meant to teach children that grave defects of character are often found in the same person side by side with shining virtues, while the wide diversity of tastes manifested by the general run of men regarding the age and temperature of so common a dish as pease porridge should show our more thoughtful nurslings what to expect when they mingle with the world in years to come. The folly of lending to irresponsible persons articles of value is the obvious moral to be drawn from the episode of the Dapple Gray Pony; the disastrous results that often follow habits of slothfulness will be plain to those who recall the cost of Little Boy Blue's unseasonable nap; while the succinct biography Mother Goose has written of Mr. and Mrs. Sprat proves to admiration that the widest disparity of tastes, even in matters of so vital and intimate a nature as the menu and the cuisine, need produce no discord in the domestic harmonies, and can be made to promote, rather than hinder, the practice of economy.

How strikingly also do the verses that begin, "Ba, ba, black sheep," illustrate the beautiful custom observed in medieval times by the wealthy and well-to-do of setting aside one-third of their income for charitable purposes. In this rhyme the children learn from the testimony of the one most intimately concerned that the black sheep's generous owner, and his no less generous lady, mean to retain for themselves but two bags of the wool the animal's fleece will yield, for the third part is to go entire to the poor little boy who occupies, doubtless with his widowed and bed-ridden mother, a humble cottage down the lane. The fact that the wool in question is black, rarer, therefore, than white wool, and presumably more valuable, greatly increases, of course, the merit of the almsgiving. We cannot believe that even the most ruthless "reviser" of Mother Goose would meddle with those verses, for their "ethical value," if the "bromide" may be permitted, is equaled only by that of the "Little Bo-Peep" rhymes. For the story of that imperturbable shepherdess teaches a lesson that we all sadly need, and the earlier it is learned the better. It is this: As most of the things we worry about never really happen, if we would but follow the excellent counsel given little Bo-Peep, we should doubtless live longer and more useful lives. She certainly had abundant cause for anxiety, for the flock with whose care she had been entrusted were all lost: lost to a lamb. But Bo-Peep took the sage advice offered by Mother Goose, ceased her unprofitable worry, and was rewarded by seeing all her charges winding peacefully homeward at nightfall, with not a lambkin missing and, what perhaps is to be moderately wondered at, with their tails all hanging, as usual, behind them.

Now, shall we allow such consummate masterpieces as these, the heritage of ages, to be "revised" forsooth! and "expurgated" by some misguided sentimentalist? Perish the thought! Let the old-fashioned Mother Goose of our nursery days be preserved intact. But modern corruptions, it is maintained, have slipped here and there into the text. "Because she can't work any faster," for example, is a false reading in "See-Saw, Margery Daw," for which present-day Socialism is doubtless responsible. Then let some scholarly and reverential Puffendorf or Brausenbauer consult the early manuscripts of the verses, collate the variant readings, and choose the one he considers the best. But "revisers," so-called, who would reject an ancient reading just because it seems in their perverted judgment "cruel and bloodthirsty," and who would wantonly alter other lines which express some of the most valuable moral lessons and the deepest ethical truths Mother Goose can teach the young of our race—away with such destructive meddlers! Away with them!

Preternatural Montessorians

Dr. Maria Montessori, who is now explaining in this country her new system of pedagogy, tells this little story about a Cardinal who distributed candy one day among the children of her school:

"They examined their prizes eagerly. One by one they ran to his Eminence exclaiming, 'This is a triangle,' 'This is a square,' 'This is a cube.' They did not eat until they had described the shape of the gift. 'Why, this is a miracle, madam,' said the Cardinal."

Or marvellously like one at least. Indeed, the wonder of it all moves the New York Sun to make the following wise and witty reflections:

"What a chasm between the natural child and these fortunate pupils of Dr. Montessori's amiable system. Charming children, too, these happy and gifted Montessorians; but some of the unregenerate and old fashioned may shudder a little and be reminded of 'Sandford and Merton,' let alone little Rollo. To look on the form and not the substance of candy; to make chocolates a geometry exercise; isn't this adding a somewhat sophisticated and pedantic wonder to the real and blessed perpetual miracle which is childhood? Must a hoop be a circle to Eliza Jane and a footfall an oblate spheroid to William Henry? Must ice cream be a chemistry lesson and marbles a discourse on the sphere? Our private opinion is that this Cardinal and all other Cardinals and everybody else who ever got an education worth having had to work and not play for it; and that, however well meant, it's inhuman to bring 'shop' into a candy pull."

With the spread in this country of the Dottoressa's pedagogical system, we may look forward, no doubt, to seeing all our boys and girls resembling daily more and more those preternatural children his Eminence so justly marvelled at. As conditions are now, there are said to be pupils in our schools who actually consider arithmetic a tyranny, geography an abomination, spelling a persecution, and grammar downright torture, while those who force little victims to study these sciences are ruthless oppressors of the weak and helpless. But by the time Dr. Montessori has finished her American lecturing tour, we may confidently hope to see our little Pollies crooning themselves to sleep by repeating the multiplication table; our youthful Peggies forgetting to take breakfast as they make maps in their saucers of milk and cereal; our little Tommies using in conversation no words whose orthography and meaning they have not first mastered by consulting the Oxford Dictionary, and our youthful Harries bursting into tears whenever they hear their elders commit a solecism. As for the old fashioned schoolma'am, she will speedily become extinct and give place to a mistress of revels, who will make the sometime thorny path of learning "roses, roses, all the way."

Catholics in Public Life

"Why is it that Catholics, as a rule, have such a poor representation in civic and social organizations?" asked the Rev. Dr. John A. Ryan a few weeks ago in the St. Paul Catholic Bulletin. "For two principal reasons," he answered.

"First, because they do not in sufficient numbers go into this field in any capacity whatever. Therefore their names do not occur to the men of influence in these organizations who have the power to select officers. This is a sober and saddening fact. Catholics have not yet developed a social or civic sense. . . . The second reason for the paucity of Catholic names in the lists of officers in organizations of this kind is the failure of those Catholics who are members to make themselves and their fellow Catholics known."

Dr. Ryan attests, moreover, that as far as his experience qualifies him to judge, the assertion that sectarian bigotry keeps Catholic members from being more numerous on Boards of Charity and the like, is not justified by the facts, but "springs from a mixture of indolence, incompetence, mean-spiritedness, and the demoralizing traditions of persecution and ostracism," which, in his opinion, must be remedied by the display of "manly self-assertion, knowledge, fair-mindedness, and efficiency," on the part of Catholics.

Severe as is Dr. Ryan's indictment of Catholics, is it undeserved? In proportion to our numbers have we anything like the representation we should in the civic life of our country? There is no reason why more of our laity, by making themselves the men of "self-assertion, knowledge, fair-mindedness and efficiency," that Dr. Ryan desiderates, should not discharge with credit and distinction any civic or social office their fellow-citizens confer upon them. They must not, however, be mere politicians, and sharers therefore in the reproach too often attached nowadays to that name, but they should be public servants who are not afraid to act at all times like loyal and consistent Catholics, and to make it plain that it is just because they are loyal and consistent Catholics that they are also trustworthy officials, wise statesmen and true patriots.

CORRESPONDENCE

Do Paris Catholics Go to Mass?

PARIS, November 25, 1913.

The French magazine Revue recently published an article by Brival-Gaillard, in which the writer endeavored to show that the small number of Parisians actually fulfilling their religious duties as Catholics is not proportionate to the political importance and consideration which the Church in Paris enjoys and demands. In a word, Mr. "B. G." wishes to show that the law of separation is not unjust. To prove his claims he instituted, on private authority, of course, an investigation to ascertain how many of the faithful attend the churches on Sundays. The result of his "disinterested and accurate inquiries" is as follows: The 78 parish churches of Paris are frequented on Sundays by no more than 118,000 Parisians; that is, there is an average of only one to every 23 Catholics who attends Mass regularly on Sundays.

As was to be expected, the article was freely copied by a number of papers, among them even Catholic periodicals, whose editors did not reflect that the Revue is not much inclined to go out of its way to ascertain the truth when there is question of the rights of the Catholic Church. La Croix (10, VII, 13), and La Revue pratique d'apologetique (10, X, 13), refuted the calumnies, and showed that "B. G." not only gave no consideration to a number of important factors, but actually distorted the truth.

Even where his statistics are accurate, a number of facts, if taken into account, would bring a much higher average. In the first place we must remember that in addition to the parish churches of Paris, there exists a number of auxiliary chapels, some of which are fair-sized churches. Since the passing of the Law of Separation Catholics have full freedom to erect, and have actually built twenty-four such chapels. Moreover, the monastery churches must not be overlooked. In one of them, St. Nicholas', as many as 1,000 persons hear Mass every Sunday.

Again, the 118,000 church-going Catholics mentioned by "B. G." will receive a very notable increase if we consider the attendance at Mass of Parisian students, inmates of homes for the aged, of hospitals and other institutions, all of whom have their services in private chapels. The Catholic colleges for boys alone have an enrollment of approximately 6,000. Every Sunday 1,200 assist at Mass in the chapel of the Catholic University, the so-called Chapelle des Carmes, where a special sermon is delivered exclusively for them. Hence, it is clear that the figures of "B. G." are much too low. His sense of justice might have also prompted him to consider that:

(1) Many Parisians leave the capital on Saturday evening and hear Mass the following day in a country village. (2) A great number of city officials, street car-conductors and others, are unable to go to church on Sunday, owing to the nature of their occupations. (3) Not all the inhabitants of Paris are Catholics. The non-Catholic population in certain quarters is quite large. Notre Dame des Blancs Manteaux counts 15,000 inhabitants, of whom 7,500 are Jews; St. Antoine has 37,500, but of these 7,500 are Protestants. If we add the many whom "B. G." has left out we shall find the number of the church-going Catholics notably augmented.

But for the sake of justice we must look at these statistics in another light. Despite "B. G.'s" assertion, that they were compiled with extreme fairness and impartiality, we can point out a number of inaccuracies. Let a few examples suffice.

In Notre Dame de Clignancourt there are, as stated by him, four Masses each Sunday, with an average attendance of 300, making a total of 1,200. In point of fact, however, there are thirteen Masses, at one of which (the 8.45 Mass), there is present a congregation of 1,200, the children's Mass is attended by about an equal number of children, many of whom are accompanied by their parents, and at the 11.15 services 1,500 fulfill their weekly obligation. In a single Mass, therefore, there are present more of the faithful than "B. G." counts in all of them. Similarly false figures are given for St. Honoré d'Eylau, St. Roch, Notre Dame de la Croix, St. Michel des Batignolles, St. Jean Baptiste de la Salle, etc., etc.

Having called attention to "B. G.'s" misrepresentations, we can adduce as a striking proof of the actual Catholic vitality in Paris the number of the Easter Communions received in 58 out of the 78 parishes of the French capital; there were in 1912 no less than 314,000. And we must bear in mind that parishes in which religious fervor flourishes most are not included in this list. Moreover, just at Easter a great many go to monastery churches, or to places outside of Paris to fulfill their obligations.

To sum up. Even if we have to admit that Catholic life in Paris is not as flourishing as it well might be, yet we should be cautious to believe the "impartial" statistics that appear from time to time from the pens of men like Brival-Gaillard, who have, as a rule, a sinister purpose to guide them. Since the Separation, and prior to December, 1912, 15 new parishes and 24 auxiliary chapels were erected in Paris. The sacrifices their building implies tell their own story and amply show how much the Catholics of Paris are devoted to their Church.

Closing Events of the Chinese Rebellion

SHANGHAI, October 6, 1913.

Yuan Shi-kai, it would seem, had made every preparation to meet the rebels. When the uprising broke out, the Southerners held important positions, notably in Kiangsi and Kiangsu. To reach these points, the Northern troops had to travel from Peking to central China, and this was done rather slowly at the outset. They had also in some places to fight against the rebels, who, as they retreated South, destroyed several bridges on the railway lines. These had to be hurriedly repaired, and meanwhile the Northerners were hindered from reaching good striking points. Gradually, however, the well-laid plans of Yuan were carried out, concentration was achieved, 50,000 men were moved South, and then it was decided to strike the final blow.

The rebels on their side mustered a total force of 80,000 men, of whom 30,000 were in Kiangsi and 25,000 in Kiangsu. Some of these had fought against the Manchus in the revolution of 1911, but the greater part were raw recruits, ill-armed and led, and fighting for the leaders who were at their head rather than for a patriotic cause.

The first brush with the Northerners took place in Kiangsi Province. The rebel leader was Li Lieh-kiun, ex-governor of the province. On July 12, 13 and 14, a three days' engagement took place at Kiukiang. On the second day the rebels, thanks to the better artillery of the North, were routed. They fled southward and were pursued during the whole next day. The limited number of the Northerners hindered them from achieving a complete victory and it was decided to await further reinforcements. When these arrived, a vigorous movement was made against Hukow, a strong place commanding the entrance to the Poyang lake. Fighting began here on July 25, and the next day the forts were taken from the rebels. Li Lieh-kiun, who commanded them, escaped and took refuge on a Japanese gunboat anchored in the neighborhood. This victory gave the Northerners control of the Yangtze river, the entrance to the lake and all communications by water with the centre and south of Kiangsi Province. It was only on August 18 that Nanchang, the capital city, was entered, and by the end of the month the entire province was back again in the hands of the Government, the campaign here having lasted a month and a half. Later on the rebel leaders were all degraded, the Provincial Assembly dissolved, several plotters executed—among them a member of the National Parliament—and a high official appointed to pacify the country and help to re-establish peace and order.

Adjoining Kiangsi, to the West, is the turbulent province of Hunan. When the rebellion broke out, it was expected that Hunan troops would join in the "punitive expedition" against Yuan, but the province contented itself with severing all connection with the North and declaring itself independent. The rebels avenged themselves by sending to Changsha, the capital, one of their members, who blew up the arsenal on the night of July 7. Henceforth till the end of the month the local papers carried on a violent campaign of insults against Yuan Shi-kai, calling him a "tyrant, robber, murderer and conspirator." The Provincial Assembly appealed to the other provinces not to acknowledge the National Parliament, which was but a sham, its members being coerced by Yuan. Hoang Hsing, the great rebel leader and who belonged to this province (AMERICA, September 20, 1913), also signed a loan for $15,000,000 with Japan, and gave as security the rich coal and silver mines of the country.

Proceeding further to the South, we find the Province of Kuang-tung, with its large population of 32,000,000 inhabitants. Like Hunan, the Governor-General and the Provincial Assembly agreed to declare the province independent. All news about the victories of the Northern troops in Kiangsi was carefully suppressed and the papers warned that if they disobeyed their offices would be closed up forthwith. Later on, the Governor charged Yuan Shi-kai with twelve serious crimes against the republic and the people, and threatened to send an army of 50,000 men to crush him. Happily it was but a threat, and before the Governor had time to act, Lung Tsi-koang, a loyal general from Koangsi, the province West of Koangtung, marched against him at the head of 30,000 men. At their approach the rebel Governor fled to Hongkong and thence to Japan. On August 12 and 13 fighting took place between the rebel troops and the loyalists, the latter getting the upper hand and entering Canton city, which they still hold. The loyal general has now disbanded the Provincial Assembly, and is endeavoring to suppress piracy, robbery and outlawry, which have followed everywhere in the wake of the rebellion. On September 17 a new conspiracy was discovered, with the result that the chief of the police was sentenced to be shot by express orders received from Peking.

Although Kiangsi started the rebellion on the plea that the troops sent from the North were a menace to local autonomy, the great storm-centre was in Kiangsu Province. Here the rebels mustered a strong force of 25,000 men, commanded by Hoang Hsing and Chen Ki-mei (see AMERICA, September 20, 1913). The latter centred his efforts chiefly around Shanghai, where he endeavored at the head of 6,000 men to storm the Government arsenal. The value of the place was principally moral. If the establishment fell into the hands of the Southerners, all the centre and South would have declared for the rebels, the country would be cut in twain and China would be plunged into a civil war for many years.

In the early part of July Juan Shi-kai had dispatched 1,500 troops to hold this arsenal. On their arrival the local papers waxed indignant and proclaimed that they should rather be sent against Mongolia or to help in recovering Tibet. On July 17 the rebel leaders offered a sum of $37,000 to the Northern general if he and his troops, as well as the ships in the river, would come over to their side. The general refused and the next day Shanghai declared itself independent. The Chamber of Commerce, the gentry and the leading merchants of the place protested against the step, but they were not listened to. On the 21st the "Kuomintang" party seized the Government telegraph station within the Foreign Settlements. The director had so far furnished all rebel secrets and movements to the North, and it was considered necessary to supplant him and place one of their own men in the office. The Settlement Executive, through its own police, ejected the rebel intruders and restored the place to its lawful director.

On July 23 the rebels, numbering about 6,000, opened fire on the arsenal and attempted to storm it. The attack lasted from 3 A. M. till 7, when the Southerners withdrew, repulsed by the sturdy Northerners. The excessive heat of the season—the thermometer registering daily from 90 to 95 degrees Fahr.—compelled both parties to choose the night for all heavy attacks. During five successive nights, an interruption taking place on Sunday, July 27, a splendid duel of artillery took place. The navy in the river cooperated, flashing at times its powerful searchlights on the enemy, and at others firing its heavy cannon. On the 29th the Southerners found they were thoroughly worsted and decided to give up the struggle. They had then used all available ammunition, were destitute of funds and had 2,000 of their men killed and wounded. The Northerners on their side had fought with dauntless bravery, advancing their lines far into the country, seizing the railway station and securing their position against any possible surprise or further attack of the enemy. Yuan Shi-kai felt proud of his generals, and to show his satisfaction he had many promoted and forwarded a large sum of money to be distributed among the troops.

Defeated at Shanghai, the rebels fled to the Woosung forts, twelve miles further down the river, and these held out for a full fortnight against the combined attack of the Northern army and navy. Meanwhile divisions broke out in the ranks of the rebels and the majority of the troops refused to fight. On the night of August 12 the leaders hurriedly fled to Kading, a neighboring city. Sixty wheelbarrows conveyed their baggage and a large amount of rice was sold on the way. The next morning, August 13, the forts surrendered, or as some say, were bought off by the Northerners. Another victory was thus secured and a stronghold seized, giving access to Shanghai and to all cities situated up the Yangtze valley.

Nanking, the old capital of the South, was now the only city still held by the rebels. It was therefore resolved to attack it without delay and restore the place to the allegiance of the North. To attain this much-desired result Yuan dispatched three army corps to the South. The first, composed of 15,000 men, was under the command of General Chang Hsun, a man of the old type, rough and uncouth in manners but of stern will and purpose, and eager to retrieve his inglorious flight from Nanking in the days of the Manchu downfall. The other two were under the control of Generals Feng Kuo-chang and Chu, the former present-day Viceroy of Chihli and the latter stationed at Yangchow, in Kiangsu. Both of these armies comprised a force of 20,000 men, against whom the rebels mustered at most only 10,000. Slowly and surely the Northerners advanced near the walls, seized all the heights surrounding the city, and made repeated attacks at the gates. The defenders in the beginning held out bravely and at times inflicted serious losses on the Northerners. Little by little, however, heavy cannonading from the hill-tops, constant fighting day and night and the impossibility of recruiting their ranks told on their valor. The city was taken by the Northerners on September 1st and, sad to state, given over to the horrors of pillage during three full days and nights. The rebels before leaving had already their pick, but what they did was little when compared with the clean and thorough sweep made by the troops of Chang Hsun. Meanwhile the General kept outside the city, lolling in a railway car, and only made his entry on the 4th, when a proclamation was issued ordering that henceforth the looting should cease. Thousands are now homeless, 600 children have been kidnapped from their parents, and misery and suffering await the wretched population on the approach of winter and over the cold season. A splendid opportunity has been offered to adopt civilized methods, show benevolence, protect property and maintain order, but in this Chang Hsun and his troops have failed. Their misdeeds dishonor the army and will not promote the much-desired union between North and South.

With the fall of Nanking, the rebellion is probably ended. Two months have sufficed to quell it. During this time no serious reverse has been sustained by the Government troops, and only at Hukow, Shanghai and Nanking has a vigorous resistance been offered. Yuan Shikai has shown great foresight and the country has seen that he is a power in the land. After putting down the rebellion there still remains the work of conciliation and reorganization, and this will be long and difficult. The rebel leaders are all harbored in Japan and may once again plot against the young Republic. The rule of the sword must therefore be maintained for some time, otherwise the Government cannot protect itself against anarchy and disorder. In the general opinion Yuan Shikai will be soon elected President. He has so far steered the Republic through troublous waters, the people trust him more than any other man in the country, and Foreign Powers will support him morally and financially.

IN MISSION FIELDS

Trials and Triumphs in Southern Nigeria

Space prevents us from giving in full an interesting account of an African Mission in the British Colony of Southern Nigeria, which appears in The Good Work for December, published by the Society for the Propagation of the Faith, Archdiocese of New York, under the editorship of the Very Rev. John J. Dunn, 462 Madison avenue, New York City. The following extracts, showing the trials and triumphs of the missionaries, should encourage Catholic to give generous support to this and other struggling missions in heathen lands.

The Catholic Mission at Onitsha, in the British Colony of Southern Nigeria, is conducted by the Fathers of the Holy Ghost. Onitsha is a port on the River Niger,—which is, of course, one of Africa's greatest waterways. It is a place of much importance now, and will be of more importance in future. . . . The Mission headquarters stands upon a bluff, looking out away across the Niger, here, two hundred miles from the sea, more than a mile wide. . . .

The Mission dates from December, 1885, when Father Lutz, with one other priest and two Brothers, arrived at Onitsha, and began work. . . .

For several months in each year, during the season of low river, Onitsha looks across the expanse of the Niger to vast stretches of yellow sandbanks, miles and miles in extent. Twenty-five years ago these banks swarmed with traders of the Igara tribe, their merchandise—chiefly slaves. Year by year, a vast slave-market went on for months there. The supply was plentiful and prices not high; a piece of cloth would purchase a lad. In the Missions, every single penny that could be earned, begged, saved, was turned into cloth, or tobacco, or beads, or salt, or gunpowder. Daily during the season Father Lutz voyaged across the river in a tiny dug-out canoe, and bargained with the merchants. Daily he returned with his purchases, poor creatures torn from home and family, but now, thanks to him, free. . . .

Father Lutz lived just long enough to see the Mission well started. Anxiety, hardship, over-work, killed him, and another stepped into his place. After five years' work and suffering, only 378 people had been received into the Church. Most of these were redeemed slaves. In that year—1890—there were four priests and two Brothers alive in the Mission. . . .

Lepers and twin-children share in the unpopularity of indiscreet wizards, and fare in like manner with them. Like them, and like the slaves, they found refuge and mercy at the Missions. So in the year 1895 we find 870 Catholics, chiefly ex-slaves, witches, lepers, and twins. The poor had the Gospel preached to them, and practised on them. The cost to the Mission, in personnel, was enormous, but the work went on. No sooner did a man fall than his place was taken by another eager volunteer.

In the year 1900 the third successive head of the Mission died. A fourth took command, and died in 1905, in which year the present Superior, Father Shanahan, was appointed. The first twenty years of the Mission cost the lives of four Superiors, besides those of many priests and Brothers.

In this same year, 1900, the territory of which Onitsha is a centre was taken over by the Imperial Government, so that it now forms part of the Colony of Southern Nigeria. From that event dates an era of wonderful progress.

Between 1885 and 1900 only one Mission Station, additional to Onitsha, had been opened. This was at a place called Aguleri, where the "king," a man named Idigo, became a Catholic, all his family following suit. Thus began a process which resulted in the existing Christian village of 575 souls. In 1911 there were seven principal Mission Stations: Onitsha, Aguleri, Ogboli, Calabar, Nteje, Azubuli, and Igbariam. . . .

With the assistance of their people the missionaries themselves build up their houses of stone or brick, quarrying the stone and burning the bricks. They cut down trees in the forest and make all the timber parts of the house, the furniture, etc., on the spot.

At present there lies, close beside the Mission House at Onitsha, a vast heap of stones—1,200 cubic yards—gathered stone by stone. Each of these stones has been torn, one by one, from the unwilling flank of a hill in the neighborhood, and carried in triumph, on a human being's head, to its present resting-place.

The chapels which are going up as soon as the lime and cement and corrugated iron can be got, will be permanent chapels. If the people at home would assist with stipends for Masses, or by founding Masses, the help would be very real, and Father Shanahan's Mission at Onitsha, Southern Nigeria, would rejoice.

Of the four stalwarts who started the Mission in 1885, only one survives. He was sent home once in a dying state. But he didn't die, and went back to his post, and there he is to-day. Others stayed as much as sixteen years in the Mission Field, and then died there, or at home, having been sent back for that purpose.

Greeting

The first jubilant note of the Church in announcing the Christmas festival proclaims that "the King of Peace is greater than all the kings of the entire earth; and the whole world longs for His countenance." She beholds the centuries that preceded and the centuries that followed His coming, fixing their gaze upon Him, some in love and some in hatred, and she knows that in their heart of hearts all men feel that He alone can bring peace to men and to the nations.

That this peace, which surpasseth understanding and whose measure is determined by the world's knowledge and love of Him, may fill to overflowing the hearts of all, and especially of those who are striving to extend His Kingdom on earth, is the wish that AMERICA sends forth to-day.

The Cant of "Sincerity"

Of all varieties of cant there is none more nauseating than that used nowadays by the producers and exploiters of indecent books, pictures, plays and films. What is filthy is termed "sincere," the immodest is called "artistic," the disgusting is misnamed "strong," while plot and dialogue that cannot fail to awaken the lowest passions are described as "teaching a valuable moral lesson." Though managers who present "musical comedies" seem to have persuaded the theatre-going public what professes to be "light and amusing," may, without blame, treat as non-existent the Sixth Commandment, it remained for the producers and promoters of the salacious "problem play" and the debasing moving-picture show to add to a disregard for the decencies of life canting hypocrisy. For example, the final slide of a film called "The Inside of the White Slave Traffic" recently gave New York spectators the smug assurance that the purpose of the entertainment was "to teach a great moral lesson." So eager was the public to lay to heart the priceless "lesson," that "several hundred persons," the press reports, "were turned away when the exhibition began, and a large proportion of the audience was composed of young girls from 16 to 18 years of age. Fully two-thirds of the audience were women." Abominable as was that highly "moral" moving-picture show, the cant that is written about the manager's zeal for social purity is a great deal worse. If there is anybody unsophisticated enough to believe that those women and girls flocked to see "The Inside of the White Slave Traffic" because of a romantic love of virtue, he should no longer expose himself to the contagion of the world's slow stain, but flee at once to an anchorite's cell.

As for the wicked nonsense that is so commonly talked and written nowadays about the marvellous benefits that are sure to follow the diffusion of novels which make "sexuality" their one theme, Dr. Lyttleton the Headmaster of Eton, observes in a sensible letter he wrote to the London Times:

"There seems to be an idea abroad that if sexual questions and problems are thrust upon the attention of boys and girls by some one who calls himself a 'sincere' artist, no harm is done; that the community will in some unexplained way be better for it; and that if anyone hesitates to encourage the spread of such writings he is an arrant and presumptuous busybody. But what ignorance all this seems! Those who are working and hoping, however feebly, to encompass the lives of our boys and girls with wholesome atmosphere must know that in regard to sexuality two facts stand out. First, that in proportion as the adolescent mind grows absorbed in sex questions wreckage of life ensues. Secondly, that sanity and upright manliness are destroyed, not only by the reading of obscene stuff, but by a premature interest in sex matters, however it be excited; for the vital question for each youngster is whether or not the true perspective of things is being disturbed by what he sees, hears and reads. Those, therefore, who in responsible positions are trying to do their duty to the country are not concerned with the dispute whether a sex-novel is 'artistic' or not. They know that the more attractively it is written, the more harm it will do."

Of course. Those who write, publish, sell and recommend these "sincere," "artistic," "strong" or "gripping" novels that treat shamelessly of sexual sins are, with few exceptions, actuated by the most sordid motives, as everybody is perfectly aware save downright simpletons. Let us have an end then of this disgusting cant.

What to Say, and How to Say It

On Sunday, November 30, the Right Reverend Abbot Gasquet said in St. Patrick's Cathedral, that the Church of England owed its birth to the love affair of Henry VIII, whatever professional controversialists may say to the contrary. The Rector of St. Thomas's Episcopal Church, holding that as his was the nearest Episcopal Church to the Cathedral, he had a special obligation to refute the statement, began by calling the Abbot's sermon a "flagrant example of what not to say, and how not to say it." This seems to us an example of redundancy. If a thing is not to be said, there can be no possible way of saying it. We are going to take the liberty of pointing out to the Rector what he should have said and how he should have said it.

He controverted the Abbot's assertion that up to the time of Henry VIII, England had been loyal to the Holy See, by declaring vaguely that from the time of William the Conqueror there was abundant evidence of the spirit of independence in the Church of England. He should have pointed out, if he could find it, a single case of an English King, from William the Conqueror to Henry VII, declaring unequivocally the independence of the Church within his realm with regard to the spiritual supremacy of the Roman Pontiff. Otherwise, in view of the fact that during all that time king and people actually depended on the Holy See as the supreme spiritual authority, a fact incontrovertible, he should have held his peace.

He supported his contention by quoting the opening words of Magna Charta: "The Church of England shall be free." He should have quoted more exactly, not omitting the important phrase: "and enjoy freedom of election." He should have explained that a charter being a concession of privileges, or a recognition of rights by the crown, touches those rights and privileges only as they may be invaded by the crown. He should have remarked that the invasion of the freedom of the Church, and especially of freedom of election, had been a not uncommon crime of kings, including John himself; that in consequence the provision we are discussing had been placed in other charters. He should have pointed out that the prime mover in the matter of the Charter was Cardinal Stephen Langton, whom Innocent III had of his supreme authority made Archbishop of Canterbury, setting aside both the choice of the Chapter and the nominee of John. He should have noticed that two Papal Legates were engaged in the matter of the Charter and in procuring it a place in the laws of England. In a word, he should have abandoned the false notions of Church of England apologists, studied history, and told his hearers that the object of the provision in question was to deliver the Church from being the occasional victim of that tyranny which became the law of the land under Henry VIII and had nothing to do with the Pope.

He added that the real separation from Rome came with Elizabeth. He should have said that then came the full growth from the seed, that had there been no love affair of Henry VIII, there would not have been an Elizabeth to complete the work, nor an Edward VI, a consequence of another love affair, to prepare for its completion.

He stated that Rome caused the schism under Elizabeth—he might as well say that the Council of Nice caused the Arian schism—that Rome seldom, if ever, refers to this schism, from which it appears that he has forgotten very conveniently the whole controversy about Anglican orders, for instance. He should have said, that from her accession, Elizabeth worked for the Reformation. If she went slowly and politically about the matter, it was not the breach with Rome or essential Protestantism that troubled her, but the fear of exaggerated Puritanism, in which she saw a real danger for her crown.

He asked whether the Abbot had not made a mistake in saying that there had been a disintegration in the nations that had rejected Papal supremacy? To prove that mistake he brought forward England and the United States on one side, and France, Spain, Italy and South America on the other. He should have said that the Abbot was perfectly right. A nation disintegrates when the bonds of authority and religion are broken. Of these the Holy See was the guardian in every country where its religious supremacy was untrammelled. With unprejudiced historians it is a commonplace that rebellion and impiety, callousness of the rich and oppression of the poor came in with the Reformation, and were perfected by the Revolution. He should have pointed out the condition of rural England after the Reformation, with its poor laws, the fanaticism of English Puritans, the fact that it set the example to other peoples in the matter of executing sovereigns, and have gone on to its sad condition to-day. He should have explained that the condition of France, Spain, Italy and South America is due, not to the Church, but to the revolutionary agencies working against it. He might have remarked that religion is far from dead in these countries, and that when we get to heaven it is not impossible that we may find the English race in a minority among a very large majority of Celts and Latins. He should have laid down, too, the patent fact that the United States is unique among Western non-Catholic nations in this, that it has never rejected the spiritual supremacy of the Holy See. The circumstances of its origin made necessary the abstraction from all questions of religion, the Constitution forbids any law for the establishment of a religion. But it contains no act of formal apostacy. For this, we believe, a special blessing rests on it. On the other hand, let the Rector notice that there can be no such thing as the American Church.

But all these things mean study, and this, as a rule, is not a characteristic of Protestant Episcopalianism.

Bible Sunday

We noticed a couple of weeks ago how a Canadian clergyman objected to the Anti-Tuberculosis Society's interference with existing arrangements, under which the Second Sunday in Advent had been made "Bible Sunday." We may assume that the Episcopalians directed the choice to that Sunday, because of the collect they have given it, which is a favorite prayer at all Bible Society meetings; and so we may listen first to what some of that denomination in Montreal had to say on "Bible Sunday," and then hear ministers of the other sects.

A Dr. Symonds told his hearers that at one time the Bible was thought to be pure allegory; afterwards it was taken to be a book of exact doctrine, and now scientific study shows it to be the literature of a great people having for its central aim—what is a central aim?—the teaching of the supremacy of God. He did not say when the Bible was thought to be pure allegory. According to his division it must have been in very early times, which seems unhistorical; nor how he reconciled his sermons with the prayer he had just recited, in which he said that God had "caused all Holy Scripture to be written for our learning," and that what we are to learn from it is "to embrace and hold fast the blessed truths of everlasting life," given "through our Saviour Jesus Christ."

A Mr. Shatford said that the Bible is infallible, inasmuch as it was a guide as to character. He did not explain what he meant by this misty expression, but went on to boast that more Bibles are distributed in China than in England. The newspaper heading translated this into "Chinese are devouring the Word of God." China has changed greatly in the last two years. We know the uses to which the Chinese put the Bible in other days, and we hope it is true that they are now treating it more honorably, even though the devouring of it be an hyperbole.

Dr. Smyth explained the art of Bible study, in which the mind must work in conjunction with the heart. Canon Renaud did not agree with the Cathedral preacher, Dr. Symonds. For him the Bible has "a prophetic strain running through all its pages, with Christ as the one aim." Evidently the word "aim," vaguely figurative, is a favorite term. It does not commit one to anything very definite.

Next come the Presbyterians. Dr. Johnson looked upon the Bible as the best work to circulate among the "cosmopolitan people" coming to Canada. He did not explain why, or if he did, his explanation did not impress the reporter. Neither did he define for his hearers a "cosmopolitan people," nor mention the names of some of them in Canada. His brother minister, Dr. Hanson, conveniently figurative, called the Bible "a temple to the glory of God." Mr. Ballantyne boasted of the successful resistance the Bible makes to attacks from all quarters. Evidently he is not familiar with the sermons of other ministers.

Among the Methodists, a Mr. Radley remarked that "experience of men walking close to God had given to their writings the weight of inspiration." From this we gather that, for Mr. Radley, Wesley's hymns and Law's Serious Call, are no less the Word of God than the Bible. Mr. Potter thought that if children read the Bible there would be fewer of them in the Juvenile Court. A Congregational minister, Dr. Padley, did not think much of the Bible as a book for the theologian. We wonder where he got the divinity of which he calls himself a Doctor.

"It is a book for the people," and "the knowledge derived from it becomes religious only when applied to life." There is, then, no room for faith in Dr. Padley's divinity.

All seems to have dodged the topic which should have been uppermost in their minds on Bible Sunday: "The Bible, the Word of God." They might as well have talked about Tuberculosis.

English Catholic Mayors

The recent election or appointment of good Catholic men to prominent civic positions has been commented on widely, and also favorably, except by the narrow group of fanatics who would give nothing good to a Catholic, especially if he is a good one. The fashion seems to have set in in England also. Alderman McCabe was unanimously elected Mayor of the Protestant city of Manchester, and the choice received general approval, except, strange to say, from a few Catholic Unionists, who feared that the wreckage of the Empire was endangered by the election of a Nationalist Irishman to the Mayoralty of one of its greatest cities. Several other cities have risked a similar peril, and the latest mail informs us that Wallsend-on-Tyne has installed John O'Hanlon in its civic chair, and that Alderman McCann has become Mayor of Dewsbury.

Nor had the "Catholic vote" anything to do with it. They were elected solely, because being good Catholics and capable men, they were thoroughly reliable. They had all three been Catholics first, and therefore became good Mayors afterwards. Mayor McCabe, retaining his Catholic conscience intact under his Mayoral robes, declined to attend heretical service with the Corporation in the Protestant Cathedral. For this alleged intolerance he was bitterly rebuked by the Dean of Manchester, but the Dean was in turn rebuked in the Manchester Guardian by a fellow-Anglican, who thinks the Mayor deserves the respect of the whole community for having in this instance, as previously, set it a noble example of straightforward manliness and religious consistency. "In these days of religious indefiniteness it is a matter for devout thankfulness to find a public man acting according to his religious convictions."

Mayor O'Hanlon marched in state to Mass at St. Columba's Church, followed in procession by the corporation, the police, the fire brigade, and all representative citizens, who like a man of character. Mayor McCann did likewise at St. Paulinus' Church, in Dewsbury, and also took care that the presence of the councillors, justices, and other Protestants who filled the church, would not be merely physical. He had seen to it that each of them was presented with a copy of the Ordinary of the Mass, so that they might follow the services intelligently and reverently. This, by the way, might be taken as a needful reminder by the numerous Catholics who neglect to provide themselves with a Mass-book and, as far as onlookers can see, assist at Mass by physical presence only. We are not surprised to learn that "Mayor McCann has never concealed his religion, and his firmness and consistency have won respect for the Catholic religion in Dewsbury." May his tribe increase.

LITERATURE

Songs from Leinster. By W. M. LETTS. Philadelphia: David McKay. $1.00 net.

Poems that are thoroughly Irish in thought and feeling, and therefore Catholic in tone, have been surprising us from time to time in English reviews and magazines that are wont to pursue an opposite tendency; so that exceptional merit only could account for their admission amid such environment. They have now come to America in the shape of "Songs from Leinster," and have been already welcomed and blessed by T. A. Daly, the one among us, probably, who knows best how an Irish song should sing, and is least inclined to bestow his praises lightly. They are all short—there are 54 in 100 pages—but each is a character sketch, loving, meaty, simple, truthful, of the good homefolk of the southeastern Leinster border. They are realistic, painfully so when the author leaves the Wexford and Wicklow villages she loves to wander in the Dublin slums, but even here there is relief. While "wondering now does God look down upon the town," she visits the Carmelite church at Christmas, and:

"Foreinst the crib there kneels a little child,
Behind him in her ragged shawl his mother,
For all the ages that have passed one child
Still finds God in another.
And there's our Saviour lying in the hay,
Behind him in her shawl His watchful mother;
Two mothers with their sons, each knows the joys
And sorrows of the other.
The father kneels away there by the door
The hands he clasps in prayer are rough with labor;
The likes of him that hunger and that toil
Once called Saint Joseph neighbor.
Outside the Church the people travel by,
The sick and sad, the needy, the neglected.
But just across the threshold Bethlehem lies,
Where none will be rejected."

The same subject is beautifully treated in "The Christmas Guest," showing what the Irish mother would do if Mary came to her door, "the Rose of the World upon her breast." There is exquisite humor too, as in the "Choice," of a husband which a young lady asks St. Joseph to make for her. She names quite a number, but there are objections to each, and she finally leaves it to the Saint:

"I'd have Saint Joseph choose me a comrade rich and kind—
And if it's Terry Sullivan—maybe I mightn't mind."

But the volume provides many a "choice" of genuine and pleasurable poetry to which the most critical will be hard put to find objection. M. K.

Hawthorne and His Publisher. By CAROLINE TICKNOR. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Co. $3.00.

William Davis Ticknor, with whose name the Golden Age of American literature will always be associated, was much more to Nathaniel Hawthorne than his publisher. For the author of "The Scarlet Letter," being the shyest and most unpractical of men, required some one to manage his affairs, safeguard his interests, and discharge for him numberless offices of friendship. Fortunately he found such a person in Miss Ticknor. For the latter not only published Hawthorne's books and gave him a generous royalty on them, but also took care of the author's property, was his friend, adviser and correspondent, and executed for him a variety of commissions that it would be hard to imagine a publisher undertaking to-day even for a writer of "best-sellers."

Miss Caroline Ticknor found in her possession some 150 letters which Hawthorne sent to her grandfather between the years 1851 and 1864 and this correspondence makes the body of a very interesting book. Hawthorne while consul at Liverpool used to write to his "Dear Tick," with a freedom of expression and a frankness of opinion that are rare in his books. "I am so sick and weary of this office," he complains, "that I should hardly regret it if they were to abolish it altogether. What with brutal shipmasters, drunken sailors, vagrant Yankees, mad people, sick people, and dead people (for just now I have to attend to the removal of the bones of a man who has been dead these twenty years), it is full of damnable annoyances. After all there are worse lives than that of an author—at least when he is so fortunate in his publishers as I am. I suppose some persons would console themselves with the dignity of that office, and public and private dinners, and the excellent opportunity of playing the great man on a small scale; but this is to me a greater bore than all the rest; so that you see I have nothing to comfort myself with but the emoluments." "After all the slander against Americans," he remarks in another letter, "there is no people worthy even to take a second place behind us, for liberality of idea and practice. The more I see of the rest of the world, the better I think of my own country (not that I like it very enthusiastically, either); and I thank God England's day is past forever. I have such a conviction of the decline and fall of England that I am about as well satisfied as if it had already taken place. And yet I like John Bull, too."

After holding the Liverpool consulship for four trying years, in 1857 Hawthorne cheerfully resigned the office and went to Italy, where he gathered material for "The Marble Faun," returning to the United States in 1860. He took so to heart the Civil War that was soon raging that he wrote but little during the few remaining years of his life. Though he started the "Dolliver Romance" in the Atlantic Monthly, he did not finish the story, for the sudden death of his friend Ticknor hastened his own, which occurred at Plymouth, N. H., May 18, 1864.

In addition to the fresh light Miss Ticknor's book throws upon the character and career of the man who is perhaps the greatest author America has produced, the volume tells again the story of the Atlantic's beginnings, sketches the history of the "Old Corner Bookstore" and gives interesting anecdotes and reminiscences of many literary folk who lived in New England and in Old, about the middle of the last century. History of Religions. By GEORGE FOOT MOORE, D.D., etc. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

The study of the false religions of antiquity is not altogether barren if one follows in it the principles laid down in the Holy Scriptures and the Fathers. In them may be found traces of the divine revelation made to our first parents, especially of the promise of the Redeemer, as well as traditions which, notwithstanding their corruption, show that in the beginning the early history of mankind as revealed in the first chapters of Genesis, was the common property of all men. From the degradation of those religions, the work of the devil, is confirmed the degradation of man consequent upon the fall, which lies at the root of Christianity. The casting aside of those principles and the taking instead of the evolutionary errors of to-day, makes such a study more than perilous, absolutely destructive of Christian faith. The notion that man has been ever struggling upward towards moral and physical perfection brings with it the ideas that in their day those false religions were relatively true, that from them were borrowed as myths the historical facts revealed by God concerning the origin of man, the fall, the promised restoration, the flood, and so on, that essentially there is no difference between the divinely revealed religion and the false systems, since that is assured to have grown out of these.

The book before us is written according to such false principles and ideas. It contains many things that would be interesting could we be sure that they are true. The fact is that to reconstruct the idolatries of the past is a most difficult task. It becomes impossible when one builds on a foundation of error.

The Four Gates. By Rev. EDWARD GARESCHÉ, S.J. New York: P. J. Kenedy & Co. $1.00 net.

"Four are the gates
To the splendors immortal,
Which the slow hours swing
Open, and close.
'Tis Heaven that waits
Just past the portal
Of Summer and Spring,
Of Autumn and Snows."

This is Father Garesché's introduction to the one hundred religious poems of the Seasons which he has enclosed in a tastefully bound volume of 130 pages. They consist mostly of short devotional verses—simple, yet thoughtful and skillfully wrought appealing at once to mind and heart—that have appeared in many magazines. A few of greater length, such as "The Brave of God," "St. Maurice to the Theban Legion," "The Church of the Immaculata" show that the author can rise with ease to more ambitious levels when he chooses. The intrinsic merits and the handsome appearance of the book make it a most suitable gift for Christmas or any other time.

Life and Characteristics of Right Reverend Alfred A. Curtis, D.D., Second Bishop of Wilmington. Compiled by the SISTERS OF THE VISITATION, Wilmington, Delaware. With a Preface by CARDINAL GIBBONS. New York: P. J. Kenedy & Sons. $2.50.

Self-effacement can hardly be set down as a characteristic virtue of the present age. It has not been a distinguishing trait of any age or people, for few and far between have been those who have hid their light under a bushel; but perhaps it will scarcely be a libel on the present generation of men to describe it as characteristically self-advertising. Hence it will be refreshing to persons of all classes to light upon the history of a man of our own time, who, though exceptionally gifted, intellectually and spiritually, made it one of the chief efforts of his life, to shun the notice of his fellow-man. Such a person was Bishop Curtis. The printed record of his deeds and utterances is necessarily meagre and imperfect, for he destroyed every scrap of writing that might furnish material for a biography. But the example of his great, though self-effacing life, could not so easily fade from the recollection of those who knew and loved him; and hence the devotion with which his friends have endeavored to perpetuate the memory of one whose life cannot but be an inspiration to future generations. The reader will find in the career of Bishop Curtis an actual realization of the possibilities of sanctification which exists even in an era of worldliness and self-worship.

The most unconventional of men, the most neglectful of some of the merely relative properties of life, he nevertheless in the long run drew much less attention to his peculiarities than to the deep inner source from which they sprang,—to that interior humility and that marvelous singleness of intention which made his outlook upon life much simpler than that of most of his fellow-men. To Bishop Curtis there was nothing unepiscopal, for instance, in mounting a bicycle if it enabled him to speed the faster to some neglected country district in quest of souls. It was a common thing enough to see him trudging through miles of snow-drifts in order to keep an engagement in some country church; and at times he might be seen even sweeping out the church and preparing the oil-lamps for the next day's festival, in places where there was neither priest nor sacristan. All this seemed to be the natural thing to the humble bishop. Hence no one was greatly surprised, though many were doubtless pained, when after ten years of episcopal government he resigned his see, but not in quest of ease, for he labored for many a year after in much the same fashion as before. His desire was to die in harness, and his desire was gratified. Living to his seventy-seventh year, he plodded and labored to the last.

The ultimate secret of his humility and self-sacrifice was his habitual union with God,—first and chiefly with God as residing in the depths of his soul, and next with God as dwelling in the Tabernacle. Devotion to the Blessed Sacrament was the great devotion of his life and, as the reader will see, it was the great stepping-stone by the aid of which he entered the Catholic Church. He approached the Blessed Sacrament chiefly in the spirit of adoration, and many a night of his life, whilst others slept, the bishop might be found prostrate on the floor of the cathedral in rapt and speechless adoration before the Tabernacle.

The latter half of the "Life and Characteristics" is taken up with specimens of the bishop's sermons and conferences as well as his notes on the Fathers. In some cases we have the entire text of discourses or plans of discourses, a remnant saved from the holocaust, in others his conferences as remembered by his hearers. Though perhaps needing in parts more annotation of an explanatory kind than is given it, this collection of characteristics will be regarded as a treasure by all who value truly apostolical preaching and who know how to prize the spoken or written word which is the expression of a saintly life.

The Fairy Minstrel of Glenmaiure. By EDMUND LEAMY. New York: Desmond Fitz Gerald. 75 cents net.

This is a beautiful book of fairy tales for children of all ages, and its illustrations and cover design are in keeping with the contents. It is a fit companion for Mr. Leamy's "Golden Spears and Other Fairy Tales," which Mr. John Redmond, M.P., justly pronounced the most winsome and educative of its kind. Both combine the purest of literary grace with a simplicity of narrative and a compelling interest that draw the youngest and the oldest to the last word of the story. Moreover the tales are always wholesome, and without any effort at moralizing or losing their fairy character. Mr. Leamy's amiable fairies instil many a Christian lesson in morals and manners. The Fairy Minstrel tells Emun the answers to two of the bad giant's questions:

"What is whiter than the snow of one night?" "A soul without sin." "What is blacker than the blackest night?" "A heart without gratitude."

But the third answer, on which his life depends, he must find for himself: "What is brighter than the stars of night?" Emun thinks of what children see in their dreams, and answers: "A mother's eyes."

The Springfield Republican finds "brightness, beauty, nobility of sentiment, purity of thought" and much else that is admirable in these stories, and commends them as reading matter for schools. We should like to see them also in every home where there are children.

Zu Füßen des Meisters. St. Louis: B. Herder. 80 cents. "At the Master's Feet" all Christians must sit and learn; but above all those who are called to be examples to the flock, other Christs, who, like Martha, are to minister to the Lord in His brethren, must with Mary at times sit at His feet and learn from Him, lest they merit the rebuke: "Thou art troubled about many things: but one thing is necessary." The daily meditation is that blessed time; half an hour would be short enough, but many priests will be unable to give it even so much. For such busy priests this little volume offers sufficient and wholesome food for short reflections. It is not a continuous presentation of the life of Christ; we have a number of excellent lives of Our Lord in English, but this selects scenes and words from the Gospel, compares and contrasts them with occurrences and duties in the life of a modern priest, not always with an exemplary sacerdotal life, but often with a life into which even a priest could fall if he forgot to sit at times at his Master's feet. The thoughts are presented in an aphoristic, illuminating and striking form. They are not fully developed but suggestive of further reflection. We have, for example, the Baptism of Christ—a type of ordination; Cana—the priest at banquets; Son and Mother—the relation of priest and relatives; Baptism of the Disciples—invidia clericalis; Nicodemus—converts; Master and Disciples—pastor and curates. A translation of the book with some adaptation to conditions in this country would prove a blessing for all priests who can not avail themselves of the German original. A. A. M.

The History of Modern Elementary Education. By SAMUEL CHESTER PARKER. New York: Ginn & Company.

The author of this volume deserves well of students of pedagogy. He has executed an instructive and entertaining book on certain phases of elementary education from the Middle Ages to our own time. His discussions are free from the taint of conscious prejudice; his style is simple and clear. True, his success in avoiding pitfalls has not always been as great as his effort deserves. There are slips; but there is no rancor. Now and then the language betrays emotions which are apt to cloud reason. The result is a slight blur more refreshing than otherwise.

Like most men of his faith and training, the author does not always evaluate Catholic doctrines and polity properly. He considers divorce a purely social problem in contradiction to a religious doctrine. As a consequence, he evidently fails to appreciate the Church's attitude in this matter. This too is the case in regard to the respect shown to Aristotle in the Middle Ages. The assertion that Universities of the Middle Ages sanctioned by the Church, sometimes considered the works of Aristotle as infallible and universal a guide as the Bible and the commentaries of the Fathers, is so far from the truth that refutation is unnecessary. Moreover, Tetzel and indulgences might have been given a lengthier and fairer exposition. It is impossible to do justice to such topics in two lines and a half. The author's treatment of them is far from satisfactory. Though it is sadly true that an economic aspect was only too often accentuated in connection with indulgences, yet Tetzel has not been fairly convicted of hawking them at a price. On the contrary, he has emerged from critical scrutiny a friar of unimpeachable life and sound theological training. Such traits were sufficient to save him from the wretched crime attributed to him. The author is weak in theology and church history. Sutor, ne supra crepidam judicaret. Thus, his statement about belief in the early Church, the Nicene Creed, the growth of the idea of the Papacy and the supposed tolerance of Elizabeth are apt to mislead uncritical readers.

On the other hand, he is fearless and true in his estimate of such topics as Puritan education, the effect of the Reformation on schools, the vernacular Bible before Luther's time and the value of Bacon's contribution to science. When all has been said, the book remains a good contribution to the history of elementary education—conspicuous for many merits rather than offensive for glaring defects. R. H. T.

The Real America in Romance. An Authentic History of America from the Discovery to the Present Day. Profusely Illustrated with Portraits of Historical Characters and Views of the Sacred and Memorable Places of Our Native Land. Edited by EDWIN MARKHAM. Complete in 13 Volumes. Art Edition. Chicago: William H. Wise & Co. $90.00.

The idea Mr. Markham had in editing these sumptuous volumes was, as he tells us in the preface, to make the reading of history become "a matter of genuine pleasure," rather than a "downright drudgery" as it is commonly considered. With this questionable object in view into the historical narrative of the events that have taken place in this country during the past four hundred years, he introduces imaginary characters who participate in the memorable deeds of their generation. Hernando Estévan, for instance, is a lad who accompanies Columbus on his voyages of discovery, which are described in the first volume of this work, he subsequently weds a fair Spanish maiden and his descendants figure prominently in each of the following volumes. For two of Hernando's grandchildren are kidnapped by Drake and brought to England where they start the Stevens family, members of which are found with Dewey and Roosevelt in the Spanish-American war. Each volume is meant to be complete in itself and hold the reader like a good historical novel. These objects are fairly well attained.

As a "romantic" history Mr. Markham's work may leave little to be desired, but as an "authentic" history it cannot be so highly praised. The writers seem eager to avoid making any statement that will offend Catholics, but out of a desire to render the work picturesque and complete, too much matter is brought in about the religious wars of Europe and those who took part in them, which is not always accurate. We have in Vol. III, for example, the conventional Protestant account of the "Massacre of Vassy," while John Calvin and other such leaders are eulogized. In a well-meant account of the Jesuits given in Vol. VII we meet the unfortunate phrase: "They surrender their individuality to their superiors," and in Vol. II the Inquisition with its "dim, candle-smoked room" in the "crypt of the cathedral" is needlessly dragged in, and Las Casas is represented wresting a "heretic" from the Inquisitors' clutches.

As the design of "The Real America in Romance" requires that great prominence be given those events that best lend themselves to dramatic treatment, the trumpet and drum is seldom long silent in the work, and the triumphs of peace are not sufficiently emphasized. To a one-sided account, for instance, of the Spanish-American war, a conflict which lasted only a few months, Mr. Markham devotes nearly the whole of a five-hundred-page volume that is supposed to cover the period between 1868 and 1910. But as the readers of "romantic" histories are not as a rule very critical, they will scarcely consider defects like the foregoing serious blemishes, and will not notice minor inaccuracies like that on page 306 of Vol. VI, where Father Hennepin is called "Marquette's colleague and companion," though the Jesuit explorer probably never met the Récollet friar. "The Real America in Romance" is richly illustrated with more than 3,000 excellent photographic engravings in half-tone of the persons, places and events, most memorable in our country's story, each of the thirteen volumes is well-indexed and the printer and binder have done their work admirably. W. D.

When the Spectator's reviewer observed a few weeks ago that the Jesuits' "great and irrefutable condemnation is this—that every enterprise which they attempt has ended in failure," J. P.

Davis, who is no doubt an imperfectly disguised Jesuit, wrote to the Spectator just to say:

"Might not some such remark have well been made by an unbelieving Jew on Calvary? Strangely, though, the successes of Christianity always appear to be founded upon outward or seeming failure. Christianity is never so virile as after persecution. Defeat is the sign of victory. Apparent death is the sign of a resurrection. 'The blood of martyrs is the seed of the Church.' If, then, it is true that while their works perish the Jesuits still fight on, that, in the order of religion, is the proof of their success. What religion needs is the spirit of the Society of Jesus. May not the works which perish be merely the outward and visible sign of the work which endures?"

"Quite true," was the Spectator's crushing reply, "if it were a case of mere material or worldly failure. The Jesuit failure is a spiritual failure. . . . Go into any great Jesuit church such as that in Venice, and look round. The whole vast fabric is in the grip of the worst type of mortmain."

But J. P. Davis was unreasonable enough to be unconvinced by this appeal to the architecture of a Venetian church as a proof of the failure of every Jesuit enterprise, and in a subsequent number of the Spectator even dared to consider the answer:

"So astonishingly lame that one can only reluctantly conclude that it is mere prejudice. How on earth can one test the spirituality of a religious order by inspecting the fabrics of its churches? One can presumably imagine anything one likes about a priesthood by going into empty temples and looking round. Why not inquire whether, for example, the Jesuits are sought after and valued by those of their own faith as preachers, as confessors, as parish priests, as instructors of youth, and so forth? And why not begin with our own country? There are many Jesuits here in no disguise. Such would seem more reasonable tests of spiritual value if the truth is really desired."

Whereat, the Spectator, deeply pained at its correspondent's perverse blindness, referred him for enlightenment to Clough's "Amours de Voyage," spoke sorrowfully of perinde ac cadaver and prudently announced that, "We cannot continue this controversy." These logical rejoinders of the Spectator reflect admirably the mental attitude of the English middle classes toward Catholicism.

George A. Birmingham's latest book "Irishmen All" (Frederick A. Stokes Co., $1.75) is little more than a rehash of his previous sketches of Irish life as seen from a Protestant rectory. Canon Hannay tries to eke out paucity of matter with the humor of cheap cynicism and glaring hyperbole. Being a parson he deems himself qualified to pronounce on the priest, and balances some patronizing praise with approval of the notorious "Father Ralph," the venomous slander of an apostate. He is greatly concerned lest the Irish priests have not "beheld the heavenly Vision," presumably because they do not write worldly novels and farcical skits and go play-acting around the world.

The devotional literature published by the American Central Office of the Apostleship of Prayer, 801 W. 181st St., New York, is having a remarkably wide popularity, as the following figures indicate: Father O'Rourke's "Under the Sanctuary Lamp" is in its twenty-eighth thousand, and his "Fountains of the Saviour" in its tenth; 15,000 copies of Father Dwight's "Our Daily Bread" have left the press and 10,000 of his "King's Table"; Father Donnelly's "Heart of the Gospel" has reached the 11,000 mark, and his "Heart of Revelation" is in its fifth thousand, while Father Garesché's "Your Neighbor and You" is not so far behind that figure. More than 61,000 copies of the "Messenger Series" have already been sold and the demand for "sets" is still so constant that the publishers are now offering, as we see by a package lately received, the seven volumes, attractively boxed, for $3.35. The success of the series seems to have had a stimulating effect on the Catholic book trade for several Barclay street publishers now have out "Fifty Cent Standard Libraries" that are selling well. The January issue of the Messenger of the Sacred Heart, which is the "Christmas number," and is richly illustrated accordingly with pictures in color, has made its appearance in good season and has a circulation of 250,000 copies, while the "League Almanac's" issue this year of 175,000 will soon be bought up.

"The Vatican" (D. Appleton & Co., $4.00) by Rt. Rev. Canon Hugues de Ragnau is an extended review of the constitution and personnel of the central government of the Church, its varied activities through the centuries, its relation to secular rulers and governments, to clergy, education, heresies, schisms and social, scientific and spiritual movements. Its comprehensiveness and balance render it a useful work of reference on a subject of universal interest; and style and binding as well as matter make it a suitable Christmas gift. It will be reviewed in a later issue.

The "Angel Guardian Press" of Boston have issued "Lyrics of Faith and Hope" by Henry Coyle, and "Lyrics and Songs" by Mrs. E. G. Pember. The former consists of 130 pages of short devotional verses which are good in measure and matter; the latter in 79 pages intersperses some happy songs on homely themes with many finely conceived and well-turned poems on pious subjects. Mrs. Pember's poems are introduced in a modest preface by Rev. Frederick Pember. The productions of both authors have frequently appeared in the Catholic press.

Catholics who have long been reading with profit and pleasure the articles in prose and verse contributed to various periodicals and particularly to the New York Times Review of Books by Mr. Joyce Kilmer will be gratified to learn that he and his wife were recently received into the Church.

THE DRAMA

Modern Sex Plays Condemned as Pernicious

At a meeting of the Society of Sanitary and Moral Prophylaxis, held on December 11, at the New York Academy of Medicine Building, practically every one of the speakers condemned the "sex plays" that hold the boards of our local theatres. A notable address was that of Mr. Joyce Kilmer who said:

"Vice is a monster of so frightful mien
As to be hated needs but to be seen.
Yet seen too oft, familiar with her face,
We first endure, then pity, then embrace."

This expression of what is a universal and eternal truth has a direct bearing on certain plays which have recently been held up to our admiration as instruments of sex education in spite of the fact that they make sexual immorality and the evils which accompany and follow them, things not hideous and terrible but tawdry, commonplace—as unreal and contemptible as any of the ordinary phenomena of the theatre.

This is only one of the counts against the modern play dealing with morbid sex relationship but it is the chief positive charge. Before considering it in detail it may be well to look at the negative side of the question. Education is defined by the Standard Dictionary as "The systematic development and cultivation of the normal powers of intellect, feeling and conduct so as to render them efficient in some particular form of living or for life in general." Can any one here present honestly say that Mr. Scarborough's drama "The Lure," or Mr. Veiller's "The Fight," or M. Brieux's "Damaged Goods," has really developed and cultivated his powers of intellect, feeling and conduct in regard to sexual matters? Can any one even say that all these three plays together and all the white slave moving picture shows thrown in have really given him a single item of information on sexual matters that he did not possess before?

I doubt if any one learned for the first time from "The Lure" or "The Fight" that the life of a daughter of joy is not a joyous life. The advertisements of patent medicines and quack physicians printed daily on the sporting pages of New York newspapers left M. Brieux no secrets to disclose.

I am willing to pass over the charge that what are termed the White Slave dramas are untruthful because I am not a specialist in this picturesque subject and my opinion as to the veracity of "The Lure" and "The Fight" would be valueless, but I do affirm that the sex plays are grossly defective as instruments of education because they show only one side of sex relationship and that the diseased side.

I was once sentenced to a year's servitude as teacher in a High School in a small New Jersey town. I am not at all vain of my career as a teacher; I did not know and do not now know much about teaching. But I had, at least, this elemental knowledge of my work. I never attempted to instil a knowledge of English grammar into my pupils by making them day after day and week after week devote themselves to a study of grammatical errors. The ungrammatical sentence was occasionally given as a test of their knowledge, but their work chiefly consisted in the study of correct English, of the best prose suited to their comprehension. What would you think of a teacher of mathematics who did nothing but exhibit to his pupils problems incorrectly solved? Of a parent who tried to improve his child's table manners by habitually, as a horrible example, eating with his knife, drinking out of his soup-plate and wiping his mouth on the table cloth? This is exactly the method of the people who have constituted themselves our teachers in the important subject of sex-relationship. You must be healthy, they say. All right, we say. How shall we do it? And they show us a succession of people repulsively diseased. You must be continent, they say.

And they enforce this lesson by showing us a mimic world populated entirely by degraded wretches. It is true that the ancient Spartans once a year showed a repulsive drunkard to their young men in order to emphasize the value of temperance. But they did not din the topic of drunkenness into their ears day in and day out. On the contrary they constantly held up to them for their emulation examples of dignity, strength and sobriety. As a matter of fact any play however cheap and sensational, that exhibits courage and chastity triumphant over evil is superior as a moral force to the most artfully constructed portrayal of the life of degenerates.

I am aware that it is somewhat rash to criticise these plays publicly. A friend of mine, a dramatic critic, ventured to write a rather severe review of one of them. A few days after his criticism appeared in print he received a letter from a serious-minded lady resident in a town in northern New York State in which he was scathingly condemned as a hireling of the vice trust. Furthermore the lady stated her belief that the enterprising directors of the vice-trust had absolute control of the newspaper for which he wrote.

Now to go back for a minute to my first accusation that these plays make the hideous evils of sexual immoralities commonplace. I think a proof of this is to be found in the attitude of the audience. Go to a performance of "Damaged Goods," or "The Fight" and watch the people while the play is going on, and between the acts. You will not find many blanched horror-stricken tear-stained faces. You will not find the people talking in hushed voices of the horrors that are being revealed to them. Their attitude is that of hard indifference to the moral message of the performance, relieved only by a somewhat unpleasant curiosity and a wholly simple and natural desire to be entertained. You will find them comparing the play with other examples of the White Slave drama that they have seen, criticising the realism of some of the scenes and lamenting that certain features that they have heard described as salacious have been omitted. These plays and countless novels on the same theme have brought about a marked change in the mental outlook of even young girls. The monstrosity of prostitution is now merely the commonplace Social Evil. The strange woman who draws men down to death is merely "our unfortunate sister," and the libertine cannot help being such. If the new dramatists are doing away with the double standard of morality, they are doing it not by raising the standard of the men but by lowering the standard of the women.

Another charge against them is that they take the responsibility of sin from the individual and place it upon society. Hitherto the libertine has frankly acknowledged that he did wrong because of his own weakness. He has not tried to evade his guilt. The woman of the street has told of a seduction, perhaps, but she has generally taken a practical, unsentimental view of her life. Now the dramatists are working all the time to supply these people with excuses. The libertine is a libertine because he was not made to read Dr. Sylvanus Stall's "What a Two Year Old Child Ought to Know" or because years before his birth his father was immoral, and the strumpet is such not because she is lustful and lazy and weakwilled but because of heredity or economic determinism or some other convenient reason. It is a terribly dangerous thing to furnish people with ready-made excuses to take away from them the right of free will. Yet this is what our sex educators who use the drama as their instrument are deliberately doing.

A hundred plays like "The Lure," or like "Damaged Goods" will never cleanse a single mind of vicious desires, will never confer on any man or woman the grace of purity. It is doubtful whether the stage has any great value as a moral director—people insist on going to the theatre, not to be improved but to be entertained. But this is true beyond the shadow of a doubt—that the drama can become a valuable factor in sex education only when such men as the authors of "Damaged Goods," "The Lure," and "The Fight" devote the energies which they now spend in portraying vice and disease in portraying instead "Whatsoever things are true, whatsoever modest, whatsoever just, whatsoever holy, whatsoever lovely, whatsoever of good fame."

EDUCATION

Opposition to an Appropriation for Cincinnati's City University—College Fraternities—A University of Pennsylvania Professor on Queen Elizabeth

In his final message to the General Assembly of Ohio, addressed to that body by Governor Harmon just before retiring from office in January last, that distinguished statesman made some sharp references to the enormous growth of common school taxes. He called attention particularly to the fact that from 1901 to 1911 the total enumeration of children of school age within the State limits rose only .056 per cent., the enrollment 7.5 per cent. and the actual attendance 6.7 per cent., yet the taxes, State and local, rose from $15,303,244 to $32,889,424 or 114 per cent. "It will hardly be asserted that there has been a gain in usefulness or efficiency which justifies such a rise in cost," commented the retiring Governor in a criticism since quoted by educational experts in every section of the country. "This really startling jump in the tax figures must be ascribed in a large degree, to loose management, wastefulness and extravagance. Nobody wishes to stint the children, and a great many persons seem afraid to demand economy or offer criticism lest they be charged with hostility to education. . . . No duty calls more loudly on you to safeguard the schools and parents of the State, and unwise friends are sometimes more perilous than enemies."

Referring to Governor Harmon's brave and true words at the time AMERICA ventured to say that, among the unwise friends of State activity in education, none deserve to be reputed more unwise than the so-called progressive spirits who never cease to scheme for a wider extension of State influence and control in educational matters. A case in point is actually arousing the bitter indignation of the best citizens of the chief city of Governor Harmon's own State. The University of Cincinnati is an institution for many years maintained by public taxes and looked upon by an unreflecting people as the worthy crown of the efficient system of public schools maintained, so the constitution of State has it, because through their instrumentality good government and the stability of our republican institutions will be secured. Of course the cost has been high,—but the people met it cheerfully and regarding the institution, as a proper factor in the agency being built up to form young people to good citizenship, the money was cheerfully given and the millions used were considered exceedingly well invested.

Lately, however, in Cincinnati, as is the case regarding high schools and colleges elsewhere, there has been filtering through the minds of many the thought that the University is being maintained at large expense for the benefit of comparatively few, and that these few are quite capable of paying their own expenses for the higher education they may wish to require. Just the other day, it appears, the Committee of Ways and Means of Cincinnati's City Council recommended an issue of $450,000 worth of four-and-a-half per cent. bonds for the University, and the act has aroused hot opposition on the part of the Tax-payers' Association, a body made up of the best citizens of the city. One may ask whether the members of the Association have in mind the ex-Governor's words concerning wastefulness and extravagance.

This is a time when the bond-issuing period has about reached its limit in the Queen City's financial circles and many hundred times more necessary improvements have to be omitted owing to shortness of funds. In the published protest issued by the Secretary of the Tax-payers' Association reference is made to some of these pressing needs: "We need bridges, streets, sewers and many other positively necessary things and that under such conditions a half-million should be given to the University is beyond understanding." And the writer of the protest has not minced words in justifying the stand taken by home owners and tax-payers of the city: "It seems certainly unfair to turn nearly half a million dollars over to an institution largely patronized by the wealthy classes. In fact many of those receiving in it free tuition spend more on sports and other foolish, if not dangerous, exercises than would cover reasonable tuition. The poor and ambitious young men must co-operate with and follow these high flyers or be laughed at if not banished out of school as recent disclosures clearly demonstrate." To further illustrate the wastefulness and extravagance of the proposed grant, he goes on to state: "The bond market is glutted as it is, and if this half-million more is unloaded the interest rate of every other issue for real necessities of the city will be increased. Part of the money is even to go for athletic buildings and the like, and it is an outrage upon the ordinary people to allow this sum without even consulting them." Evidently the tax-paying body of the city is awakening to the folly of the words of such leaders as Dr. Pritchett of the Carnegie Foundation. He it was, one recalls, who spoke of the stage of civilization in which a given people "conceive of education as a natural and necessary activity of the State itself; they assume the obligation of its support as a natural and necessary part of progress, and they look upon schools which represent education—from the highest to the lowest—not as isolated or individual enterprises seeking its own good, but as parts of one related national effort."

The New York Evening Sun of December 6 comments editorially on "the waves of criticism which are breaking against college fraternities, and leading to legislative consideration in nine States during the present year." The writer believes the movement should convince the undergraduate members of Greek letter societies and all similar organizations, of the futility of opposition to the reforms demanded because of the abuses directly due to the fraternity spirit. He admits that, on paper, fraternity men make a plausible showing for their societies, but he claims that "Legislatures have a right to some say in appropriating money to an institution where the theory of fraternities results in sinister practice." This is the neat manner in which the writer turns the point the college society men use to justify their organizations:

"The favorite argument of the fraternities is that wherever there is a considerable number of men, these are bound to split up into congenial groups. This, they urge, is a law of human nature which thwarts regulation. If, then, students do obey the defensible impulse to get together for such purposes as their rituals intend, who can legally object? But the question for the Greeks to answer is this: Whence do they derive the right to crystalize and corner the social opportunities of a college—especially a college maintained by public funds for the equal advancement of the young brains of a commonwealth?"

Professor Edwards Potts Cheney of the University of Pennsylvania is not minded to accept the view, exploited by many, that the Elizabethan period became the golden age of English literature and the time of flowering knighthood because of Queen Elizabeth. He is not inclined to ascribe to the "Virgin Queen" the graces of mind and personality many historians dilate upon when they paint her as a benign influence fostering the learning of her day. In the first of a series of Saturday afternoon lectures to be given this winter by members of the University faculty Dr. Cheney gave quite a different picture of Elizabeth than the one commonly drawn for students in the schools of the country. In his opinion Queen Elizabeth was not endowed with any sense of appreciation for the higher learning or the finer things in life; she was vain and loved flattery to a degree that demanded obsequious attentions from her ministers and courtiers, and debasing servility from her servitors and subjects. She was inordinately selfish and rarely generous, except when it led to some personal gratification.

Prof. Cheney affirms that the Queen's intellectual powers were only moderate, and her character too commonplace to experience any great crises in life. She was not gifted with any of the elements of statesmanship, but was so irresolute, undecided and procrastinating as to cause her most devoted ministers to lose their respect. She ate and drank to excess, while thousands of her subjects were hungry and in abject want. The scandals of her court, he adds, were so numerous and sordid as to excite wonder in the minds of foreign diplomats. The entire atmosphere of the court was filled with petty jealousies and intrigue.

It is not an attractive picture, but most of its lines and shading have been sketched for us before by capable scholars who have aroused the ire of the devoted followers of a woman some choose to class as one of the greatest characters in English history. Prof. Cheney gave his characterization "as the fruit of a long and extensive investigation into a more intimate side of Queen Elizabeth and her court than historians generally have touched upon." His portrayal is that of a sordid figure, truly, in English history.

ECONOMICS

The Growing Food Problem

We read of meat coming into this country from Argentina, Australia, New Zealand and Canada; of eggs from China, Australia, New Zealand, Denmark, Belgium; of potatoes from Belgium and Ireland, and the ordinary man and woman feels relieved, thinking to see in such importations that smashing of the trusts and the defeat of cold storage, which will result in the lowering of prices.

Now there is one thing the people of this country have to learn, and it is that cold storage and trusts are not responsible for the high price of food. We do not say that nobody, foreseeing the rise in prices, took advantage of cold storage to hold his goods for the higher price. But we do say that such holding of goods was the effect of the coming high prices, not their cause; that there has been no general systematic storage of food; that the rise in price is due to scarcity. The same error obtained before the French Revolution. The peasants were persuaded that there was an abundance of grain stored away in the country and they went about breaking into granaries and storehouses looking for it. The fact was that the harvests had failed for two or three successive years. When the price of meat began to rise some three years ago, the cry was raised that the packing companies had it stored away in order to wring famine prices out of the people. We resisted the assumption from the beginning; and everybody knows now that companies which have to reach out to Argentina for their stock in trade, are not locking up American beef. There has been a shortage of eggs lately, and there will be several other shortages before food becomes generally abundant. The cold storage cry was taken up about the eggs, and it will probably be raised again as the other shortages develop.

Every intelligent person, unless he has absolute evidence that food is being stored in large quantities to raise prices, should set himself against the cry. As we have pointed out before, nothing is easier than to pass from it to a revolution. Because the French working and peasant classes were hungry, they listened to those who said that food was being stored away. Then they passed to rioting and the revolution had become an easy thing. One would prefer not to be in New York on the day when the masses get up hungry, to read in the anti-trust newspapers that the cold storage warehouses are bursting with food.

That a real famine is not impossible is something we have to face. Importations from foreign lands may stave it off for the moment, but one must remember that there are other countries drawing upon that same supply and needing it the more because the United States which used to feed them, does so no longer. American buyers are out wherever there is a steer to be bought on this continent, north or south. The consequence is that the herds are becoming exhausted. Instead of talking about cold storage, we ought to try to realize the disgrace our present condition brings upon us. We have one of the most fertile countries in the world. Our population is insignificant compared with its area, and we have to go to little Belgium, little Denmark, even little Ireland for food. The reason is that the American young man has got the idea that spades and shovels are signs of degradation and should be seen in the hands of "Dagoes" only. He denies that he has any objection to agriculture and claims that he flocks into the cities, because farming does not pay. Yet if it pays Danes and Belgians to send their produce to us across the ocean, it ought to pay our people to grow the same things on our own soil. The American young man does not object to work. He will drive a team in the country as well as in the town. Here we see the real agricultural difficulty. He will farm on a large scale with the aid of machinery, so that his labor consists in driving a team from a lofty seat, managing the steam engine and so forth: he will not drive the team from between the plough handles, or feed the stock, or milk the cows. Still less will he touch that agriculture which is carried on by means of the spade and the dibble, the hoe and the rake. He will grow grain on a large scale, exhaust his land, get the minimum of profit, mortgage his farm and at last get out. He will not grow potatoes and onions, raise poultry, or keep a dairy. These things pay; but they mean the work he despises.

From the Far West comes a lesson we can profit by. In British Columbia some city school boards, recognizing the need of getting their town boys back to the land, have discovered that the first step is to give them an intelligent interest in it. As it is, the town-bred boys are utterly ignorant of it. For this purpose they are abolishing all the fancy classes in technical schools, which only overcrowd the ranks of mechanics, and are putting in their place classes of agriculture. Similarly in the girls' schools the domestic classes are to be directed to the forming of practical farmer's wives instead of fudge and waffle makers. If they succeed in making the town boy willing to do real work, they will have gone a good way towards solving the food problems.

SCIENCE

Father Jerome Ricard, S.J., of Santa Clara University, California, discovered a sun spot on Dec. 11, the largest seen in two years.

The sun spot is in longitude 9.14.24 degrees east of the central meridian. It is due to a heliocentric conjunction of the earth with Saturn on Dec. 7.

The new sun spot has an area of 409,936,709 square miles. It is 32,013.15 miles long and 12,805.26 miles wide.

Father Ricard during the past thirteen years, has been sending out bulletins foretelling the weather in California, not merely for a day ahead, but a month ahead, and foretelling it accurately. He discloses the secret in this way:

"Two planets get into line with the sun. Their pull causes a sunspot or a facula. These move to certain spots on the sun's surface; the attraction at those angles leaps to the earth's magnetic centers around the Aleutian Low and elsewhere. The air over these places goes skyward in a great spiral as though to get to the sun. Other lower airs rush into the partial vacuum; they bring moisture if it is winter and mist if it is summer. Then the storms take the old familiar tracks we know—south to Vancouver, then generally eastward and down the St. Lawrence Valley. Their intensity varies with the power of the sunspot. Their running time from Alaska to California isn't the same; and that's why errors in dates creep in."

The eighteenth report of the Earthquake Investigation Committee, made last week to the British Association, records a total of 166 large earthquakes disturbing the Continental area of Europe between January and June, 1910. The number of recorded earthquakes steadily increases, the total for the first fifty years of scientific reports (1790-1839) being but 471, while in the last half century (1850-1899) there were 1,555. The number of reported volcanic eruptions also increases, but not greatly, being 465 in the first fifty-year period and 601 in the last one. The committee is of opinion that the increases are chiefly due to increased facilities in news gathering.

The Journal of the American Medical Association presents a report on refrigerators by Dr. John R. Williams, which contains besides others these conclusions:

"Most of the refrigerators in common use are almost worthless and grossly uneconomical.

"There is a large field for the manufacturer who will make a properly insulated and efficient box which can be kept cold at a moderate price.

"If more economical methods of ice manufacture and distribution were employed the cost of ice to the consumer would be materially lowered.

"If to this saving were added that which would result from proper ice-box construction, refrigeration vastly superior to that now found in the average home could be had for at least one-fourth the present cost."

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

At St. Francis Xavier's, Liverpool, on Sunday, November 23, the Rev. Father Ashton, S.J., concluded a course of sermons on "The Decline of Religion," with a review of "The Position of the Catholic Church." The following closing paragraphs are taken from the Catholic Times of London:

"Dealing with the Sacraments, and directing special attention to the Holy Eucharist, the Heavenly Food for the laity, Father Ashton said that frequent Communion was the great need of the day. It was not enough in these times for people to approach the altar once a year, or at most once a month, as the custom was in former days. Generations ago, the people who went to Communion at rare intervals were, nevertheless, able to lead good lives. But to-day the world was more worldly than it had ever been, and frequent Communion was essential to good Catholic living. It was a peculiar fact that the first Protestant Archbishop of Canterbury staked his all on the abolition of the Mass, with frequent Communion as a substitute. If people would only communicate frequently, Cranmer thought, their religion would be a spiritual one. That Cranmer's idea has failed utterly was seen from a comparison between the children of the Catholic Church to-day and the descendants of the 'Reformers.' In all lands Protestant ministers were bewailing the fact that their people would not go to Church. Of course they would not go to Church, when, if they wanted to say their prayers, they could say them just as well at home. The dwindling of sectarian congregations was the result of driving out the Mass and denying the Real Presence.

"Four years ago, the preacher went on, 2,000,000 people went to Communion in the Archdiocese of Liverpool, and last year the figures were doubled. With the Anglicans who rarely communicated except at Easter, the average of Easter communicants was from three per cent. in one diocese to fourteen per cent. in another. Last Good Friday, Father Ashton pointed out, the three hours' service at St. Paul's Cathedral was attended by 2,000 people. The Three Hours' Adoration originated with his own Society, and it was a strange thought that the Anglicans had to fall back on a Jesuit service to attract congregations. Liverpool was not London. St. Francis Xavier's was not St. Paul's Cathedral; yet there were more than twice 2,000 people in St. Francis Xavier's on Good Friday. But he thought much more of the fact that three days afterwards (Easter Monday) there were nearly 2,000 people in the church. That was significant as showing the devotion of Catholics to Holy Mass on days when they had an opportunity of attending. While that spirit remained they had not much reason to fear that the Catholic Church in this country would not grow in the future. The Archbishop of Canterbury said that the workingman never went to church. He (Father Ashton) could tell the Archbishop that that parish alone of 10,000 souls was made up entirely of workingmen, half of whom were not above the 'starvation line.' Yet nine-tenths of these people went to Mass regularly. The Catholic Church, unlike the Protestant sects attracted not only the workingman, but the very poorest people. The Church of the future, the preacher concluded, would always be the Church of the past, in that she would always have the Mass as her central ordinance and her invincible protection against the powers of darkness."

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

Earl Nelson who succeeded to the Trafalgar estates in February has ordered the closing of the Anglican Church of Standlynch. The Earl, who is a Catholic, has informed the Church of England vicar that as it is the private property of the Earls Nelson he cannot allow any Anglican services to be held there. The church was founded in 1147 though it has since been rebuilt. The estate of which it forms a part was purchased by the nation and annexed to the title of Earl Nelson which was conferred on the brother of the great Admiral. The claim of the present Earl to full ownership is based upon the assumption that the building was always the private chapel of the family in possession of the estate.

In Kansas there are more than a thousand abandoned Protestant churches in rural districts. On the other hand, a writer in the Kansas Industrialist states that in one community of 600 people there are five struggling churches. The five pastors are paid a total of $3,000 a year and the churches are fighting among themselves. Of these 600 people only 31 per cent. are interested in the church. That means that the average attendance at church services on Sunday, provided those who are interested in religion go to church, is 38. It is only a matter of time, and of a very short time at that, when these five churches will be numbered among those already abandoned.

Dr. Edward Keyes of New York has been made a Knight of St. Gregory the Great. Dr. Keyes, who was born in Charleston, S. C., Aug. 25, 1843, is a convert, and a son of the late Major General E. D. Keyes, U. S. A. He is regarded as one of the most prominent surgeons in New York.

OBITUARY

Mgr. James Carr, Prothonotary Apostolic and Vicar General of Liverpool, died on November 9 at the age of 87. A native of Preston, he was educated at Ushaw College and was ordained in 1850, the year in which the hierarchy was reestablished in England. He celebrated his diamond jubilee as parish priest in 1912. As chairman of the Catholic Reformatory Association, Mgr. Carr did remarkable work in saving children. More than half a century ago in cooperation with Father Nugent, he founded a school for waifs and strays in the most disorderly district of Liverpool. Mgr. Carr was also chairman of the Liverpool branch of the Catholic Truth Society.

CHRONICLE

Currency Bill Passes Senate.—The Administration Currency bill as perfected by the Owen sub-committee and ratified by the Democratic caucus was passed in the Senate on December 19 by a vote of 54 to 34. The unexpectedly large majority of twenty resulted from six Republicans and one Progressive cooperating with the Democrats. The Republicans who supported the measure in the final vote were Senators Norris, Perkins, Sterling, Weeks, Crawford and Jones. The Progressive was Senator Poindexter, whose action came as a surprise, as he was regarded as one of the old guard reactionaries. While the final vote was a striking triumph for President Wilson, the real test of strength came a few hours earlier, when Mr. Hitchcock, of Nebraska, the one Democrat on the committee to stand out against the President's insistence for a substantially unamended House bill, offered as a substitute the measure he and the Republicans of the committee had drafted. The Hitchcock bill was defeated only by the narrow margin of 43 to 41. The bill went to conference on Saturday, and an agreement was expected on Monday. It will be signed by the President without delay.

Hetch Hetchy Bill Signed.—President Wilson signed the bill granting San Francisco water rights in the Hetch Hetchy Valley, thus ending the city's long fight for a municipal water supply. His signature was accompanied by a statement, in which he said: "I believe the bill to be on the whole in the public interest, and I am the less uncertain in that judgment because I find it was concurred in by men whose best energies have been devoted to conservation and the safeguarding of the people's interests, and many of whom have besides had a long experience in the public service, which has made them circumspect in forming an opinion upon such matters."

Telephone Trust to Dissolve.—The American Telegraph and Telephone Company, better known as the Bell System, has agreed to drop its control over the Western Union Telegraph Company, and to reorganize immediately under the terms of the Sherman law, at the suggestion of the Department of Justice. It has voluntarily agreed to adjust its business to the conditions of competition, an important feature of which will be to throw open its toll lines to independent companies. Attorney-General McReynolds, with the assent of President Wilson, has accepted the reorganization plan, and will not proceed with the contemplated suit against the company in restraint of trade under the Anti-trust act.

Peace Treaty with Holland.—Secretary Bryan and Chevalier van Rappard, Minister for the Netherlands, agreed last week upon the terms of a peace treaty embodying the principles of the arbitration plan announced early in the present Administration. The principal feature of the peace plan, the first negotiated with a European Power, is a provision for an investigation throughout at least one year of any misunderstanding between the signatory nations by a commission of five members, one to be chosen from each of the contracting countries, by their respective Governments; one to be chosen by each of the contracting Governments from some other country, and the fifth to be agreed upon by the two contracting Governments. Four peace treaties already signed are those with Salvador, Guatemala, Panama and Honduras, while Nicaragua and the Dominican Republic have agreed to the terms of pacts to which those nations will become signatories with the United States. Negotiations also are in progress with Portugal and Switzerland.

Important New Laws.—Governor Glynn signed the Workingmen's Compensation, Direct Primary and Ballot Reform Bills, thus making these acts of the Legislature laws of the Empire State. In a memorandum filed with the election bills Governor Glynn calls the measures the most important and progressive that have been written on the statute books in a generation and gives entire credit for their enactment into law to the Democratic Legislature and Democratic leaders. The central feature of the direct nominations bill is the abolition of the state convention and the nomination of all candidates by direct vote at official primaries. This includes candidates for the United States Senate and for the Court of Appeals.

Canada.—Many of the Nanaimo rioters have been acquitted; but eleven of fourteen who were being tried together were convicted after the judge had characterized the testimony for the defence as rank perjury committed at the instigation of a secret organization working by terror. He maintained, too, that non-union men had equal rights with union men.—The Conservatives have won the South Lanark and the Macdonald election for the Dominion parliament. In the latter Alexander Morrison, who was unseated for corrupt practices by his agents, has been returned by a larger majority than before.—The popularity of the McBride ministry in British Columbia seems to be undiminished. In a bye-election in the Islands constituency, the Government candidate was returned by a large majority over the regular Liberal nominee and an independent Conservative.—The closing of British Columbia to labor immigration, the means proposed to settle the Indian question temporarily, is to be effective only at the ports. The railway from Eastern Canada will be open to all that choose to use it.—The Western Provinces are pleading before the Railway Commission in Ottawa for a reduction of rates. The railways claim that such a reduction would make their operation impossible, as it would mean a loss of 20 to 30 million dollars for the coming year.

Great Britain.—Mrs. Pankhurst is out of prison again. Her many arrests have resulted in this, that she has served twenty-five days of a three years' sentence. It looks very like the degradation of criminal justice. The suffragists attempted to blow up Holloway Women's Prison, where Rachael Peace is undergoing an eighteen months' sentence for arson and from which Mrs. Pankhurst has just been released.—There have been serious riots in Manchester. Two young men had been condemned to death for murder. The Home Secretary reprieved one on the ground of mental weakness. The mob, which holds itself competent to review all judgments of law, held that he should have reprieved both, and ten thousand of them took possession of the streets round the prison where the murderer was executed, destroying property, fighting with the police and cursing the Home Secretary.—It is proposed to set up statues of five female saints in the Church of St. Bartholomew the Great, in London, in honor of Benjamin Franklin, who once worked in a printing shop hard by. "Poor Richard" is the last person one would associate with saints, especially female saints.—The dispute between the Post Office employees and the Postmaster-General is unsettled. Extremists are recommending the upsetting of the office by the sending of mails to wrong places, the American, for instance, to Australia.—The corporation employees of Leeds are on strike. The gas works are idle, the electric power-houses and street cars being operated by citizens.—The last of the battle-cruisers, the Tiger, has just been launched. It is said that her engines will be of 100,000 horsepower, giving a speed far beyond anything hitherto achieved.

Ireland.—The conference between the employers and the English labor delegates for the settlement of the Dublin strike ended in failure. Both parties agree that the sympathetic strike should be abandoned, that the employer should conduct his business in his own way and the employee obey all legitimate orders, that no strike should be called without a month's notice, and that the men's unions should be conducted on trades union lines; but the workers' representatives demanded complete reinstatement of the strikers, and the employers could only agree to take back as many as there was room for, and to find employment for others as soon as they could. Public opinion appears to support the attitude of the employers, the demand of the delegates being deemed impossible. The strikers, many of whom have sought reinstatement, seem to have lost faith in Larkinism, which was not strengthened by Ben Tillett's advice to Irish workmen, "to clear the ring of priests, theologians and other scoundrels."—At the annual meeting of the Irish Agricultural Organization, Father Finlay, S.J., the chairman, announced that their societies had increased to nearly a thousand, their membership to over a hundred thousand, and their turnover to more than $10,000,000. The movement was spreading so widely and in so many different fields, that they looked forward to the time when it would give a distinctive character to Irish industry, constituting the whole community a truly cooperative commonwealth, composed of groups of individuals voluntarily combined to benefit themselves by improving their industry.—The National Education Board has issued a report laying the blame of shortage of grants on the Treasury, especially for their continued neglect to afford facilities or impose regulations with regard to teaching of Gaelic or the qualification of teachers. There were 668,974 pupils on the rolls, and 8,255 schools in operation including 345 convents and 57 monastic institutions.—Arms in small quantities have been seized here and there at Ulster ports and special inspectors have been appointed for the purpose at the custom houses. From the opinions published in the Dublin papers, it is believed that it was the Irish Volunteer movement that stirred the Government to action. Sir Edward Carson's latest speeches are less bellicose and are apparently paving the way for compromise.

Rome.—L'Osservatore Romano, the organ of the Vatican, makes an official disavowal of the report that the Pope inspired a proposal for reconciliation between the Vatican and the Quirinal, which was deduced from the speech delivered by the Archbishop of Udine at the Catholic Congress in Milan recently. The speech did not imply the Holy See's renunciation of temporal sovereignty or the Pope's intention to propose conciliation, but was intended merely as an attempt to start a discussion of the question of papal independence, which is awaiting a solution. A synopsis of the text is given in Rome, December 6, 1913.

Italy.—The foreign policy announced by the King at the opening of Parliament was confirmed on December 16 by the Foreign Minister Marchese Antonio di San Giuliano, who declared that the European Powers were in accord with regard to the delimitation of Albanian territory; that the Triple Alliance was in no way impaired and that the relations between France and Italy were excellent. Judging from the utterances of the French press the last statement must be accepted with reserve. The relations between Germany and Italy the Minister insisted were excellent and the friendship with Austria would be greater than it now is. It had been agreed by the Powers that Turkish territory would be intact and thrown open to foreign competition in the economic field. The relations with the Balkan States were also declared to be cordial. The newly conquered territory of Libya would be henceforward held by volunteer troops and would probably afford a place for Italian emigrants who might be excluded from the United States. As for Free Trade it was not yet possible to grant it because of the maintenance of protection in other countries and the need of such help for Italian industries. On the 18th a vote was taken in the House and the Premier's speech was approved of by 362 against 90. Those who voted against were mostly Socialists. Fourteen deputies abstained.

Spain.—The new Ministry is said to face enormous deficits in all the departments, but it appears to have no definite program. Nor has it, from all accounts, any strong backing in the country, as the Conservative party is turning more and more to Maura, who refused to accept the position of Premier.—A curious case of insubordination is reported in the army. A Colonel of Marines named Labrador, who is a Protestant, refused to attend Mass in a Catholic Church. He is being tried for insubordination and the prosecution demands a penalty of six years' imprisonment.—That the Irish element still persists in Spain is revealed by the fact that Señor Martin O'Neal, who was once civil Governor of Madrid, is expected to be named Inspector-General of Police in that city.—A battle took place with the Moors on December 18, in which Spanish aviators used bombs on the enemy with terrible effect.—On December 14 there had been a demonstration of Socialists and Republicans in Madrid urging the Government to end the war.—A royal decree has been issued giving administrative Home Rule to Catalonia and other sections of Spain. It does not concede the complete autonomy which Catalonia has long demanded but is regarded as being a long step in that direction.

France.—On December 16 the French Government instructed its Ambassador in St. Petersburg and its Ambassador in Berlin to inform the St. Petersburg and Berlin Governments that France had accepted the British proposal that Greece be allowed to keep nine out of the eleven islands occupied by her during the Balkan war, the other two, Tenedos and Imbros, to be returned to Turkey. Italy, in the opinion of the French Government, should restore to Turkey the eleven islands still held by her since they were occupied during the war in Tripoli. Similar instructions were sent to the French Embassy in St. Petersburg.—On the same day the measures authorizing the imposition of an inheritance tax and the issue of the proposed Government loan of $260,000,000 were withdrawn. It was announced that the Government would shortly have ready other bills to be presented to the Chamber in their place.—Joseph Caillaux, Minister of Finance, has issued a new circular addressed to the banks and the public amplifying the notice sent out by the Government in 1907 concerning foreign loans, none of which may be listed on the Bourse without the consent of the Ministry of Finance. The new circular was made necessary, according to the Finance Minister, by the efforts of Provisional President Huerta of Mexico and of several of the Balkan States and Turkey to arrange for loans without the countenance of the French Government, which has the power of affecting the value of any loans by refusing to admit them to quotation on the Paris Bourse. The circular says this condition relates "not only to loans properly so called and consolidated issues of every kind, but also to the negotiation of Treasury bonds and, generally speaking, of all Treasury operations the result of which would be to procure funds for a foreign State."—Considerable ill feeling is manifested in the press against Italy's attitude towards France, the apparent loss of the Eastern Protectorate furnishing the latest reason for offense.

Belgium.—The creditors of Princess Louise of Belgium, daughter of the late King Leopold, who have entered claims against the princess amounting to $2,200,000, have agreed to the withdrawal of the case from the courts and to abide by the arbitration of two eminent lawyers, to whom the Government will hand over $900,000 for equitable distribution after an examination of the claims.

Germany.—The three National Liberal Representatives elected to the Diet in Baden by the help of the Centre have rejected their supporters and elected a National Liberal President. Since it was not consonant with the position of the Centre, as the strongest individual party, to accept the vice-presidency, no attempt was made by it to obtain this office. The National Liberals consequently elected a Socialist. The old bloc has thus been rehabilitated against the Centre with 38 against 35 votes. The strength of "the old dragon" has however been greatly broken. The red bloc formerly held 44 out of 29 places. One more election will most probably seal its fate. It is fortunate for the Centrist candidate not to have been elected to the presidency, since under the existing conditions no effective work could have been accomplished and the entire blame would have been cast upon the Centrist tactics.—A memorable visit has been paid to the Bavarian King Ludwig III by the German Emperor and Empress. The people of Bavaria have given them an enthusiastic reception, and the Emperor himself was most effusive in his expressions of congratulations for the progressive spirit displayed everywhere. "God," he said, "has granted to our fathers to sow upon the bloody field of battle that seed which has borne magnificent fruit." He then asked whether the sons of such fathers were able to develop still more the glorious patrimony which had been transmitted to them. "The mighty progress made by Munich seems joyously to answer this question with a strong affirmative. My sincere wish is that it may ever continue so." These words are a splendid retort made to anti-Catholic journalists who believe they must see marks of degeneracy in a Catholic land, under a Catholic King and a Catholic President of the Ministry.—The final and irrevocable decision has been given that Germany will not participate in the Panama-Pacific Exhibition. Even the question of an appropriation of two million marks for this purpose will not, we are told, again be brought before the Reichstag. The Central Bureau for participation at the Exhibition has been dissolved. Mr. Ballin, the general director of the Hamburg-America Line, the leading spirit in this movement, has himself moved the discontinuance of further agitation. His reasons are that a private German exhibition without public support would not be worthy of his country, and that it would show a want of tact to continue the propaganda when the Government has assumed so decisive an attitude against all public participation. The argument had long ago been given that the time was now too short to make fitting preparations.

Austria-Hungary.—The Minister of Commerce, Dr. Schuster Edler v. Bonnot, has presented a detailed account of economic conditions. He admits that the general financial and industrial depression was most severely felt in Austria; but he maintains that there is no reason for viewing the situation in a spirit of pessimism. He assured the country that the Austrian industries have successfully passed through the crisis and that the worst is now over. The money market is showing an improvement.—A printers' strike in Prague has caused considerable confusion. The six leading morning papers have not appeared for several days. Similar conditions exist in Upper Austria, and it is feared that the strike will extend to Vienna.—At Rimabanya the inhabitants, in spite of warning given them, have freely partaken of the meat of cattle that had suffered from anthrax. In consequence two hundred persons have fallen sick and doctors have been summoned from Budapest.

Holland.—By royal Proclamation addressed "To My People" and dated November 21, Queen Wilhelmina formally closed Holland's Centenary Celebration of Independence. Proudly referring to the national glories of the past, and gratefully acknowledging the present prosperity of the mother-country and its colonies, Her Majesty invoked God's blessing upon her realm and uttered the wish that an unanimity of patriotic sentiment on the part of her people, irrespective of rank, condition in life or religious convictions, may tend to perpetuate Holland's national independence and prosperity.

China.—President Yuan Shih-kai is reported to have approved of a proposal to terminate definitely the Chinese Parliament, because it has enacted no important law in the seven months of its existence, and will not do so if it be permitted to continue for a hundred years.

Crete.—The formal annexation of the Island of Crete to Greece was carried out on December 14. King Constantine personally ran up the Hellenic flag over the fort. People flocked to the capital from all parts of the island and from Greece, and tumultuously greeted the king, the crown prince, Premier Venizelos, and the other Ministers. A Te Deum in the cathedral was attended by the foreign consuls. The Island of Crete was finally evacuated on February 15 last by the protecting Powers, Great Britain, Russia, France and Italy. A detachment of British marines hauled down the flag of the Powers, which had flown since 1898, as well as that of Turkey, which had first been raised over the island in 1669.

India.—The Madras Government has sanctioned a grant of Rs. 1,000 from the provincial funds to Father A. Steichen, S.J., Professor of Physics in St. Xavier's College, Bombay, towards the expenses of conducting experiments in connection with the radio-activity of thermal springs in the Presidency. Father Steichen will be permitted to draw from the grant in such instalments as he may desire, and he will be requested to submit to the Government, through the Surgeon-General of Madras, a detailed report of the results of his researches. Collectors of the districts are requested to render all necessary assistance to Father Steichen in carrying out the proposed investigation.

QUESTIONS OF THE DAY

A New Year's Gift to Labor

Perhaps the most important labor measure passed in the State legislatures of our country during many years is the Workmen's Compensation Bill, drafted and signed by Governor Glynn, of New York, and to go into effect on the first day of January, 1914. The universal favor with which it has been received on all sides is hardly less remarkable than the promptness and unanimity with which it was passed after a first attempt had miscarried fifteen years ago, and a second had been pronounced to be unconstitutional.

"The important and triumphant fact," said the Governor in performing what he considers to be one of the crowning acts of his administration, "is that New York has at last placed itself at the front of humanitarian States. It has declared that its helpless citizens, maimed and cast aside in the battle for existence, will be cared for to the best of New York's ability. It has put its hand to the declaration that a commonwealth of 11,000,000 Americans will deal with its injured workmen in justice and not solely in charity."

Workmen's compensation laws of various kinds have already been passed by twenty-two States of the Union; but the present one, in the opinion of Samuel Gompers, President of the American Federation of Labor, is the best in the land, and the best, he believes, in any country. "It is humane, fair and just to the employer, as well as to the employee. It will work out equitably for both sides." Universal gratification was likewise expressed at its passing by the Convention of the National Civic Federation, made up of representatives of labor and capital, together with other public spirited citizens.

The principle itself of workmen's compensation laws is now in practice accepted throughout the world. The joint commission appointed by the Civic Federation for the study of such laws in the various States thus reported the general satisfaction expressed at their successful operation:

"The litigation between employer and employee arising out of personal injuries has practically ceased to exist in most of the States which have enacted compensation laws. The objections raised by either side prior to the enactment of compensation acts have been mostly removed by experience under the acts. The principle of compensation is now thoroughly established; the only problems for the future relate to the nature of the legislation and the methods of administration."

The principle in question, as conceived in modern legislation is, that "the economic cost of accidents" should be considered as part of the necessary expense of production. While the suffering is thus to be borne by the injured workman, and a certain expense is entailed upon the employer, the general burden will be divided among the consumers of the article whose production necessarily implies the constant risk of accidents.

The present law is built up largely upon similar acts already in force in many States of the Union and in various countries of Europe. It does not include all trades, but only such as are in themselves certainly or probably dangerous. About forty groups of industries are thus expressly mentioned by name. As in other similar acts the compensation is two-thirds of the average wage. In case of total permanent disability this payment continues for life; but where the disability, though total, is only temporary, the compensation is not to exceed $3,500. If the injury is partial the payment is two-thirds of the loss of wages. It may run from fifteen weeks for the loss of a little finger to 288 weeks for the loss of a leg. The payment for compensation can in no case exceed twenty dollars per week.

To save, as far as possible, the lives and limbs of injured workmen, careful provision is made to secure prompt medical or surgical treatment; the assistance of nurses and hospital services; medicines, or whatever appliances may be needed, during sixty days. Funeral charges are likewise provided for, but must not exceed one hundred dollars.

In case of death the family of the deceased workman is not neglected. The surviving wife receives during her widowhood thirty per cent. of the wages formerly earned by her dead husband, with two years compensation in one sum upon remarriage. If there be a child or children under eighteen years of age the additional amount of ten per cent. of such wages is to be given for each child until it reaches the age of eighteen, provided that the total amount does not exceed two-thirds of the wages in question. In every case payment is to be made two weeks after the occurrence of an accident, thus allowing sufficient time for due investigation.

The law further provides for a commission of five members with the duty of administration. They will classify risks and adjust insurance premium rates on every injury covered by the bill, basing them on the hazards of the employment and the payrolls of the employers, who are made responsible for the entire compensation.

Employers may, therefore, satisfy their obligation under the law by paying into the State treasury the premiums assigned to them. Injured workmen, or their dependents, in case of death will then be paid out of this fund. The employer is freed from all further liabilities, nor can he be sued for damages. Individual employers, however, may be authorized by the commission to pay directly as each injury occurs, if they can financially be held responsible. They may, however, make compensation through a mutual insurance or stock insurance association. In each case the amount to be paid must be fixed by the commission, and the compensation itself must pass through its hands. In certain cases an appeal may be made to the Appellate Division.

All these conditions protect the injured workman against unfair dealing. Most important in this respect is the clause which saves the employee from all expense and hazard of litigation in case compensation should not be made according to law. In place of an unequal contest between him and perhaps a powerful corporation, the commission itself will sue for compensation in the name of the people of the State of New York, and at the expense of the State.

In order, on the other hand, to safeguard the employers in the designated groups of industries, permission is extended to them to form into associations for accident prevention, and to make rules for this purpose. An inspector or expert may then be appointed to guarantee their observance. They may finally make recommendations for the fixing of just premiums according to the risks incurred.

Those responsible for drawing up the bill do not claim for it perfection. Labor men may desire the inclusion of all trades, with the possible exception of certain employments definitely named. Employers on their side might complain that the entire weight of insurance is made to rest upon their shoulders. It is difficult to observe an absolute balance of justice. In his "Moral-philosophie," Victor Cathrein, S.J., writes upon this subject:

"There are two possible ways of making provision for accidents incurred by workingmen in the performance of their labor functions. According to one view the duty of the employer is regarded as a duty of offering compensation to the injured workingman; but he can free himself from this obligation by proving that the injury was incurred through the fault of the employee. The other view considers the duty of the employer to consist in a care for his employees imposed upon him by the State for reasons based upon the common good. This latter way has been taken in Germany (law of June 6, 1884). We said that the duty falls upon the employer, because it is he likewise who profits by the workingman. No justification can be urged for placing the burden of insurance upon the tax payers, except in so far as an important branch of industry would not be able to raise the required insurance money without incurring destruction." (II, art. IX, p. 599.)

It is difficult to make application of abstract principles to such questions. The justice of the present and other compulsory insurance laws will necessarily depend upon the wages which the workers in the various industries are actually receiving and on the amount of compensation money or insurance they are to draw, not to mention many other important considerations. There is, however, in all such legislation not the slightest approach to Socialism, as good people may be inclined to fear. Only in case the State itself is made responsible for the payment of compensation or insurance does the principle of State Socialism enter. The common good alone can, under certain limited circumstances, justify any demand upon the tax payer in such cases.

The importance of workingmen's compensation acts or similar laws is evident from two reasons. The first is the frequency of industrial accidents, to which Governor Glynn himself calls attention when he says, that in the State of New York alone every year seventy thousand workmen are injured and a thousand killed in the course of their employment. "Directly and indirectly at least three hundred thousand people are seriously affected by these accidents." The second reason is the inadequacy of the old liability system. We need but give a single instance out of thousands.

Paul Golick, an Austrian laborer, secured judgment in the sum of $1,253.30 for personal injuries which had crippled him for life. The case had been long in the courts and when the decision was finally given the expenses of the litigation and the fees of his attorneys absorbed the entire amount of compensation accorded him. He was left penniless in his misfortune. Such cases were far from uncommon under the old system. "At present," wrote a New York journal only two years ago, "the money is largely absorbed in lawsuits, profits of insurance companies, and administrative expenses. Only a fraction of it reaches the injured or their families, even that often long after the time when it was most needed, and even then in very unequal and arbitrary amounts."

We may add here the statement of Governor Glynn, that such laws, when wisely and justly made, are "the one thing best calculated to discourage social unrest, and to convince every worker that there is no real conflict between capital and labor, but rather a recognized community of interest."

A desire has been widely and strongly expressed by employers of labor for uniform Workmen's Compensation laws throughout all the States. This sentiment was clearly voiced at the recent convention of the National Civic Federation. The more widely such legislation is spread, if the true interests of all parties are taken into account, the greater the blessing for both capital and labor, the more certain the earliest possible introduction of every device for the saving of life and limb.

In conclusion, the moral of it all is, that we are only beginning to adjust ourselves to conditions for which the solution would have been prepared three centuries ago, if the influence of the Church upon economic progress had not been stayed by the Reformation—if the natural development of the guilds had not been made impossible by depriving them of their one principle of vitality, their Catholic character and spirit.

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

Madame Montessori

Somehow one realizes that the charge was bound to come, yet is one hard put to explain the need of it. Of its lack of truth there is scarcely reason to say a word. The Jesuits—the whole force of the Jesuit priests is aligned in opposition to Dr. Montessori, "the woman who is revolutionizing theories of child culture, as did Froebel and Pestalozzi"! Miss Margaret Naumberg, a specialist in social research, who took under Dr. Montessori her training course for teachers, and who is now undertaking to carry out the Montessori ideas in a Settlement house in New York City, makes the statement in the Outlook of December 13. Through Jesuit influence, she writes, the Dottoressa has felt the unofficial censure of the Catholic Church. Personally the Jesuits have tried to dissuade her from carrying on and developing her method, and they have been successful in preventing the foundation of a Montessori school in Ireland. The Irish priests, such is Miss Naumberg's naive explanation, were consulted by the Irish people when the project was first under discussion. The priests, through their close-linked chain of connection with Rome, and with the ever-present and always meddling Jesuits, as the Outlook writer implies, had been advised to prevent the founding of any Montessori schools, and they obeyed orders.

All of which, if the enthusiastic New York expert in Montessori methods will pardon the saying, is rank bosh. Had Miss Naumberg so desired she might have informed herself accurately regarding the opinion most Jesuit experts have conceived of Madame Montessori. It was well outlined in an article which appeared in AMERICA, November 15, of the current year. The writer of that article gave this fair and just appreciation of the Dottoressa as a teacher:

"Maria Montessori is an earnest woman of high purpose, great zeal and astounding activity. She has dedicated her life to the education of children; and unlike many teachers, doomed to die without a vision of the good which they have done, she is already enjoying the reward of her work. Defective though her methods are in some essential details, yet many of them are admirable for the practical turn which they give to important truths of child psychology. Few methods of teaching make better use of the child's instinct for play. Few catch the young imagination more easily or hold it more firmly. Fewer still are more insistent on the necessity of directing childish whims into ethical channels."

This is scarcely the language of a loyal member of an organization whose influence has been such as to make fall upon Madame Montessori the unofficial censure of the Catholic Church. But it is not the first time that the bogey of Jesuit opposition has been called in to lure to a cause the protection and patronage of men and women who, despite fancied enlightenment, are still inspired by the romanticists' pictures of Jesuit guile and cunning. Thankful for small favors one ought to be, no doubt, and a favor it probably is in the minds of such as the Outlook writer to be deemed powerful enough to dominate through our close-linked chain of connections with Rome the entire Catholic Church. We fear, however, that the able and high-class men who guide the destiny of the Irish Catholics will not consider it a compliment to be informed by so strong and truth-loving a review as the Outlook claims to be, that "they obeyed orders" in refusing to encourage a Montessori foundation for their little ones.

Ours is a day that boasts its eagerness for research and that applies its powers to the psychology hidden in every phase of human activity. One might make a profitable psychologic study, it may be suggested, of the injection by certain good people of the Jesuit into practically every turn of affairs that marks the day's routine. We who know ourselves best, are in a continual whirl of amazement at the astounding efficiency men predicate of us. Men, we are, inspired by high ideals; men, we are, of long and wearing training to fit ourselves to work for these ideals; men, who have a definite and fixed policy in the pursuance of that work; men, who care not a whit for the changing vagaries of the political and social life about us if we be but allowed in peace to follow our call to spread God's great glory through the lives of men; men, who know not and seek not the thrill that comes with power and place and name and fame—but who are quite content to toil on, eager only to do what we believe to be God's blessed will, and to hold fast to what we believe to be God's living truth.

Yet there is scarcely a ripple that appears in the vast sea of human effort which does not bring from some one the cry: the Jesuits! Nothing is too monstrous for our scheming; nothing too brazen for our self-assurance; nothing too petty for our inordinate desire to rule and control. Only a month or two ago a reverend leader in some social uplift work here in New York had us marked as the head and front of the conspiracy to depose the State Executive, then on trial. And now, si parva licet componere magnis, we are gravely charged with being the huge obstacle upreared to close the path leading to the triumph of a new apostle in the science of child-training.

May we not, as other men, have our opinions? And if we are able to defend these opinions, is the faculty a crime? May we not admit the claims Madame Montessori possesses to high place among the teachers of little ones and yet point out that when that lady separates speculation from practice and begins to philosophize, she shows that she neither understands the problems at issue nor their bearing on practical life? May we not, without meriting the charge of an opposition powerful enough to bring upon her the unofficial censure of the Catholic Church, point out that her philosophy is false, and that, strangely enough, it is in flat contradiction to the plans and devices and instruction explained in her own volume on the "Montessori Method"? May we not condemn, as others condemn, the mistake an earnest, well-intentioned woman makes when she forgets the lessons of man's essential freedom of will which her own experience as a teacher has taught her, and permits herself to be beguiled into the defence of an absurd determinism which makes vice and virtue and character depend on our organism? Madame Montessori is not the first gifted teacher who, wandering far afield from the region of proper intellectual effort in which her rare endowments give her excellence, has lost herself in the misty pathways of a science quite beyond her chosen specialty.

A principal of one of New York's public schools pointedly suggests the unreasonableness of allowing oneself to be carried away in the whirl of laudatory exploitation unwise friends are now using to advertise the amiable lady lately come among us to explain her system of child-training. He does not condemn the system outright. "On the contrary, he agrees that the Montessori method "has revived an interest in some of the fundamental principles of education which many teachers, through too great insistence of dull routine in their classrooms, have forgotten. It has revived the importance of appealing to the self-activity of childhood; of taking reasonable account of the play instincts of children, and of making use of the graphic and objective methods of presentation." But all of these good qualities do not at all import the revolutionizing of the entire educational method of the world which Madame Montessori's admirers extravagantly claim for the Dottressa's system. "A generation ago," he reminds us, "the kindergarten was going to effect a similar upheaval—to-day it is relegated to its proper place, the infant period of training. The Montessori method may modify in some way our present kindergarten system, but it will no more revolutionize elementary school methods than the enthusiastic theories of Froebel have done." One wonders whether this New York Public School Principal is a Jesuit in disguise.

The Social Movement in Ireland*

The space which the Dublin strikes have recently filled in our cable news and the Syndicalist principles on which their fomenters have based them have made it clear that the social or socialist menace has reached Ireland in its most aggravated form. Those who have read Father Slater's recent articles on the social action of the Irish clergy, and the "Handbook of Catholic Charitable and Social Works," by Father McDonnell, S.J., of the Irish Messenger, will also know that Ireland is not unprepared for the problem that confronts her. The pamphlets before us, with the promise they give of a further comprehensive study of social needs and the working out of preventive remedies, give additional assurance that the leaders of thought in Ireland are alive to the dangers of the hour and amply equipped to meet them.

The idea of establishing the Social Action Series appears to have originated in a course of Lenten lectures by Rev. L. McKenna, S.J. They dealt with the relations of the Church to (1) Labor, (2) Working Men, (3) Working Women, (4) The Working Child, (5) Trades Unions, and (6) Social Work; and they were so simple, sane and practical in their treatment of principles and plans, so directly applicable to Ireland's needs, and distinctively Irish in their coloring, that there was a wide demand for their publication and for a further development of the schemes of social betterment they had adumbrated. The editor of the Messenger of the Sacred Heart, which with its numerous cheap but precious publications has rendered invaluable service in our day to Ireland's material as well as spiritual interests, met the demand by announcing a continued series of popular booklets on the countless variety of subjects involved in the social question, along the lines which Father McKenna had so happily sketched.

An introductory pamphlet by Rev. P. J. Connolly, S.J., states the fundamental principles and outlines the wide and well-considered program. The two main sources of the Capital and Labor conflict and its causes—the Liberal or Capitalistic School claiming absolute right for the individual to complete liberty of economic action, and the Socialist School demanding the abolition of that liberty and the absorption of the individual in the State—are both the offspring of Protestantism, which, proclaiming on the one hand individualism in religion opened the way for individualism in economics, and asserting on the other the supremacy of reason as against authority, gave the keynote for the Jacobin rationalistic interpretation of "liberty, equality, fraternity," premises that found their logical consequence when "socialism, organized and aggressive, stepped from the brain of Karl Marx." Between the two stands the School of Christian Justice and Charity, teaching the duties as well as rights of employers and employed, and that the function of the State is neither to do everything itself nor to let everything alone, but wisely to assist the doers. The Church, which twice triumphed over similar but far more aggravated evils, first by abolishing the slave labor that prevailed throughout the Roman Empire, and second by establishing or encouraging the labor and art Gilds of the Middle Ages and otherwise curbing the despotism of feudal kings and barons, has alone authoritative knowledge of the true remedy and the power to apply it. She has already spoken in the voices of Leo XIII and Pius X, who have both urged, as against socialist and capitalist combinations, counter-organizations of workmen actively co-operating on the Christian basis of mutual rights and obligations. Such clubs and unions have spread through Belgium, Germany, France, Italy, in multiplied but well-ordered variety, and their prolific literary output has been educating the world in practical social science.

The Messenger series proposes to profit by their experience, keeping, however, Irish needs and conditions chiefly in view, and contributing not a little of its own that is illuminative. It embraces ten sections, each portioned off into a score or more divisions and subdivisions for separate treatment. Starting with the declarations of Leo XIII and Pius X, that the Church's teachings alone can end or calm the conflict and the diffusion of Christian principles can best promote the real economic interests of the people by forming the workers into a compact Christian body, the first section is devoted to "Principles and Schools." The brochures under this head will embrace the Social Question in Ireland, its Origin, Character and Remedy; the Social Principles of the New Testament, of the Fathers, of the Schoolmen, of Luther and his followers, of the French Revolutionists, and the Influence of each on Society; Economic Life in the Middle Ages, the Social Encyclicals of the Popes, the various Socialist Schools—of Karl Marx, the Fabians, Syndicalists, English Labor Party, etc., and finally the Catholic School, and the true solution of the question.

*Social Action Series: The Social Question, by Rev. P. J. Connolly, S.J., and six penny booklets on The Church and The Workers, by Rev. L. McKenna, S.J., Dublin: The Irish Messenger. Brooklyn: The International Truth Society. In one volume. 35 cents.

This alone is a huge program, but we have not yet reached one-tenth of its scope. "The Civilizing Action of the Church," tracing true civilization and its manifold influences through the centuries, and comparing it with paganism and Protestantism as factors in human progress, will contain fourteen treatises, ending in the "Part Played by Ireland in European Civilization." "Centres of Catholic Social Action" will take us in separate excursions through the principal European countries and return us in the end to "North and South America"; and some twenty biographies of "Catholic Social Leaders" will introduce us to the principal social workers of the world. Religion, Tradition, National Character, The Press, Invention and Imitation, The Great Man, General Tendencies, the Novel, the Drama, etc., are some of the subjects that come under "Social Factors"; and the greatest of social factors, "The Family," has some fifty admirably differentiated sub-headings that indicate not only deep insight into the dangers that beset the foundation of society, but also practical knowledge of the most efficient methods of averting them. Commencing with "Infant Mortality" and ending with "Marriage Dowry," they range through medical inspection, sanitary homes, workmen's gardens, food, drink, fresh air supply, the mother, the boy, the child, domestic economy, amusements, educative helps, and how all these and kindred questions have been handled in other lands. This and "The Organization of Women Workers," which in a dozen headings would seem to exhaust that difficult question, should form a subject of useful even if endless discussion at women's clubs and social service societies.

They are of no less concern to men, who are further provided with fruitful material for thought and action in a series of articles on "Organization of Labor," comprising the history, constitution, object and need of trade corporations and unions; the trade, socialist, Catholic, and revolutionary unions of Europe and America; mixed corporations of employers and employed, and of Catholic and Protestant workmen; strikes, wage, working and non-working hours, the ideal garden and factory city, etc. "Cooperative Stores and Factories" deal chiefly with European experiments and the practicability of their adaptation to Ireland, but the "Factory for American Boots," "The Syndicalist and Cooperative Movements Compared," and "How the Small Shopkeeper Can Hold His Own against the Big Establishment," should also prove interesting here, as will certainly the treatment of the thirty distinct subdivisions of "Agricultural Organization." They deal historically and practically with rural banks, State aid, cooperation, transit, afforestation, tariff, stock, vegetables, land culture, gardening, water power, fisheries, hygiene, agricultural schools, etc. Two are entitled, "Farmers' Union of U. S. A." and "Report of the American Commission of Agricultural Inquiry"; nine expound the "Problem of Rural Poverty in Ireland," and five treat of "Model Parishes and Their Leaders," "Pen-pictures of Ideal Parishes," and "A Social Program for Home Rule Ireland." A list of Social Institutes and of standard books on social questions completes the introductory sketch of the entire program.

The first six pamphlets give promise of capable and practical work. Consisting each of about 8,000 words in some twenty pages, they are popular in style and price, and more original in conception and exposition than one is wont to expect in such treatises. This is attributable in some degree to the influence of the Gaelic movement, which is responsible for much of the literary power and fecundity of modern Irish writers who have gone back for inspiration to the thoughts and works and Catholic traditions of their race. The author, having won the highest University honors in ancient and modern literature, applied himself to the study of his ancestral language, in which his "Gaelic Phrase-Book" is a witness to his success; and spending his vacations among his Gaelic-speaking countrymen, he acquired an intimate knowledge of their wants and ways, which he has put to good use in the opening numbers of this series. He has mastered much more than a book knowledge of the subject. He is able to picture from actual observation the specific injustices under which the various strata of the people are laboring, and the sincerity of his sympathy is manifest. In advocating reforms and an organized system of social works, he recalls the days when Ireland had her own civilization. Then "the skilled artisan ranked high in the social scale, was assigned lands for his support, and all were paid wages fixed by law, and were free to form corporations in their interests. The Irish system limited the powers of the chieftain and of the rich, and guarded jealously the rights and welfare of the poor." It was therefore that Irish chiefs were often found willing to become feudal lords under the English Crown, and the clansmen clung desperately to the ancient Irish system.

To restore the principles of that system, which like its people though long decried is now coming to its own, and to apply them to modern conditions by establishing a chain of social works in every town and hamlet and rural district of Ireland, is the laudable purpose of the Irish Social Series. This sketch of its program should make it clear that its usefulness will not be confined to Ireland. With us capitalism and labor have struck harder blows and raised louder and more discordant cries, and those among us who have been trying to solve the question and avert the menace it portends, will welcome Irish assistance, not for the first time, and look forward anxiously to the completion of this notable exposition of the true solution. An Anglican Bishop on His Church

The Church of England Bishop of Zanzibar is utterly dissatisfied with the state of his denomination, and with the very best of reasons. He has, therefore, addressed an open letter on the subject to the Bishop of St. Albans, which every Episcopalian ought to ponder deeply and pray over earnestly. Three things trouble him. First, the growth of Modernism in the Church of England, not only unchecked and unrebuked, but tolerated and even encouraged, finding its latest expression in the collection of essays under the title "Foundations," according to which a minister may "deny the trustworthiness of the Bible, the authority of the Church, and the infallibility of Christ." Were he nearer England than is Zanzibar he would have omitted the "may," for he would have known that many clergymen of the establishment actually do deny these fundamentals.

His second grievance is the formal alliance of the Bishops of Mombasa and Uganda with the missionaries of other Protestant denominations in Africa, which was crowned by the celebration by the former of an evening communion in the Presbyterian church at Kikuyu, and the admission to it of the delegates to the conference held there by the Church of England and other Protestant missions. This act he characterizes very justly as "nothing less than heresy regarding the meaning and value of Episcopacy."

The third cause of dissatisfaction touches the Bishop of St. Albans himself, and is probably the reason moving him to address that prelate. One of the editors of the book "Foundations" was a chaplain of the Bishop of St. Albans, who on that account invited him privately to resign his chaplaincy. So far, so good. But shortly afterwards a clergyman was denounced for invoking the Blessed Virgin and the Saints. Here the bishop did not act quietly, but inhibited him publicly from officiating in his diocese. On this difference of treatment the Bishop of Zanzibar comments vigorously:

"... Surely Mr. Streeter's theory is a million times more dangerous to souls and more harmful to the Church's witness than is the action of Dr. Langford-James. For the one robs us of Christ and Church and Bible, while the other merely ventures to speak, here and now, with those in whose company he hopes to spend eternity. . . . Had you measured both priests by the standard of antiquity, Dr. Langford-James would have been reprov'd for holding an unauthorized service and commended for his piety; while Mr. Streeter would have been publicly condemned and inhibited. Had you measured them both by the present faith and practice of the whole Episcopate of East and West, the Doctor would again have been at once reprov'd for a technical illegality and excused for his devotion, while your chaplain would have been forbidden to enter your churches. By what measure, then, if I may ask the question, has your lordship meted out their punishments?"

What, then, asks the Bishop of Zanzibar, is the mind of the Church of England? He adds that the "whole Church of God" is waiting for the answer. This is hardly true. But what is true is that all heaven is waiting for the bishop's own personal solution. He has received a great light regarding the essential character of the Church of England. How is he going to use it? His answer is for the moment disappointing. "In the darkness of our days," he says, "the one only rule that serves is to do His will and guard His flock until the Ecclesia Anglicana find her mind and her voice and tell us for what it is she came into the world. If she have need of us to Catholicize the heathen world for Christ, I am at her service now as always. But if to Protestantize the world, and modernize the Faith, be the works she undertakes, I, for my part, have no longer place or lot within her borders. Let the Ecclesia Anglicana declare herself, that we may know our fate."

There are two ways of speaking; by word, and by deed. By word, the Church of England will never declare herself: by deed she has been doing so consistently ever since her creation nearly four centuries ago. May the Bishop of Zanzibar grasp this fact and fulfil his pledge! He, and all who with him are facing the facts, have the prayers of tens of thousands to help them.

Changes in Holland's Politics

The present Dutch Parliament is likely to become notable for political surprises. One may be the breaking up of the Coalition of Catholics and Protestants. Since 1887 a community of interests has kept them politically united outside as well as inside of Parliament. But now it looks as if they were about to part company, if not in concerted parliamentary action, at least at the ballot box. The reason is that the present administration is about to introduce a measure for revising the Constitution and enlarging the national franchise. The anti-revolutionary division of the Coalition—Dr. Kuyper's following—appears to be decidedly opposed to any revision unless the measure likewise embodies an equitable adjustment of the present School law; the Christian Historicals, though probably not averse to the Government proposal, so far remain non-committal, while the Catholic press has been extensively discussing whether it would be for the best interests of Catholics to follow the anti-revolutionaries in their stand-pat policy or not.

Such a policy, it is argued, might or might not prove successful in overturning the present Cabinet and in restoring eventually a Christian administration. But that plan was tried in 1886, when the Conservative party also refused to support a revision of the Constitution on the same score, and subsequently met with defeat at the ballot box. On the other hand the existing franchise, with its complicated classification of voters, is considered in many respects out of joint with the times. Besides, any extension of the franchise and reform of the electoral law as contemplated by the Government would greatly increase the Catholic vote and raise the number of its representatives in Parliament from twenty-five, as at present, to at least thirty. With such an increased representation, it is confidently maintained, Catholics would be in a position at any time they saw fit, to bring about a settlement of the vexed school question. The drift of Catholic opinion seems to be decidedly opposed to adopting the intransigent policy of the anti-revolutionaries on this particular point; hence a split is imminent.

The city of Zaandam is known to national fame for the number of its windmills and also as the centre of an extensive lumber trade. Abroad it is famous as the place where Czar Peter the Great of Russia in 1697 spent several months incognito, being engaged the while as a simple journeyman ship builder. The humble hut he occupied, like Lincoln's log cabin, has been reverentially preserved, encased in an outer shell of brick, and is an object of much interest to travellers. But greater notoriety than either of the foregoing reasons conferred has been gained by the fact that last summer Zaandam fell under Socialist control. The result promises to be similar to other experiments in this line made in some cities of the United States. The "velvet" of salaried offices is greatly enjoyed by the comrades, who are reported as exploiting the municipal milch cow for all she is worth and depleting the treasury, much to the disgust of taxpaying citizens.

The latest rebuff administered to the Socialists in Holland occurred in a by-election at Amsterdam, a district which was considered one of their strongholds and for years had been classified as "red"; nevertheless the Socialist candidate was defeated by a Liberal, aided to some extent by conservative votes. The Socialist majority of 600 votes last June was changed into a minority of nearly 700 in a total of 12,797 ballots. The electorate in Holland is evidently sobering up from last summer's anti-clerical craze. A strong reaction has since set in and in four months' time the Socialist group in Parliament has been reduced from eighteen to fifteen. On the eve of the aforementioned Amsterdam election one of the Socialist leaders is reported to have declared: "Were we to have another general election right now, I believe, the Socialists would be completely 'knocked out.'" However, their fortuitous success last summer seems to have given them considerable prestige in the eyes of their leaders abroad. Thus at the Syndicalist Congress held in London last month, Holland was chosen as the seat of the International Committee in preference to Paris by a vote of eighteen to ten. In the confusion of the debate carried on at the time in a Babel of tongues an amusing phrase is reported as having been used by an excited French delegate in reference to the action of an equally excited delegate from Argentina: "Il demande la clôture et il veut faire un discours!" (He is moving the closure and wants to make a speech.)

The Dutch papers last August contained a report, said at the time as having been confirmed from Washington, that the American Government had entered into negotiations with the present Dutch Cabinet for the acquisition by purchase of Curacoa and Bonaire Islands, Danish

West Indies. What would seem to lend color to the report is the present need of Holland's Public Exchequer in connection with the projected national pension bill, while in view of the approaching opening of the Panama Canal these otherwise unimportant islands are more than likely to become very desirable holdings, both from a commercial and strategic viewpoint.

The Catholic colleges and seminaries of Holland have lately fallen into line as regards the pronunciation of Latin. Heretofore the sound of the classic tongue, as in most foreign countries, was made conformable to the trend in that respect of the vernacular. Henceforth, by a general order of the Episcopate, the Italian pronunciation will be obligatory in all diocesan institutions of learning.

The French Fleet at Beirut

BEIRUTH, November 16, 1913.

The town is still ringing with the last echoes of the reception of the French fleet at Beirut. This reception was nothing short of a triumph and shows how strongly the population of this country still associates the protection of their faith with the French colors.

On Friday, November 7, six destroyers arrived at Beirut: thence one proceeded to Jounich, a small harbor adjoining the residence of the Maronite Patriarch. The following morning the two battleships Mirabeau and Diderot, bearing Rear-Admiral Lacaze's colors, anchored in front of Jounich. There the party was joined by the Consul-General of Beirut, and both, together with thirty-eight officers, landed to pay Mgr. Hoyek, the Patriarch, their formal visit. They were most heartily received by him, and in a speech at the state banquet which followed, he expressed the deep attachment of the Libanese people for the French nation. The Rear-Admiral declared that the French have always felt an especial sympathy for the Maronite nation, and were and would remain the chief protectors of all Christian communities in the East; never would they fail to fulfil the duties such a situation imposed upon them. He also thanked the Patriarch for the enthusiastic reception the people had given him on his way to the Patriarch's residence.

The afternoon was devoted to visiting various religious establishments in the neighborhood. In the evening the whole mountain was ablaze, huge bonfires having been lighted by the people almost on every peak. It was a spontaneous and popular manifestation in honor of the "frigates," as they still term every sort of battleship in the country.

In the meantime Vice-Admiral Boué de Lapeyrère, who had been Ministre de la Marine in the first Briand Cabinet, and is now commander-in-chief of the French Mediterranean forces, had arrived at Beirut with the main body of the fleet.

On Sunday morning all the Catholic Churches of the town were crowded with sailors and officers, eager to fulfil their religious duties and perhaps also to catch a glimpse of the ceremonies of the Oriental rites utterly unknown to them. After the consular Mass in the Franciscan Church, the Admiral paid a formal visit to the Wali, Turkish Governor of the Beirut vilayet. He then returned to his ship, the Voltaire, where he received, during the afternoon, many distinguished visitors, among them the Apostolic Delegate, Mgr. Giannini, who, as such, was greeted by a salute of seventeen guns.

On Monday morning the Admiral visited the building of the Jesuits' Faculty of Medicine and expressed his admiration at the work done there and at the extension of their establishment. In the afternoon he made the return visit to the Delegate. On Thursday morning he went to the Jesuits' college, accompanied by the Consul and many officers. There he presided at an entertainment given in his honor by the boys, and once more expressed his sympathy for the University St. Joseph and the missionaries. Receptions and festivities followed closely on one another during the whole week. A state banquet at the Wali's palace; a state banquet at the Admiral's ship; balls, garden parties and so on were daily events. Nor were the simple sailors neglected. They were welcomed everywhere. An entertainment was given for them on Wednesday afternoon at the Jesuits' college which was attended by about 700 bluejackets and a good number of officers. The "Marseillaise" greeted them on their arrival; and on the stage young actors celebrated every aspect of the sailor's life, now rough, now dull, now poetic, often heroic, and sometimes trivial or humorous.

Then the Rev. Father Chanteur, Provincial of the Province of Lyons, rose to tell his visitors how deeply he felt the honor the sailors had paid to the house in coming in such large numbers. "It is always with a thrill in their hearts," he added, "that the missionaries who have left for ever their dear country meet with its brave sailors and see once more its glorious tricolor which they proudly carry over the rough seas, ready to fight for its honor down to the last drop of their blood."

He exhorted them also never to forget their duties towards the Church, never to forget that they were sons of the Catholic Church which did, as they could see, such marvelous work in the East under the safe and constant protection of the French colors. Loud cheers from the officers and the men showed Father Chanteur had struck the right note. Then the audience was invited to enter the church, which was illuminated as for the greatest feast days, and a solemn Benediction was sung.

On Friday, the 14th, the new Law Faculty was formally inaugurated in the ancient buildings of the Faculty of Medicine. Of course Vice-Admiral Boué de Lapeyrère was there once more with his rear-admirals, his whole staff and not less than sixty officers in full uniform. The Consul-General, the Catholic bishops of the town, the Governor of Lebanon, the Rev. Father Chanteur, the Chancellor of the new Faculty, Mr. Joubin, rector of the Lyons State University, and the whole staff of the two faculties, Law and Medicine, were present, together with all the notabilities of the town.

The opening lecture was delivered by Mr. Huvelin, professor at the Law Faculty of Lyons, who, after having sketched the brilliant past of the Beirut law schools in the Roman times, expressed his hope to see those happy days revive. The extraordinary success the Faculty of Medicine had attained under the able management of the Jesuit Fathers was for him a token that the help of the same collaborators would secure the same success for the new foundation.

In the afternoon the fleet left Beirut and made for the North; but before leaving the Syrian coast the Vice-Admiral wished to pay the Maronite Patriarch a last homage. In front of Jounich the battleships stopped and the destroyer Hussard entered the harbor of the little town. The Patriarch, accompanied by the French Consul-General of Beirut, who had come to meet him at his residence, to return the Admiral's visit, went to the harbor with an escort of Libanese soldiers and was taken on board of the destroyer—a thing unheard of, for, according to immemorial custom, the Patriarch never pays or returns any visit, but sends in his place one of his attending bishops. As he approached the Admiral's ship a salute of twenty guns was fired in his honor, and he was received at the ship's gangway by the Admiral himself with the words: "I am glad and greatly honored to receive the head of the noble Maronite nation." The Patriarch in return expressed the deep sympathy and confidence he and his people had in France, a confidence which had never been deceived. Then a state dinner was given, after which the Patriarch, from the deck of the destroyer which had brought him from Jounich reviewed the whole fleet; and then slowly the six huge battleships went their way towards the North.

Though not himself a very devout Catholic, the Vice-Admiral expressed more than once during this voyage, not only at Beirut, but on every possible occasion, his sincere admiration for the work done in the Near East by the French religious Congregations. He very readily acknowledged that France owed to them, and to them alone, her immense prestige in the eyes of the Eastern populations. May his official reports, for he is a loyal and plain-spoken man, induce the ministers of the present Cabinet or their successors to cease persecuting in the mother country those who serve her so well abroad and ignoring with a stupid obstinacy the Pope, with whom the fate of our Protectorate in the Near East finally rests.

A Distinguished Dane

A little more than two years ago, one of the noblest and best known men of Norway, Dr. Krogh Tønning, departed this life. Now comes the news from Denmark of the recent death of another distinguished man, Hans Christian Jensen, once a Lutheran minister, whose return to the Catholic Church created a sensation. It is true that he did not equal Dr. Krogh Tønning, who was one of the most famous men of Scandinavia, in the extent of his learning, nor did he publish as many books as the Norwegian convert, but they resemble each other in very many ways. Both were Lutheran ministers; both sought the truth with the sincerest honesty, and having found it embraced it in spite of the great sacrifices which they had to make for the Faith which they espoused.

Jensen, who died on the 5th of September, at the age of sixty-five, was the son of a poor peasant, and passed his childhood and youth as a farm laborer. In spite of his surroundings he always cherished the hope of gaining means for a life of study, and soon the opportunity presented itself. The Lutheran minister of his parish taught him Greek and Latin. During the day Jensen toiled at the plow or with the spade and in the evening gave his leisure hours to study. After a very careful preparation he set out for Copenhagen and passed a brilliant examination at the University, but being without resources, he had to return again to his work on the farm. Nevertheless, he continued to pursue his studies. At last, having obtained a little bursary, he went back to Copenhagen and there, by studying privately and acting as a tutor, suffering meantime the pangs of hunger and many privations, he finally passed his examination in theology.

He was well on in years by that time, and in 1877 he was sent out as a missionary to the Indies; but his health broke down in the climate of the tropics and he returned to Denmark with his wife and children in 1881, and was appointed to a parish which was furnished with a good benefice.

His eloquence, his vast knowledge and charm of character won all hearts, and he became one of the most popular preachers of the State Church. An ever-increasing audience continued to gather around his pulpit. He who in his youth had known so many privations now saw himself in the full prominence of his profession and in the enjoyment of the esteem of his people. He then began to doubt the truth of Lutheranism. Being a perfectly sincere man he made no bargain with his conscience and did not stop half way. After a most distressing struggle, deep study and continued prayer, he finally resolved to abandon his pulpit, and bade farewell to his congregation, to which he was tenderly attached. He began his preparation to enter the Church. After the usual instruction he was received by Mgr. Van Euch, Vicar Apostolic of Denmark, November 5th, 1894.

The conversion of this distinguished Lutheran minister startled the country. He wrote two brochures in 1895, one of which was entitled "A Letter to My Protestant Friends," and the other "Who Is Right?" In both of them he describes his spiritual development and explains the motives of his religious conversion.

Like so many others of his compatriots, Jensen had undergone the influence of Nikolai Frederik Severin Grundvig, who was known as the great preacher, historian and poet of Denmark, and who had died in 1872. Grundvig had brought about a complete change in the religious views of his countrymen. "He abandoned," says Jensen, "the Protestant principle that the Bible is the rule of faith, showing that it created continual quarrels among the ministers and a helpless confusion in the minds of the laity." Grundvig adopted the view that the Church's Credo as proclaimed in the Apostles' Creed at each baptism was the essential basis on which Christianity and individual salvation must take their stand. This view was startling in its effect on the people to whom it was addressed, for they were told that if the question were put to them "What am I to do to be saved?" they were to answer, "I must keep my baptismal vows." Evidently such a position was almost that of the Catholic Church. Nevertheless, by an unexplainable inconsequence, Grundvig never became a Catholic, whereas Jensen, his disciple, acted more wisely than his master. He had made very serious ecclesiastical studies; had gone deep into the Reformation, and was thoroughly acquainted with the works of Martin Luther. He discovered that Luther was not as his Protestant eulogists were accustomed to represent him, but merely a proud, apostate monk.

The characteristic of Luther, he found, was simply his refusal to submit to the decision of the Church in the matter of doctrine. Luther placed his personal authority above that of the whole Church. But nowhere do we find in the Bible any promise that the gates of Hell should not prevail against Martin Luther, nor is it worth while to pretend that Luther submitted to the Word of God, as it is expressed in the Bible. For in the first place the Bible may be interpreted in many ways. If there was only one sense which its text might bear, there would not be so many Protestants who differ with each other and yet claim to have discovered the real meaning of the Bible. In studying the history of the Reformation and the religious life of our own day, Jensen saw more and more clearly that Protestantism had not only become feeble, but had lost all its vitality. It had not the power of creating saints, whereas in the Catholic Church, even in our own day, we see the great ones of the earth, the rich and powerful, voluntarily renouncing everything to consecrate themselves to God. Such a sacrifice is a heroic act which proclaims the power of the kingdom of God more effectually than a thousand sermons. To the objection that these truths about the kingdom of God, the dignity of poverty, etc., are also taught in the Protestant churches, he answers, "Yes, such is the case, but the people attach no credit to these claims, for they have no example of any Lutheran abandoning his earthly goods for the kingdom of God, or showing any great desire to purchase the Pearl of Great Price."

Not only by his writings, but also by his conferences, Jensen labored for the Catholic Faith. He was listened to with the greatest interest, because everyone knew the sacrifice which he had made for conscience's sake. He who had been a humble farm laborer and afterwards one of the most famous preachers of the kingdom renounced his position and his benefice, and with his wife and children entered again into the lowly condition of the life in which he was born. He again became a farm laborer, and securing a patch of land, endeavored to support himself by his labor in the fields. "Ex Oratore Arator factus est." He had no longer the strength of his youth. His health gave way and poverty and hunger pursued him and his family until the Vicar Apostolic offered him the position of catechist with a small salary attached. It was scarcely one-fourth of the benefice he had formerly received as a Lutheran minister. People saw with astonishment the famous orator, the man whose learning attracted the attention of the country now a poor school teacher instructing little children in the elements of religion, but in spite of it all, he never lost his tranquillity of soul.

After having frequently testified to his love and devotion to the Catholic Church during life, he again displayed it in a striking fashion when summoned to the world beyond. Two days before his death he dictated the following words which he wished to be sent to the parish priest of Helsingør: "This is my spiritual testament. I die in the Catholic Faith for which I have fought the fight of my life, and I die in the faith in Jesus Christ, and I return my thanks to all those who have shown any affection for me."

When the funeral took place it was easy to see how he had won the affection of his countrymen. The church was crowded with Protestants and Catholics alike. Twelve priests and two Protestant ministers took part in the ceremonies. The bishop, who was unfortunately absent at the time, was represented by one of his distinguished officials.

It may be said here that other notable men have preceded Jensen in these parts in returning to the ancient Church. To name only a few, there are, for example, J. K. V. Hansen, who was converted in 1863, and who translated the Vulgate into Danish; J. Kofoed Hansen, who entered the Church in 1887 and who is the author of many works of great intrinsic value; C. F. Brockdorf, who was converted in 1908, and Niels Hansen, the editor of the excellent Catholic weekly called Nordisk Ugeblad, a publication which has already reached its sixty-first year, and which displays remarkable activity in the propagation of the Catholic Church.

The Coming Year

AMERICA extends to its readers cordial New Year's Greetings. For each and every one may the coming twelve months be as full of worldly prosperity, as men who hope for Heaven can safely possess, but may the everlasting riches of the soul be bestowed without measure. Gratefully acknowledging all the blessings received during the year now ending, and humbly profiting by the recollection of whatever has been done amiss, may all face the future with cheerful courage and resolve that Jan. 1, 1914, shall mark the beginning of a more consistent Christian life.

It is a significant fact that on the same day the civil year opens, the Church observes that on which Our Saviour formally received His name. She sets it at the head of the year to remind her children that just as it cost the Infant Christ pain and suffering to take and keep His name, followers of Christ who are Christians indeed, must be ready to make the sacrifices that are the price we pay for the honor of bearing His name. Never before perhaps in our country's history was there a time when more depended on the children of the Church being faithful to their Mother's teaching, and making the beauty of her holiness appear in their lives. The Church is the only power in the world to-day that can stay effectively the spread of corruption, anarchy and infidelity. Staunch Catholics have seldom had so excellent an opportunity to show themselves the salt of the earth and the saviors of society.

If, for instance, on the first of January every man and woman in this land who was baptized a Catholic should withdraw forever their cooperation, patronage or friendship from all who are responsible for the bad plays, songs, books, pictures and dances that are now so lamentably common, what a marvelous purifying of the moral atmosphere would soon follow! Or if on the First of January and thereafter every Catholic in this country should be found zealously supporting lawful authority and fearlessly combating political dishonesty of all kinds; or if all who bear the name of Catholics became such in word and deed on January First and so remained the year through, what a marvelous power their faith and works would have in winning to the Church the millions of people in the United States whom disintegrating Protestantism or aggressive unbelief are leaving indifferent to all religion and without God in this world!

But to be Catholics of the kind described means sacrifice and self-denial. The high ideals of faith and conduct the Church holds up to her children can be attained only by those who are ready to renounce and forego many things that the world now considers desirable and lawful. Catholics who ask at Holy Mass to enjoy one day "some part and fellowship" with the Blessed Saints should remember that that prayer will hardly be granted save to those who now have some part and fellowship in the self sacrifice and renunciation that won the Saints their crowns.

In the Trap

Some time ago Cardinal Matthieu prophesied that France would be reconciled to the Vatican in Constantinople. Possibly the prophecy may soon be fulfilled, because, at the present moment, France is in hysterics about the loss of her prestige in the East. The famous Protectorate, which was her especial glory, while being at the same time a valuable political asset, is passing into the hands of her enemies, the Italians and Germans, and there is no way to prevent the transfer except by appealing to the Pope. But that is out of the question, for her rulers have declared that for France the Pope has ceased to exist.

The whole press is shrieking about it. The Journal came out lately with a solid "clerical" article, quite out of keeping with its flippant anti-clerical character; the Intrasigeant has admitted to its columns an interview with Denys Cochin, who flatly denounced the attitude of the Government as stupid; while Georges Berry, a deputy, wrote an article in the same paper and declared that "the reconciliation was not only desirable, but would be a fait accompli in six months." In the radical Paris-Journal, another deputy, François Deloncle, did not hesitate to state that he had started a campaign, and had already secured a majority of votes in the Chambers to carry the measure through; and Le Temps, Les Débats, l'Echo de Paris, La Lanterne, l'Aurore, are all writing in the same strain.

Meantime a battle royal is being waged between Clemenceau and the Count de Mun on the same question. "It will be the end of laïcisme" shouts Clemenceau. "What do we want with your laïcisme" retorts de Mun, "if it is ruining France?" "The Pope did not give us the Protectorate in any case," says Clemenceau. "If it were not for the Pope," rejoins de Mun, "there would be no Frenchmen in the East to protect." Thus it goes on, and the people are opening their eyes to the folly of the anti-

Catholic policy, which satisfies the hatred of a few politicians, but is inflicting irreparable disaster on the country, both at home and abroad.

Since the rupture, the Church has prospered marvelously. Indeed, she has benefited in so many ways that some are beginning to say that Loubet's journey to the Quirinal was a trap set for the French Government. It was, indeed, but it was not set by the Pope. The foolish politicians who rule France have fallen into their own pit, and are now crying for some one to help them out.

Cardinal Rampolla

In the death of Cardinal Mariano Rampolla del Tindaro there has passed a statesman who has left a mark on the history of the age, and one also on whose memory the Catholic faithful may dwell with peculiar satisfaction. He had not only filled a lofty position and long exercised potent influence in the Church, but his singleness of purpose as priest, prelate and Cardinal, his loftiness of character, purity of motive and stainlessness of life, stand out in as strong relief as the brilliancy of his career before the world. Devoting himself from earliest years to the service of the Church, he gave all of his great talents and acquirements to that service up to the last day of his seventy years. The distinction he attained in inducing a great Protestant power to accept the arbitrament of the Holy See, and in postponing or allaying the hostility of governments, is of public knowledge; what is not so well known was his personal holiness, and the magnanimous humility that never permitted him to vindicate his motives or justify himself against calumnious attack. When, under what the world called defeat, he resigned the most exalted station in Christendom save one, he continued to place his experience at the service of the great Pontiff who was preferred before him, while employing his new leisure in communing with God and rescuing from oblivion the Saints of the Catacombs. No wonder Pius X has declared him one of the Church's greatest, and that even in his retirement his greatness had increased. The estimate of him pronounced in 1882, when Nuncio to Madrid, may now serve as his epitaph: "Of noble descent, of finished education, of vast knowledge, he is also a priest of great piety, and a prelate of complete disinterestedness, whose only aim is to serve the Church and the Holy See."

"O Tempora! O Mores!"

It is a pleasure for AMERICA to record and commend the attitude toward the "modern dances" taken by the Visitation Alumnæ of Brooklyn. That organization has been accustomed to hold an annual subscription dance, which is regarded in Catholic circles as a social event of considerable importance. On December 15, when the matter came up before the Alumnæ's Executive Board, the following question was put: "Shall we hold our dance and approve of the modern dances, as exemplified by the subscription dances held this season, or cancel the dance and take our place in the community with Cardinal Farley and our bishops, as opposed to modern dances in their present general form?" A vote by secret ballot was then taken, and it was found that the forty ladies present unanimously decided to cancel the dance. As it is practically impossible just now to control at a large affair the character of the dancing, the only alternative the Visitation Alumnæ felt they could adopt was to give up their ball altogether. Notwithstanding the sacrifices this decision, of course, involved, when these ladies saw what their duty as consistent Catholics demanded of them, they were not found wanting.

For reasons similar to those that influenced the Visitation Alumnæ, the Ladies' Auxiliary of St. Vincent's Hospital, New York, have also decided not to hold, this year, their usual subscription dance. Consequently the Sisters who conduct the hospital lose a generous donation, but the uncompromising stand that the Ladies' Auxiliary have thus taken regarding objectionable dances is of priceless value to the Catholic cause. Judging by the press reports of several social affairs held during the past year under Catholic auspices, it is certainly high time we heard some protests as vigorous and sincere as those the Visitation Alumnæ and the Ladies' Auxiliary have made against the "modern dances." What a sad indication it is, however, of the moral decadence of our times that Catholic organizations, because they are confessedly unable to keep immodest movements from being danced at a subscription ball, are forced to discontinue altogether social affairs that have been for years occasions of innocent enjoyment to the participants and a source of revenue to deserving charities.

Wrong Notions

When the United States decreed that it was advisable to give the Filipinos a more equitable share in the government of our possessions, or theirs, our Anglo-Saxon brethren fell into a panic. The measure in their eyes was most ill-advised, for they were sure that the Filipinos were quite incapable of shouldering such a responsibility, and the Islands would speedily lapse into their former condition of savagery. Archbishop Harty, of Manila, who has just arrived at San Francisco, calms our fears. Eager reporters hastily crowded around him as he stepped on the pier, to obtain information about the disasters that were sure to follow fast on the mistake of putting a majority of natives on the Commission, as Mr. Burton Harrison, the Governor, had just done. But the Archbishop, who is an enthusiastic American, comforted them, "There are many Filipinos in the Islands," he said, "who will measure up with men anywhere, and they have a tremendous influence for good over their compatriots. The four men who have been selected for the Commission are respected by everyone. Señor Mappa, formerly a Justice of the Supreme Court, is a sound lawyer and a thoroughly conscientious man. I know him, as I also know Señors Illustro, Sinsong de Veyra and Palma, the other members, intimately; and I hold them all in the highest esteem."

Thus, if we may trust the distinguished prelate, the little brown men of the East will do about as well as ourselves on the Philippines Commission. Surely, nothing better could be conceived.

Perhaps, however, we should not be blamed for our absurd notions about the people of other countries who do not enjoy our advantages. Sometimes they have very curious notions about us. Thus an American, writing from Munich, complains of a play called "The Copper King," that is being presented to the public, and is supposed to portray prevailing conditions in the United States. It introduces an Indian chief living in New York, who refuses to permit his son to indulge in the tango and other dances in the domestic domain, whereupon the youth betakes himself to Chicago, in the "Far West," becomes a Copper King, and returns a millionaire. The mollified parent welcomes the fugitive, and out of regard for the requirements of high life, lays aside his Indian apparel for the conventional garb required at public receptions, but allows the Japanese, Indian and negro guests to dress as they please. It may be that the play is intended to be only a howling farce, or perhaps even it was not given at all, and the young man who wrote about it may have been amusing himself at the expense of his fellow countrymen, but the fact remains that in many parts of Europe there is a common impression that the red man is still abroad in our thoroughfares, and that many of us show Indian characteristics in our conduct, in which latter respect they are not far wrong. Of course, they should be better informed about us, but so should we about certain other races, who were civilized when we were not.

Eunomic League

The American Eunomic League has issued the first number of its official organ, The Eunomic Review. Although at present only a four-page leaflet it contains sufficient matter to attract the attention of Catholics who are interested in social questions. Fortunately, the number of those who are not satisfied to respond to the popular needs of our day with a mere shrug of the shoulders and the careless excuse that they are not their brothers' keepers, is daily increasing. The few pages before us are intelligent and sound in thought, and interesting in their expression of it. The department, "Subjects of the Day," is open for free discussion, we are told, and the editors are not responsible for the sentiments expressed. Since this is a very considerable section of the little journal, there may be danger of breeding confusion instead of promoting orthodoxy. For the benefit of readers not acquainted with the nature and purpose of the Eunomic League we quote the following statement of the scope and program of the association:

"The American Eunomic League is an association for the discussion and scientific examination of those social problems which demand the immediate attention of thinking Catholics. Its name, Eunomic—derived from the Greek signifying 'well-lawed'—amply describes its chief aim. The active members of the League are drawn from Catholic men and women who are either college students or graduates, or have been admitted to professional life. The associate membership comprises those Catholics who have attained distinction in economic, political, charitable, or religious affairs. The League is in no respect a political organization; it confines its work entirely to questions of social science and adequate laws.

"The purpose of the League as an organization is to awake the interest of Catholics in social problems. Its aims are practical rather than theoretical. With the proper cooperation, it hopes to formulate a constructive program aiming at an enforcement of the frequently neglected sense of personal and joint responsibility for the use of certain specific rights, likewise at an elimination of false principles of social reform. In brief, it strives to effect a return to clear thinking and applied Christianity in the everyday problems of life, whether personal, legal or economic."

We are sure that all our readers will not only sympathize with the Protestant Bishop of Zanzibar, whose difficulties we put before them in this number, but will also help him to their solution with many prayers. But all Church of England Bishops are not such as he. Dr. Samuel Thornton, we learn from "Who's Who," was born in 1835, and after holding various preferments at home, became Bishop of Ballarat in 1875. In 1900 he resigned and returned to England. He describes his "recreations" as follows: "His boating, tennis and horseback days are over. Reading is his recreation—in all departments. Humani nihil alienum puto." How perfectly true is this last the following from the Times proves:

"THORNTON : RICE.—On the 29th Nov., at Kensington Parish Church, by the Bishop of Kensington, assisted by Revd. G. Flynn, Vicar of Heaton, Bradford, SAMUEL THORNTON, D.D., Bishop of Ballarat from 1875 to 1900, and CAROLINE WAKEFIELD, relict of REV. J. J. RICE, D.D., late Vicar of St. Saviour's, Batterseapark."

He is only seventy-eight. He lost his first wife, after forty-three years of married life, four years ago, and takes for his second a widow, the widow of a clergyman. Another bishop blessed their union. With what facts in the early Church do the proclaimers of continuity link this up, and what are the links in the Church of England before it "washed its face but did not change it"?

The act of February 22, 1883, appropriates $140,000 to be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury to the officers and crews of the Wyoming and Jamestown for extraordinary, valuable, and specially meritorious and perilous services in the destruction of hostile vessels in the Straits of Shimonoseki, Japan, in July, 1863, and September, 1864. Of that appropriation nearly one-fifth remains unexpended, due, it is said, to the fact that many of those Congress desired to benefit have never known that any provision was made for them, and so have never made any claim for a part of the reward.

LITERATURE

Gaelic Prayers and Other Songs*

Dr. Sigerson has a very interesting collection, probably the best of its kind, entitled "Songs of the Gael and Gall," which his own faithful rendering, true to the Gaelic sound and sense, has given special value. Miss Hull's "Textbook of Irish Literature" and her versions of the Cuchullin epics have considerably widened the popular knowledge of the large volume of ancient Ireland's unique and valuable literature, particularly the heroic tales and poems of pagan days. Her present collection eliminates the "Gall" altogether, also the "Neo-Celtic" poet or poetaster, and brings together what she deems the most characteristic of the innumerable lyrics that sing of religion, love, patriotism, and what else was enshrined in song by the many-sided fancy of the Gael when Gaelic alone was the medium of his utterance. Some of her cullings have appeared elsewhere, but most of them are new, and with few exceptions, are equally creditable to the collector and the language and people that produced them. They are particularly interesting in this that they represent what the uncontaminated Gael wrote and thought while untouched by foreign inspiration, or influenced only by the religious culture that radiated from Rome.

Divided into ancient pagan, Ossianic, early Christian, patriotic, and the love and prayer songs of the people, those specifically religious occupy more than a third of the 350 pages, and few of the remainder lack the religious note. Its presence enhances their poetic value, for unlike many of our English hymns the Gaelic prayer songs are as remarkable for poetry as piety, and so firm is their poetic fibre that its substance abides after translation has stripped it of the cunning interlinking of rhyme, alliteration and assonance. But be the theme sacred or profane, of saints, heroes, love, valor, the winds, the seas, the birds, the varied beauties of nature, there is always a distinctively Irish flavor of unique and naive freshness that will provide constant surprises and agreeable relief to the jaded readers of modern verse. "It is the heart expression of a passionate, imaginative and clear-thinking people who felt and loved and prayed with an intensity and simple directness which, under the influence of their traditional bardic training, would seem to have inspired the spontaneous wording of their thoughts with the true accent of poetry.

The first and longest selection is from the 150 cantos of Aengus the Culdee, who anticipated Milton by eight centuries, and considerably bettered him, in the effort "to justify the ways of God to men." His scheme is far more comprehensive than Milton's, and the working out of it is thoroughly Christian in tone and purely Irish in coloring, achievements that have no correspondence in the English Puritan epic. He describes "The King of the pure heavens; without pride, without contention, my own King, ever-living, ever victorious, King of the Mysteries who wast and art before the elements, before the ages, . . . King very youthful, King aged long ago"; and how He moulded the earth and skies and moderated the lustrous winds, and "created the pure heavenly home, a far, long spacious plain, a land of holy ones, the Sons of life," and "ordained the voice of the heavenly ones full, long swelling as the mighty wave of many waters." The poem enlarges in peculiarly Irish style on the conversations between Adam and Eve and Lucifer and Michael, traces the fall and rise of man through the whole biblical narrative, and sketches the Life of Christ, ending with the Resurrection. The Second Adam suffered agony in Hebron where the body of the first was buried, and died on Calvary whither "the coming of the wave-strength of the flood carried his head from Adam and brought it to Jerusalem," where "afterwards the Cross of Christ was planted in the flesh of Adam." Fifty pages are given to this most original poem, and one could wish them extended further.

The colloquy on the source of poetic inspiration between the Old Poet who "moved along the columns of age and the streams of inspiration into the lofty heights of honor," and the Young Poet, who "sprang from the heel of the wise, from the meeting-place of wisdom, where righteousness is instilled and falsehood wanes into twilight," is taken from the Book of Leinster and is of pre-Christian origin. This is the Young Poet's genesis: "I am the Son of Poetry, Poetry Son of Investigation, Investigation Son of Meditation, Meditation Son of Lore, Lore Son of Research, Research Son of Inquiry, Inquiry Son of Knowledge, Knowledge Son of Good Sense, Good Sense Son of Understanding, Understanding Son of Wisdom, Wisdom Son of the Three Gods of Poetry"; and he asks of his senior: "O Fount of Wisdom, of whom art thou the Son?" They were masters of courtesy as well as poesy.

The Cuchullin and Ossianic lyrics of heroism, love, sorrow and the charms of nature, ringing with passionate sincerity, are as long-lived as the themes they sing, and the parting with his wife of Goll Mac Morna, chief of the Connacht Fians, is as fine an expression of heroic marital fidelity as poetry records. They form a fitting prelude to the early Christian poems, which retain their predecessors' love of nature and lofty deeds, and sweeten them with Charity and Hope. St. Cellach (about A.D. 540) confronting his murderers on the morning of his execution, forgets them in the glory of the Dawn:

"Hail to thee, morning fair, that falls as a flame on the green-sward;
Hail unto Him who bestows her, the morning ever fruitful in blessings.
"Robed in her pride she comes, the brilliant sun's little sister,
Hail to thee, thrice hail! that lightest my Book of the Hours.
Thou searchest the secret dwelling, on clansman and kindred thou shinest;
White-necked, beautiful, hail! who makest thine uprising golden."

The crow, kite and raven, the foxes, dogs and wolves that will fatten on his flesh pass before his vision, and more painfully, the false friends who betrayed him, but unlike Goll and his wife in the same plight, Cellach has his consolation:

"Yet in high heaven above me, the great Son of Mary is speaking:
'Thou art forsaken on earth; but a welcome awaits thee in Heaven.'"

The reply of Marvan, the monk, to his brother, King Guaire, and the Song of Manchan the Hermit, seventh century, are beautiful comminglings of grace and nature, and might have been sung by St. Francis were he acquainted with Gaelic measures; nor would he disdain the Prayer that contains the lines:

"Be Thou my Vision, O Lord of my heart
Naught is all else to me, save that Thou art.
Thou my Great Father, I thy dear son;
Thou in me dwelling, I with thee one.
Be Thou my battleshield, sword for the fight,
Be Thou my dignity, Thou my delight.

*The Poem Book of the Gael. By Eleanor Hull. Chicago: Browne & Howell Co. London: Chatto & Windus.

Thou my soul's shelter, Thou my high tower;
 Raise Thou me heavenward, Power of my power.
 Thou, and Thou only, first in my heart
 High King of Heaven, my treasure Thou art.
 Heart of my own heart, whatever befall Still be my Vision, O Ruler of all."

A distinguished English Catholic scholar has recently informed us that the famous tracery and illuminative work, of which the frontispiece of this book presents a fine example, was purely mechanical and required no intellectual training. The skill which could enclose 158 double interlacements within three-eighths of a square inch, as in the Book of Kells, and so perfect that the magnifying lens reveals not the slightest unevenness, and which multiplied designs similarly wrought in endless variety, must have been more than mechanical; but we have positive proofs in this book that the scribes were poets and scholars. too. Several of the poems were found on the margins of biblical and classical MSS. in continental libraries, written by Irish scribes, when, weary of their task, the song of a bird or other incident awoke the muse within them. The blackbird and the cuckoo, feathered hermits calling the Hours, are the usual incitements, but a student in Carinthia was inspired to write Gaelic verse on the margin of St. Paul's Epistles by seeing Pangur Ban, his cat, catching mice as he was catching meanings. This is one of many clever antithetic quatrains:

"'Gainst the wall he sets his eye,
 Full and fierce and sharp and sly;
 'Gainst the wall of Knowledge I
 All my little wisdom try."

"The Song of the Seven Archangels" for each day of the week, and the poetic and prayerful "Song of the Four Seasons" are an ancient counterpart of the wealth of more modern Gaelic prayer-songs that consecrate every hour and act to God. In these, too, nature and grace commingle familiarly but reverently, as exemplified in the couplet:

"A low prayer, a high prayer I send through space.
 Arrange them Thyself, O Thou King of Grace."

There are prayers to the Trinity and the saints and angels for all the needs of night and day; of thanksgiving to "The Great Giver of the Open Hand"; many touching poems to "Mary, my Thousand Loves," and numerous developments of the twelfth century poem, "How great the tale that there should be in God's Son's Heart a place for me!" Mary is the "Rose amid red roses," the stainless Mother of Christ's choosing, the Nurse of the fair white Lamb, "within whose breast, as in a nest, the Paraclete reposes"; and the story of Mother and Child receive many a touching Gaelic coloring. A very ancient poem pictures the mothers of the Innocents bewailing their slaughtered babes, one of them exclaiming in Celtic fashion: "His life was the breath of me, his death is the death of me"; the more modern cling close to Jesus and Mary, but also in Irish fashion. "Mary's Vision" illustrates their warmth of feeling and classic brevity:

"Are you asleep, Mother?"

"I am not indeed, my Son."

"How is that, Mother?"

"Because of a vision I have of Thee."

"What vision is that, Mother?"

"There came a slim dark man on a slender black steed, a sharp lance in his left hand which pierced thy right side, letting thy sacred blood pour down upon Thee."

"True is that vision, Mother."

The "Keening of Mary," a masterpiece of dramatic pathos and sympathetic insight, is too lengthy for citation. From several Christmas hymns we select one in which Douglas Hyde partially reproduces the Gaelic rhythm:

"Hail to thee, thou holy Babe, in the manger now so poor

"Yet so rich Thou art, I ween, high within the highest door.
 Little Babe who art so great, Child so young, who art so old,
 In the manger small His room, Whom not Heaven itself could hold.

Motherless, with mother here; fatherless, a tiny span;
 Ever God in Heaven's height, first to-night becoming man.
 Father—not more old than Thou! Mother—younger can it be?
 Older, younger is the Son; younger, older she than He."

The secular selections are usually wholesome and beautiful, but one could dispense with a few of them, and also with much of the author's introduction, which in reading the philosophy of the pagan neo-Celtics into the Ossianic dialogues and medieval asceticism, shows that her heart is less Celtic than her head. But her notes and renderings are excellent, and for that and the other good work her industry has achieved for Ireland, Christian and pagan, we may say for her in her own translation, and for all others:

"May the will of God be done by us,
 May the death of the saints be won by us,
 And the light of the Kingdom begun in us;
 May Jesus the Child, be beside my bed,
 May the Lamb of mercy uplift my head;
 May the Virgin her heavenly brightness shed,
 And Michael be steward of my soul."

M. KENNY, S.J.

Ethics and Modern Thought. By RUDOLF EUCKEN. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.00.

In six lectures, delivered last February at New York University, Professor Eucken offers a remedy by which the theoretical disintegration of morality prevailing to-day may be stayed. The lecturer, who is senior professor of philosophy in the University of Jena, tells us that his teaching appeals "less to the student and philosopher than to the cultured public at large." He is one of the many who aim at turning the cultivated thought of to-day out of the groove set for it by mechanical evolution and empiricism, or what the professor has euphemistically called realism, applying to a partial and less important part of what is realism a term that should comprehend all that is outside of the phantasmagoria of dreams or the dissolving views of German idealism. His peculiar solution is to make yoke-fellows of immanent idealism and religion. The offspring of this misalliance begets somewhere in the twilight zone of thought, a new self, a soul that is in all respects a source of independent life. The natural Ego whose life is without inner significance gives place to a spiritual Self, in which man "is the representative of a new and specific kind of life." Having enfranchised himself from the natural Ego, he "is conscious of finding his real self." He acquires "an individuality and is able to embrace a whole of reality into the life of which he submerges himself." This process of embracing a whole and submerging oneself in it, and at the same time finding one's real self in it, develops one's innermost being apart from any end outside oneself in "a new and independent phase of reality." The outcome of the process is autonomy. Only the autonomous man has a spiritual self and is truly capable of morality. The consciousness of one's independence of any end outside of oneself and one's absorption into an absolute whole of reality when suffused with emotion is religion. Seriously and without any desire to seem flippant, it is difficult to see in all this anything but a sublimation of the theory more crudely symbolized by the omphalopsychitos.

Now the problem of morality is theoretically a simple one. We are intimately aware of an ideal norm of conduct which we necessarily accept as obligatory in character. That man finds within him a faculty by which he is compelled to recognize that certain modes of conduct are good and others evil, and to acknowledge that he ought to do the one and avoid the other, is as objective an averment of reason as any that we possess. An explanation of this original and intellectual conception of duty is demanded by the student and philosopher, and is desired even by the public at large. All men who speculate at all on right and wrong want to know the nature and source of obligation. A philosophy that does not adequately and intelligently unfold the binding character of the intellectual impulse which we express by "Ought" is a barren fig-tree in the pathway of those going up to Jerusalem, raising hopes when seen at a distance, but proving futile when examined closely. Its foliage may be abounding and palatable to a "cultured public," whose tastes have been educated to enjoy it; its fruit is a phantasm, unsubstantial to the deep-seated cravings of the human heart in quest of knowledge on the essential questions of life.

Professor Eucken has missed the central problem of morality. The primary question is not, what I should do to realize my inner life, but what power is it that puts a bond on my will, obliging me to realize any life. When this is settled, we may be able to determine what is our inner life and our spiritual self. But until it is settled we shall be like those medieval philosophers, gens ratione furens et mentem pasta chimæris, a people reasoning from no centre, and occupied in making kaleidoscopic schemes of the universe out of the foggy luminosities of German idealism. What the thinking world to-day wants is an ultimate rational answer to the question: "Why?"

TIMOTHY BROSNAHAN, S.J.

Bull Run, Its Strategy and Tactics. By R. M. JOHNSTON. Boston and New York: Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50.

The title of this book is rather surprising. The general idea is that Bull Run is noteworthy for its lack of strategy and tactics. The reader, however, will soon discover that this is really what the author wishes to insist on. We are inclined to blush when Bull Run is mentioned, holding it to be in American history what Sheriffmuir was in the Jacobite rising. When one has read this book, he will be inclined to reform his ideas. The wonder is, not that men ran away, but that three months' volunteers whose time had nearly expired under officers, the best of whom could not have had their confidence as skilled leaders in war, and of whom too many could ask nothing better than silence, brought under fire for the first time, behaved as well as they did. General McDowell had a task he was unequal to, but through the incompetence of his opponents he nearly accomplished it.

The author throws no little light on the problems that make strategy a task of infinite difficulty. He puts before us Beauregard's plan of campaign, which would have worked admirably had his men been disembodied spirits. But as they were men needing food and able to march only a certain distance every day, it was impossible of execution. The book is instructive, not only for military men, but also for their critics, especially of the editorial room. H. W.

A Source Book for Ancient Church History. By JOSEPH CULLEN AYER. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.00.

This work has been prepared for the use of Protestant divinity students. The author does not seem to have been under the influence of any particular Protestant bias in composing it. On the other hand, he assumes that it will be used in connection with the class text books, so that he leaves to them the interpretation of the passages quoted. However, he cannot altogether avoid errors when there is question of Rome. Thus, speaking of the sixth canon of Nice, he says that the words, "The Roman Church has always had the primacy," were early prefixed to it as its first clause; that the Roman legates quoted it thus at Chalcedon, but were immediately confuted by the Eastern theologians, which is not real history. It is a desultory work, and does not seem to respond to any need. The real student must go to the originals and read them in their context. If he trusts to such a book as this, which has not behind it the weight of Catholic authority, he will find himself tumbling into pitfalls.

Parish Sermons on Moral and Spiritual Subjects for All Sundays and Feasts of Obligation. By REV. WALTER ELLIOTT, of the Paulist Fathers. New York: The Paulist Press. $1.50.

Sermons and Homilies. By EDMUND ENGLISH, Canon of Westminster Cathedral and Missionary Rector of St. James's, Twickenham. New York: Longmans, Green and Co. $1.35.

Father Elliott's numerous friends will be gratified to learn that he has gathered into a volume of 457 large pages more than a hundred "Parish Sermons" on a remarkably wide variety of subjects. On texts, taken as a rule from each Sunday's Gospel, he builds two discourses, one longer than the other, but neither too long. They are direct, practical and rich in examples, quotations and allusions that indicate his familiarity with the Church's hagiographic and ascetic literature. The book is dedicated with "affection and gratitude" to the parish clergy.

Quite different from the American priest's discourses both in style and treatment are Canon English's eighteen "Sermons and Homilies." He is an estimable preacher who studies in sedate periods the character of Holy Simeon, Pontius Pilate, Nicodemus, etc., or in sermons for feast days soberly inculcates "those venerable principles of the spiritual life which have been handed down in the tradition of the Church." The volume is dedicated to the congregation of St. James's Church, Twickenham, to whom Canon English has preached for more than twenty-five years. A sermon on the Immaculate Conception in each of these volumes the reviewer began to read, hoping against hope, that the Blessed Virgin would not be called once more "Our tainted nature's solitary boast." But he finished the discourses a disappointed man.

THE DRAMA

What Actors Think

In the New York Times of December 17, under the heading "Theatrical Notes," we read two announcements, one that "The Eternal Mystery," which was withdrawn in New York as "unsuited for the stage"—a euphemism of course—"was later produced with success in Pittsburgh, and after one performance in Detroit was withdrawn." The second announcement is that Oscar Hammerstein threatens to sue David Belasco so as to prevent him from putting moving pictures of "The Traffic in Souls" on the stage of The Republic, "because of their indecency."

From which it would appear almost hopeless to denounce these outrages against morals. If they are withdrawn in one place they are produced in another, or even in the place itself with some ridiculously slight alterations, the excitement caused by the protest being their best advertisement. Sometimes perhaps the denunciation is deliberately planned for the purpose of attracting attention. It may be, however, that while the stronger sex is helpless, our women folk may do the cleaning for us. At least, Cyril Maude, who is an authority in stage matters, assures us that it rests with them. In addressing the Barnard dramatic associations, after warning them of the dangers facing young women who fancy they are going to achieve glory as actresses, he said:

"It is the young women who have the future of the stage in their hands; it is women who keep the theatres open. It is they who, therefore, rule the theatre. It is the women who choose what styles of play shall be a success in New York; it is the women, not the men. Here is really a case in which you all have indeed the suffrage, the power of deciding what type of play shall succeed. There has been a great outcry lately, too, in New York against a certain type of distinctly unpleasant play. Play after play of the same kind was produced however, I hear. It was, I fear it must have been, the women's vote that did it. And now the city is flooded with such stories upon the stage.

"So take care, dear ladies, how you exercise the privilege of the vote which controls the style of play that shall succeed. You have heard it said that the hand that rocks the cradle rules the world. So it does, God bless it, the dear, dainty hand, and it also passes the dollars over the box office counter. Take care to make it hand them over for worthy plays, not sordid, miserable, diseased dramas, the medicine chest drama, the operating room drama. They are not good for any of us to watch, and, believe me, they are the worst enemies of the actor and actress, for they really keep people from liking the idea of going to the theatre."

Unfortunately, there are some fair ladies who do not agree with Mr. Maude. Thus when a Police Inspector arrested Mr. Hamburg for an indecent show, Mrs. Belmont, Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt and Mrs. Inez Milholland Boissevain protested, as their lawyer "Abe" Gruber put it, that it was "a moral preachment, and that it had no tendency to degrade or demoralize." Mrs. Catt said that "girls were enlightened by such illustrations and would warn their companions and the show would result in moral good." Their impressions succeeded in acquitting Hamburg, although the play was judged to be highly immoral by James B. Reynolds, who as a former Assistant District Attorney, was counsel to the Rockefeller white slave Grand Jury, and who as the Mayor's secretary twelve years ago instituted investigations of the employment bureaus of the city on the ground that they were using their offices for immoral purposes, and Miss Margaret E. Luther, superintendent of the Florence Crittenton Home, who has seen fourteen years of white slave traffic.

These two very competent judges witnessed the performance, but their serious judgment formed after years of experience was set aside for the deluded fancy of three professional suffragettes.

Another well known actor, De Wolf Hopper expressed himself in a similar strain, about present theatre conditions, but without referring to the part that women can take in the work of purification. His words had especial significance as they were uttered at a dinner of the "Friars," who, to judge from their insulting and indecent bill posters are not very scrupulous about the proprieties.

"Why," he said, "it has become so in this town, that the question is, not where we shall go, but where we can go. It has been a season of salacious plays, disgusting, prurient and vulgar. What do managers mean? What have they in mind? This sort of thing can't last. A decent public won't continue to stand for such things? Why, therefore, have any of it?"

While he was speaking, it was remarked that in more than one chair a man stirred uneasily and glanced at his neighbor. The merry spirit of the evening had been, for the time being, swept away by Mr. Hopper's emphatic accusations.

"And vaudeville," he continued, "has taken up this salaciousness. There is one theatre here that has devoted itself to such productions all season. It's rotten."

A third actor, Arnold Daly, has also taken up the cudgels, but while sharing in his indignation against what are commonly known as "Vice Plays," we cannot support him in approving certain other performances which appeal to him because they possess what he calls "thought." He finds them in the four Jewish theatres on the Bowery, the Lipzin, the People's, the Thalia and the Grand.

"What plays are they playing?" he asks. "They play Gorky's 'At the Bottom of Life,' 'Children of the Sea,' Ibsen's 'Lady of the Sea,' 'Ghosts,' in fact all of Ibsen's, Strindberg's 'The Father,' Maeterlinck's 'Monna Vanna,' plays of Hauptmann; Sudermann; the great Russian realist, Ostrovsky; Pshebishevsky's 'The Snow Storm.' They also play Jacob Gordin's work, the man who wrote the 'Kreutzer Sonata'—the man who gave his life to bring the young Jewish mind to New York, up to thought—who forced them to make thinking their amusement—who knew that this strong meat would produce healthy-minded, clear-thinking men."

Such plays may, as he fancies, induce the young Jew to think, and think strongly, but to think wrongly. Gross immorality in the people is indeed a source of terrible danger for our country, but in some of the dramas that excite Mr. Daly's admiration there is not only immorality, but the inculcation of principles that make directly for the destruction of the present order of civilization. In his sæva indignatio he places us between the devil and the deep sea. We shall avoid both.

J. Ranken Towse, the veteran critic of the New York Evening Post, who is writing a history of "Sixty Years of the Theatre" for that paper, expresses himself in the issue of December 13 as follows on the present degraded condition of the stage and its causes:

"During the last fifty years the art of acting upon the English-speaking stage has steadily declined. Judging by the standards which prevailed at the beginning of that period, there is not upon the American stage to-day a single player, male or female, of the first rank, and this result is due chiefly to the establishment of the commercial star and circuit system by speculative managers, possessed of considerable executive ability, but, as a rule, devoid of artistic knowledge, instincts, or ambition; partly to the creation of railroads, which have made the circuit system feasible, and partly to the enormous improvements in mechanical and lighting devices, which have increased the possibilities of spectacle and thus enabled managers to attract the remunerative crowd, with whom an appeal to the eye is so much more potent than an appeal to the understanding or good taste. It is a popular dogma that old men are apt to underestimate and decry the present in comparing with the past—to find new savors insipid and inferior—but I do not believe that I can be justly included in that category. My interest in the theatre is still keen, in spite of frequent weariness and vexation of spirit, and my belief in its infinite potentialities, if wisely conducted as an agent of the higher civilization, is as profound and unshaken as ever. It is the one human institution, of which all the arts are the handmaids, whose peculiar privilege it is to illustrate and enforce the soundest principles of art, morality, and social law, under the seductive guise of entertainment. It must fascinate or amuse, or be powerless for good. If it does nothing but amuse, it is worthless and probably mischievous. Horribly mismanaged and abused for many years, it has fallen into depths of degradation, lower and more poisonous, if less frankly coarse, than those reached by the comedy of the Restoration. But it is a long lane that has no turning. Already there are signs, daily growing stronger, of coming radical changes in existing conditions, if not of a general reformation. Among these are the multiplying perplexities, and difficulties, and wavering policies of the syndicates, whose expensive and inferior shows are finding successful rivals in the cheaper and more honest diversion of vaudeville and the 'movies'; the organization of stock companies in this country and in England; the entrance of new and capable writers, male and female, into the dramatic field, and the appearance in England of a new group of young and promising actors. All these phenomena are encouraging, and sometimes I indulge in the sanguine dream that I may yet, at the end of life, witness something like a revival of what was best in the old dispensation whose dying throes I watched in my adolescence."

EDUCATION

Offensive Teaching in a New England High School—Taxing Catholic Schools in Philadelphia

The advocates of religious instruction in the common schools of the country are usually answered by the well-worn cry that the thing is impossible. In a country like ours, we are assured, where there is absolute separation between Church and State and where every individual is entirely free to profess or not to profess belief in a religious creed, the only reasonable process in school management is to eliminate every phase of religious teaching from the curriculum of the common schools. Favoring no creed the formation and training assured in strictly secular schools may be shared in by all alike,—by pagan and atheist and agnostic and Jew and Gentile. To be sure the absurd contention that a non-religious system offers the sole manner of safeguarding religious freedom has been proved baseless over and over again; as it has been clearly shown over and over again to be inevitable that a system claiming to be purely secular cannot fail in its practical workings to offend against the religious convictions of the young people following its courses of instruction. Religion is a virtue so interwoven into every detail—even the pettiest—of human accomplishment that it can not be separated from the most vital function of teaching. No matter what the fancied skill of the pedagog in handling the principles and facts he uses in developing the mental faculties of those in his charge, he will infallibly trench on some or other of the truths that enter into the teachings of religious creeds. He cannot avoid it,—and in the measure of his influence with the children he instructs, he will necessarily influence them and impress them religiously or in opposition to religion.

Every now and then an incident crops out in some or other of the public schools of the country to confirm this. Just the other day one occurred in the history class of the high school in Bridgeport, Conn. Complaint was made to the Catholic priest in charge of St. Augustine's Church in that city that a young woman teacher in the city high school, in explaining a history lesson, grossly maligned the faith of her Catholic pupils by attributing to the Catholic Church a usage which all Catholics hold to be abominable. She insisted that it had been a common practice of the Church to sell indulgences. The contention is, of course, an insult to Catholics. Certainly we Catholics know what our faith teaches, certainly we know what practices have been stamped by the Church's approval adown the centuries of her glorious history, and that the Church has ever sanctioned the sale of indulgences we proclaim to be an infamous calumny.

Naturally the charge made by the prim New England school ma'am was resented by a well-instructed Catholic pupil. When requested to give reason for her denial of the statement made by the teacher, this Catholic girl suggested the latest and best authority, "The Catholic Encyclopedia." Everybody knows that this monumental work is acknowledged by scholars of all creeds, the world over, as the best exposition of Catholic doctrine and practice. Moreover this authoritative work happens to hold honored place on the shelves of Bridgeport's public library and is, therefore, accessible to every public school teacher of the town sincerely in earnest to seek and to impart correct information on Catholic subjects.

With amazement one learns that the high school teacher in question jauntily brushed aside the authority of this acknowledged source of accurate information on Catholic subjects. "It gave," she said, "the Catholic side of the question." A novel position truly for one presumably carefully trained to teach the truths of history. Must one, then, go to one's enemy to know the significance of one's own life's story. Would the Bridgeport school teacher derive her notion of President Wilson's tariff and financial policy from the partial statements of some rabid old-line Republican Protectionist?

The point that concerns Catholics—Catholic parents, very specially, who see no danger to their children in an atmosphere surcharged with possibilities of which the Bridgeport incident is but one illustration, is this: What protection have we against the evil influence bound to be exerted upon Catholic children in schools professedly secular? It is not the first instance of a public school teacher exceeding the privileges of her office in making a statement offensive to Catholic teaching and false to the truth of history itself. It is, of course, easy to say that public school teachers prescind from religious subjects and teach what may be accepted by all. But as we said above, religion permeates every detail of one's action, and personal prejudice, lack of full preparation for one's work, a course of reading that has been lopsided or one sided, as well as hundreds of other influences must color the teaching of even the best-intentioned. And when the harm is done and protest is made,—what recourse have Catholics?

In the Bridgeport instance the principal of the school made no attempt to restrain the teacher in question from exploiting the calumny against the Catholic Church; when interviewed he shifted the responsibility to the Board of Education because the text-book in use has the approval of that Board. Were his excuse to stand, the blame is but brought home to others. The cardinal sin of the incident—the teaching of false doctrine and the calumnious misrepresentation of the oldest and strongest Christian body in the world—remains to face the Catholic father-or mother who has entrusted the Catholic child to such an atmosphere. And do what men will—that blot will ever mar the system. Education without definite religious instruction is an impossible thing; we may protest until doomsday our purpose to teach without reference to the religion of the child, the limitations of human character make it unavoidable to give to our teaching the impress that marks our individual trend of thought and belief. There is but one recourse, let the word be repeated once again. The one remedy is a disposition of our school system in such wise as to give to every child the opportunity to receive a training entirely in harmony with the religious belief in which he has been trained.

AMERICA ventured a week or two ago to comment on the unfair and unjust policy, in reference to the taxation of the property of private educational and charitable institutions, favored by the editor of the Philadelphia Ledger. "Tax them," he says "they will bear the burden rather than close their doors." A correspondent took the occasion to send us this illustration of the manner in which the editor's policy is, in a measure, practically carried out by the authorities of the Quaker City:

"It is not easy to control one's indignation when the facts are known of this outrageous demand to make the burden of Catholics still heavier. An illustration of an iniquitous interpretation of the law may be seen in the case of the Cathedral parish school, now in course of erection in Philadelphia. The old school building was destroyed to make way for a new building—larger, safer, etc. Though the new building is on the spot of the old building, the Board of Revision of Taxes levies a tax on the new building, and will collect as long as the building is not actually occupied. Our Catholic Girls' High School was taxed in the same way, though the ground was exempt from taxation before the building was started.

"This policy, mind you, is carried out, though the City of Philadelphia is not providing adequate school facilities for the children of the city, and the city would be bankrupt if the Catholic Church closed her parish schools." M. J. O'C.

The followers of Don Bosco in the Argentine Republic are directing forty-four establishments, in twelve of which, seven hundred and fifty boys are receiving free training in trades. Then there are 6,000 boys taught in the Salesian Schools, including boarders and day scholars, while almost 6,000 girls are being educated in the colleges and schools under the Daughters of Our Lady Help of Christians. With the opportunities for agrarian development which the fertile soil of Argentina presents, it is now proposed to attach agricultural schools to some of the educational establishments in which attention may be devoted to methods of cultivating the land.

SOCIOLOGY

Organization in Charity Work

The complaint is heard sometimes, that Catholic charities lack organization. Protestant and non-sectarian works are organized perfectly, we are told: Catholic works are deficient in that matter. The conclusion drawn is usually, that in their organization we find the secret of the success of the former; in its absence the reason of the comparative failure of the latter. For many the last word is: "Go and learn from outsiders how to manage charities." So confident are such critics in the strength of their position, that were they to hear one questioning the truth of this fact, that Protestant and non-sectarian charities prosper while Catholic charities do not, and doubting the high value they attach to organization, they would be taken aback. Yet this is just what we are going to do.

In the first place we must distinguish between the different kinds of Protestant and non-sectarian works. There are, we suppose, in each denomination societies to help their own poor, and there are, we know, organizations to reach out to those not belonging to them, to reach Catholics especially in order to detach them from the Church. We suppose the existence of the former, because we never hear of them. The latter are in the public view, and it is their supposed success that is held up for our admiration. Such proselytizing is characteristic of Protestantism, and money can always be found for it. Buildings are erected, clubs are formed, social classes are organized. But when one comes to examine results they are found to be anything but proportionate to the expenditure. Take, for instance, the proselytizing among the Italians, Hungarians, Slavonians and other Catholic immigrants. Some of these are, of course, willing to sell their souls for the material goods offered them: the greater number, however, of those who use the so-called charitable works of the enemy, do so with considerable reservation regarding their faith. Consequently the work that has been going on for years, on which millions have been spent, has very little to show in the way of practical results. Two or three years ago the rector of a large Episcopal Church in New York had to resign on this account. He would not consent to give up his missions to the Italians: the business men of the Church Committee refused to provide funds for a business that gave no returns. They were the masters, so the rector had to go.

In the second place we would point out that there is no proportion between the charities of Catholics and those of Protestants. These have comparatively few: Catholics have many. Take an ordinary parish. The Church has to be maintained, much larger and more richly furnished than its Protestant neighbor; and, as it is in constant daily use, its bills for light and heat are far higher than the Protestant house of worship has to pay. Then there is the parochial school to be supported; and as church and school are absolutely necessary a large debt has generally been incurred to provide them. Hence interest has to be paid and the debt has to be reduced yearly. Besides, there are the collections for the general work of the Church, for the University, the Seminary, the Holy Father, the orphans and so on, the support of sodalities, parish libraries, day homes and other parish works. We can say then, without contradiction, that in any given area Catholics, even before they touch their work for the poor, spend far more in charity than do others altogether. What they do to relieve actual want we shall see very soon.

Now, as regards organization, we will lay down this principle, that it does not belong essentially to charitable work at all. It may become necessary to a certain degree, like many other rules, regulations and laws, on account of human imperfections. If every Christian man and woman put Christian duty first in daily life, there would be no need, say, for the ecclesiastical law of Easter duty, or for much of the legislation concerning mixed marriages. So if everyone did his duty in the matter of charity to the poor nothing more would be necessary than the Gospel precepts in the matter. In the ages of faith there was the minimum of organization and the maximum of charity for the poor. But necessary as it is under present conditions, it may be carried too far. We do not acknowledge any excellence in the highly organized social works outside the Church, which provide easy employment for a host of salaried agents, so that a very large part of their funds is consumed in expenses of administration, nor in the scientific methods of those so fearful of being imposed upon, that they encumber the relief of want with a complicated machinery of investigation and report. Among Catholics the relief of the poor is not a branch of social science, but a Christian duty, and consequently, it is very informal. How many pastors there are receiving considerable sums of money, who, when they die leave little or nothing behind them. In fact this is their normal state so that when the contrary happens—it happens very rarely—it is looked upon as a scandal. The reason is that their hands are always going to their pockets to relieve the poor. The Society of St. Vincent de Paul, following the rules of its great founder, has exact ideas on this matter of organization. It recognizes that as things are to-day, organization is necessary. But this is reduced to the minimum. No money that should go to the poor is wasted on it. The accounts of the Particular Council of New York for last year show receipts amounting to $56,424. The administration expenses were 12½ per cent. and would have been much less were it not that the Council has established Convalescent Homes in the country that require caretakers, and has had to employ a probation officer in connection with the juvenile courts. But besides that amount a still larger sum was distributed by the parochial conferences with practically no administration expenses. Hence for the whole work administration called for barely 6 per cent. The same is true of all the other Particular Councils and Conferences in the country.

The alms of the Society were distributed under the personal superintendence of its members to those in need. This was done quietly, in small sums, and so did not interfere with other good works. This interference is often the result of too much organization. People take up some charity and close their purses to others which they might assist. We saw an example of this in the last Episcopal General Convention. The contributions of the Women's Auxiliary, saved for the three years elapsing since the preceding Convention, were presented with much eclat, and amounted to some $360,000. This apparently large sum created much enthusiasm, but it was only $120,000 a year, or $10,000 a month. Some ministers do not approve of that way of doing things. They complain, doubtless with reason, that zeal for a big triennial contribution hinders many from the smaller yet more imperative charities coming up in their own parishes continually.

PULPIT, PRESS AND PLATFORM

New York's Mayor-Elect

We quote the concluding passage of the discourse of the Rev. Joseph H. Smith, S.J., speaking to the toast of "John Mitchel, the Man," at the banquet given on Dec. 16, by the Knights of Columbus, in honor of Mr. Mitchel, the Mayor-elect of New York. The picture presented is of especial interest, because it is drawn by the Professor who had most to do with the early college career of Mr. Mitchel and who has remained his intimate friend ever since:

"What is a man? He is first of all one who remembers his Creator in the days of his youth, when life is young and hope is vivid and sorrow is for the most part unknown, no less than in his middle life, when temptation assails him and hopes are toppling to the ground, or in his declining years, when life's fitful fever is well nigh over. He is one who rises above the animal life with all its muddy vesture of decay, and, faithful to every known obligation, roams in a sphere far above the prison of the complaining multitude, where he can fix his gaze steadily upon whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are beautiful, whatsoever things are good, whatsoever things are honest, and who amid the cares and anxieties of a busy professional life never loses out of his mind the remembrance of those things.

"The man who is truly worthy of the name is one who knows and confesses and practically recognizes that true nobility of character is justice crystallized, and that success is duty done effectively and valiantly. Such a man habituates himself to untiring fidelity to obscure duties no less than to duties that are conspicuous. He is calm and bright and self-possessed amid the heat and dust and turmoil of every-day life. He is content with the commendation of the Almighty. He is a stranger alike to dishonesty and insincerity. He cannot find it in his heart to harbor malice, resentment or vindictiveness. Though envious calumny may sometimes tip the tongues and pens of others in his regard, he does not retaliate in kind.

"In his living he is upright and unsullied. In his thinking he is accurate careful and sufficiently independent to let people know that he has a mind and will of his own. If he has knowledge he is willing to impart it to others. If he has wealth, he is truly charitable to the poor for God's sake,—not to blazon his name upon his contributions, nor with smug religiosity and self-satisfaction, to proclaim to the gaping multitude that earth is heaven. If he is a man in public life, he is dominated by an abiding and never failing sense of fairness, honor and highmindedness, remembering that 'a public office is a public trust,' that is to say, that political office is conferred and can only be conferred for the good of the community, not for personal gain or advancement. Tried and true, constant and loyal, if, in the performance of his duty as he sees it, he makes mistakes, he is willing, in a manner no less human, to acknowledge his failures, expecting at the same time that his fellows will not, because of the preeminence of his position, unjustly deny him the ordinary mercies of mankind. In a word, he will always have at heart the best interests of his fellow citizens, even 'were wisdom in the scorn of consequence,' like that most illustrious compatriot of John Mitchel's grandfather, Edmund Burke, the greatest statesman in the English-speaking world for two centuries. For it was Edmund Burke who, on the hustings in Bristol, in 1780, manfully exclaimed: 'I did not obey your instructions, but I conformed to the instructions of truth and nature and maintained your interest against your opinions with a constancy that became me.'"

ECCLESIASTICAL NEWS

The danger of immoral and carelessly censored moving picture shows has already led to special ecclesiastical regulations. The German Bishops in their Congress at Fulda have found it necessary to issue the following injunctions to the clergy of their dioceses:

1. All children of school age are to be excluded from all attendance at public moving picture shows.

2. Special film presentations for children of every kind who are still obliged to attend school are only most rarely to be permitted, and under the supervision of the religious instructor.

3. Children under six years of age, in as far as they are not yet obliged to attend school, must absolutely be excluded from all such exhibitions.

4. The duty of supervising the film presentations is enjoined upon the pastor, who must, however, act with the reserve becoming his priestly state and enter into an understanding with the civil and educational authorities.

5. The dangers of moving pictures are to be urgently brought home to children and adults, in church and school.

The sixteenth anniversary of the consecration of St. Patrick's Cathedral, Melbourne, was celebrated on Sunday, November 2. His Grace Archbishop Carr, presided at solemn high Mass. The following selection from the discourse of the Most Rev. Dr. Mannix is taken from the New Zealand Tablet: "It is scarcely more than half a century since Catholics, here in Australia, were thrown into prison, or publicly flogged, for refusing to attend Protestant services. It is hard to realize it, but it is true, that these things happened in Australia as late as 1843, and that the foundation stone of this Cathedral in which we are assembled was laid in 1850. The Catholics of Melbourne were then less than 6000, even if we count men, women, and children, and the whole population of the city was not more than 23,000. But the handful of Catholics, in the midst of a hostile majority, in a land which, a generation before, had heard the haughty threat of the Protestant Governor at Sydney; in a land which, only a decade of years before, had heard the lash descending upon the bare shoulders of Catholics who refused to abjure their faith; these pioneer Catholic heroes of Melbourne planned this Cathedral, which to-day stretches its lordly length across the summit of Eastern Hill. Truly there were giants in those days among the Catholics of Melbourne. Their courage should be to us an inspiration amid the stress and difficulties—light and trivial by contrast—of our own day. Their names should go down in honor, as long as this Cathedral looks out calmly, proudly, yet with a patient yearning, over the fair city at its feet."

Mother Mary Gertrude de Sales Byrne, of the Convent of Mercy, Perth, Western Australia, celebrated the diamond jubilee of her religious profession on November 21. Mother de Sales is a native of Dublin, and with other postulants arrived in Perth in 1851, joining the Community of the Order established there as far back as 1846 by Mother Ursula Frayne. Mother de Sales has devoted the sixty years of her religious life to the noble work of Catholic education in Western Australia.

SCIENCE

Symptoms of an eruption are showing at Vesuvius. But on the flank of the troubled mountain, in the placid pursuit of science, the venerable Father Guiseppe Mercalli is engaged in feeling the feverous pulse that beats beneath. He says Mass in the tiny oratory attached to the Royal Vesuvian Observatory, of which he is the director, and in his solitude records his observations. The period of repose, he says, is ended. Professor Alessandro Malladra is his assistant, an enthusiast who has dared greatly and won much knowledge. He descended nearly 1,000 feet into the mouth of the volcano last May, took photographs and measurements and temperatures on the floor of the crater, and will not be satisfied till he has spent a day and a night within the jaws of the monster.

In Prof. Malladra's opinion Vesuvius has by no means entered upon her death agony. The neighboring Monte Somma was once the true centre of Vesuvian energy, but is now practically extinct. This is a sign of "creeping paralysis," the professor says. The vapors arising from Monte Somma at the present time are due to the fact that owing to the ordinary outlets of the volcano being temporarily smothered with debris, the immensely high pressure beneath is finding vent by its more ancient aperture. Vesuvius is suffering severely from this restriction, but Prof. Malladra gives her "still from 1,000 to 1,500 years of fairly vigorous activity. The old age of a volcano is a very indefinite period."

With regard to some momentous development in the near future, he admits that we may expect an eruption. "Will the giant forces underneath the main crater fling out the enormous masses of old, solidified material that now choke the big chimney of the crater? Or will the accumulated gases find out the weakest points on the lower slopes and there in dolorous pregnancy give birth to new fiery outlets? I personally incline to the latter hypothesis.

"It is not improbable that a fresh crater may form in the near vicinity of this observatory. When I was exploring the crater on May 14, 1912, I discovered that an enormous rent had been torn by earthquake in the flank of Vesuvius. That ominous cleft is ten feet wide. Starting from the very top of the crater, near Cook's Upper Station, it runs the entire length of the mountain-side from the Atrio del Cavallo right down to the very sea—a total distance of over five miles! That ugly rent splits the populous town of Torre del Greco in twain. There's the danger."

OBITUARY

His Eminence, Cardinal Mariano Rampolla, Marchese del Tindaro, Secretary of State, 1887-1903, under Pope Leo XIII, and for the past quarter of a century one of the most important figures in the government of the Church, died suddenly of angina pectoris, at his residence in Rome, on December 16. He belonged to a patrician family of Sicily and was born at Polizzi, on August 17, 1843. After his studies at the Capranica College, he was ordained priest and then entered the College of Noble Ecclesiastics at Rome. In 1875 he was sent as auditor of the Nunciature of Spain, and two years later was recalled to Rome to be Secretary of Propaganda for Oriental Affairs. Promotion to the titular archbishopric of Heraclea, December 1, 1882, and his appointment as Nuncio at Madrid followed. During his term of office at the Spanish capital he was able to inaugurate the settlement of the controversy between Germany and Spain, concerning the ownership of the Caroline Islands, by persuading Prince Bismarck and the Kaiser to accept Pope Leo XIII as the arbitrator of the issue. The Pope decided in favor of Spain (1885), but with conditions acceptable to Germany. This great diplomatic success met with speedy recognition, and on March 15, 1887, Pope Leo created him a cardinal priest with the title of St. Cecilia. He was also made Secretary of State, an office which he held until 1903, when the present incumbent Cardinal Merry del Val succeeded him at the election of Pius X. During the last decade of the reign of Leo XIII, Cardinal Rampolla was the vigorous executive of that Pontiff's policy in dealing with the French and Italian Governments in their relations with the Church. He was credited with being largely instrumental in promoting the diplomatic friendship between France and Russia as against the interests of the Triple Alliance. At the opening of the Conclave of August, 1903, he was the most favored candidate for the succession to Leo XIII, and had 29 votes cast in his favor to 21 for Cardinal Sarto, the present Pope, when the late Cardinal Puzyna interposed with the announcement that another candidate would be more agreeable to Austria. The immediate consequence was an increase of votes for Cardinal Rampolla, but the election of Cardinal Sarto followed. Since his resignation (1903) as Secretary of State, Cardinal Rampolla has devoted much of his time to the study of archæology and sacred history in which he was intensely interested. He wrote a life of St. Melania which gives an authoritative view of the life of the early Christians during the time of Pope Damasus. He also held the offices of Archpriest of the Basilica of St. Peter; Librarian of the Holy Roman Church, and Grand Prior of the Order of Malta.

The cable states that the Pope was greatly grieved when informed of Cardinal Rampolla's death and said he "was one of the greatest men in the Church and had become even greater since he retired from state affairs." In person he was tall, slim, graceful and impressive, in every move the high bred Italian patrician and exemplary Churchman. His death reduces the Sacred College to 56 members and the Italian Cardinals to 29.

CHRONICLE FOR 1913

The Political Field.—Woodrow Wilson entered upon the duties of President on March 4. On the same day, William H. Taft, the outgoing President, became again a plain American citizen. Mr. Taft's administration of the affairs of the nation stamped him as a man of lofty aim and high purpose, combined with the executive ability which his office demanded, while his genial and affable disposition endeared him to the American people.

Political results of the year have been no less definite and perhaps far more striking than the legislative results. In neither the House nor the Senate has the party in control developed in any degree the quality of leadership, with the notable exception of Representative Underwood, who has kept the unwieldy majority of the House in line.

A salient feature of the year has been the concentration of party-leadership at the White House and its consequent decline on Capitol Hill. In the same proportion has the caucus method been brought into play to carry out the legislative program outlined by the President. Conservative Senators of the old régime, many of them at the head of important committees, who were expected to assert a certain amount of independence, capitulated completely to the President. It was shown, for example, when, in spite of mutterings of the older Democrats that the President had forced the House into line for free wool and free sugar, the Senate in the end did his bidding, and upset all precedents by decreasing the rates of the House bill. In like manner, among Democratic members of the Finance Committee, opposition, which for a time threatened the defeat of the Currency Bill, finally faded away and the Administration measure was passed triumphantly.

The results of State and municipal elections in November were generally interpreted as a popular endorsement of the Wilson Administration. Chief interest in the outcome was centred in the city of New York, where charges of graft and the reaction following the impeachment and removal of Governor Sulzer, resulted in the election of John Purroy Mitchel, who carried with him practically the entire Independent ticket. The rout of Tammany was complete. Other notable successes were the election in New Jersey of James F. Fielder, the Wilson candidate for Governor, and that of David L. Walsh, a Catholic, in Massachusetts, by the largest vote ever cast for a Democratic candidate.

Congress.—The last session of the 63d Congress opened on December 2, 1912, and its close on March 4 following marked the end of the control of the Government that the Republican party had maintained for sixteen years. The one great task of Congress during the short session was the consideration and passage of the annual supply bills, which carried in the aggregate $1,000,000,000. Approval was given to plans of the Fine Arts Commission for a $2,000,000 memorial in Washington, in honor of Abraham Lincoln, and Robert W. Archbold, a United States Circuit Judge, was found guilty by the Senate on impeachment charges and disqualified from holding any office of honor or trust under the United States Government. Outside of these there was no legislation of importance, the Immigration bill, with its objectionable literary test being killed, so far as that Congress was concerned, when the House declined to follow the Senate in overriding the President's veto. The Sixty-third Congress was in special session from April 7, 1913, until December 1, 1913, and passed, without interruption, on December 1, into its regular constitutional session. The legislative record of the first session is short. The tariff was revised and an income tax law enacted; three appropriation bills, one of which had been vetoed by President Taft, were passed, and the Board of Conciliation and Mediation for the adjustment of controversies between railroads and their employees was created, largely under stress of the threat of a strike on the Eastern railroads. The last was a non-partisan measure drafted during the previous Congress. The one real achievement, however, was tariff revision and the income tax law, to which the first part of the session was devoted, as the last part was given over to currency legislation. Besides these the only subjects considered in the session ending the first Monday in December were such as required immediate attention, necessary appropriations for the administration of government, and for the relief of suffering caused by flood and disaster. The appropriation bills, it should be noted, were made the vehicle of adventitious legislation, which will probably occupy a conspicuous place in the records of the Democracy. The Sundry Civil bill contained a clause exempting farmers' organizations and labor unions from prosecution for violation of the anti-trust law, the provision on which President Taft based his veto of the measure near the end of his term. It also provided for the suppression of the Commerce Court on December 31.

To the urgent deficiency bill was attached a rider exempting deputy collectors of internal revenue and deputy marshals from Civil Service requirements. In a similar way the tariff bill provided that additional employees necessary for the collection of the income tax should be appointed, not under the Civil Service, but under regulations made by the Secretary of the Treasury. On December 19 the Administration Currency bill, as perfected by the Owen sub-committee and ratified by the Democratic caucus, was passed in the Senate by a vote of 54 to 34. A few days later the bill was signed by the President.

The President.—President Wilson addressed the joint houses of Congress, assembled in the House of Representatives, four times during the year 1913. This was in addition to sundry communications in the shape of reports on matters affecting the nation at large and its outlying dependencies. The method of formal address was the setting aside of a custom which had obtained from the days of John Adams. The first address, delivered April 8, on the subject of the tariff, was a carefully prepared statement on the position of the Chief Executive with regard to tariff reform and to the changes which such reforms would render imperative in the revenue-producing statutes. An overshadowing note of the document was contained in the avowal that it would be unwise to bring about such changes "with reckless haste" or with a complete uprooting "of what has grown up among us by long process and at our own invitation." The President's address of June 22 was on the currency, and that of August 27 on Mexico. His statement in regard to Mexico, later repeated with emphasis, summarizes the consistent attitude maintained by the United States towards that unfortunate country. Mr. Wilson revealed how the Huerta provisional régime had rejected the friendship of the United States, and its effort to aid in establishing a government which could be recognized by this nation, and which would be respected and obeyed by Mexico's own people. In a statement which breathed regret and sympathy in every phrase, the President clung tenaciously to an optimistic view of the ultimate result and announced the necessity of a firm, neutral stand by this Government, a policy of "hands off," to await the hour of Mexico's awakening. President Wilson appeared for the fourth time before Congress on December 2. Interest in the message centred chiefly on the Mexican problem and the question of anti-trust legislation. In both instances the President's words were reassuring. He denounced Huerta as a dictator and a usurper whose power is crumbling day by day, and expressed the belief that this country would not be obliged to alter its policy of "watchful waiting." In regard to anti-trust legislation, the President was not in favor of any change in the Sherman law, but would welcome supplementary legislation that would reduce the "area of doubt" that has harassed business men.

Mexico.—The year began with the unfortunate Madero still in the Presidency but with the country up in arms against him. In the beginning of February, Felix Diaz was besieging him in the capital and the city ran with blood for a week. Madero was finally taken and shot and Huerta was elected in his place by Congress, but there were 50,000 rebels in arms against the new President in different parts of the country. As a consequence, the whole year has been a series of bloody battles in the attempt to subdue them. Because of the killing of Madero the United States refused to recognize Huerta although the European Powers had no difficulty in doing so. His chief enemy in Mexico is Carranza who has overrun most of the Northern Provinces. The United States Ambassador, Wilson, who was favorable to Huerta resigned; Mr. John Lind was sent in his place and Huerta was again informed that no recognition would be given except to a properly elected President, and that he himself was excluded from being a candidate for the post. On September 16 the Mexican Congress assembled and it was announced by Huerta that sufficient money had been obtained from Europe to raise an army of 100,000 men, but on October 10 he practically dissolved Congress by arresting 110 members for attacking his administration and conspiring with the rebels. For this high-handed measure a veiled warning was received from the United States and he was told that such methods indicated that he did not intend to give the country a free election. The elections were held on October 26, the candidates being Federico Gamboa as representing the Catholic party; Felix Diaz for the Laborites; Manuel Calero, a Liberal, and David de la Fuente, a Republican Liberal. The voting was, however, so light that the election was held to be null and void for the reason that the Constitution called for a polling of votes of at least one-third of the electors. The result was that Huerta remained in power. The newly elected Congress, although the United States refused to recognize it, met and named Huerta Provisional President. Meantime Carranza's strength was increasing. Mr. Lind again arrived in Mexico and announced that his Government would maintain its position until the newly elected Congress was dissolved and Huerta had withdrawn from political life. The rebels still continued active in their depredations and a bloody battle took place at Victoria in which the entire Federal garrison was slaughtered. Then a new element of disorder appeared in the person of Villa who captured Chihuahua, but from the beginning of December the rebels have met with a series of defeats. Torreon was recaptured by the Federals and the rebel attacks on Tampico were repelled. On December 9 Congress declared the previous election for the Presidency null and void and authorized Huerta to hold the Presidency ad interim. Such is the condition at the close of the year.

South America.—Robert Bacon, formerly Secretary of State, who has just returned from a tour of foreign countries as the representative of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, said that, despite misunderstandings, caused largely by ignorance of true conditions on the part of this country, the attitude of the South American republics was one of the utmost friendliness to the United States. "In regard to the development which I observed," said Mr. Bacon, "I cannot sufficiently impress its significance upon our own country. Some of these republics are advancing so rapidly that each succeeding year will mark an important change. The people have been beset by obstacles greater than those that confronted our forefathers. These have been little understood by us here, but in spite of them they have forged ahead until the civilization of their larger centres compares favorably with the older civilizations of Europe. It must strike anyone who visits South America that it is the country of the future. The natural resources are so vast that they may be said to be almost inexhaustible. Although so much has been written, and there has been so much talk about this wealth, we have only the vaguest conception of it and the part it must play in the history of civilization in the near future. As yet the countries of South America, even great countries like Brazil and Argentina, are sparsely settled. Immigration has been checked by distance and the difficulties of travel, but these conditions are disappearing. The improved means of communication are bringing more and more people to their shores. Germans, English, French, Italians and Japanese have been quick to realize the opportunities that await them there." Mr. Bacon said that great benefit could be derived by the people of the United States through acquaintanceship with their South American neighbors. "The representative men and women of these countries," he declared, "have all the charm and grace and intellectual culture for which the Latin races are famous. Their warm-hearted hospitality is proverbial." Personally, he said, he could never forget, nor could he adequately express his appreciation of the kindness and courtesy of their welcome to him.

Canada.—The Navy Bill, after a long discussion in Parliament, which Mr. Borden stopped by means of clôture resolutions, was rejected by the Senate. Outside Parliament it provoked no little angry feeling on both sides, and it is doubtful whether Mr. Borden will introduce it again. To do so he would need evidence that the larger part of the country favors him, and this is far from clear. Parliament will assemble on January 15, and many believe that the Government will take up the redistribution of seats, made necessary by the changes in population shown by the last census, and then proceed to a general election. There has been much talk among Liberals of Government coercion and corruption in bye-elections. In one case, that of the Macdonald constituency in Manitoba, the election tribunal unseated the Conservative member on that account; but he was returned again with an increased majority.—The Manitoba school question seemed at one time on the point of being settled. It was proposed to lease the Catholic schools of Winnipeg to the School Board, which should support them, while they were to be carried on by the ecclesiastical authorities as in the past. The Government obtained counsel's opinion that this could be done. The archbishop declared the arrangement satisfactory. Then the Orange Lodges interfered. The consequence was another counsel's opinion hostile to the scheme, which the School Board determined to follow; and so things have fallen back into their former condition.—Sir Wilfrid Laurier has declared in favor of free trade in food, being convinced, he says, that high prices are due to the tariff. The Prairie provinces ask in addition free trade in agricultural machinery and the increase of British preference to 50 per cent. The object of the latter seems to be to propitiate the Eastern provinces by increasing British imports, which would favor Canadian ports. At present much Canadian produce goes out through American ports, because no cargoes are offering in England for Canadian ports, and it does not pay to send ships in ballast, especially as insurance to Canadian ports is higher than to American.—The commercial reaction felt throughout the world has been especially severe in Canada, particularly in the West, where during the period of inflation speculation and expenditure were extravagant. The harvest, satisfactory both in quantity and quality, has helped the Prairie provinces. The grain growers, deep in debt, have not benefited very much, but merchants, traders, bankers, compelling them to sell at any price offering, have been able to collect a good deal of the money due them, and thus have been saved from serious embarrassments.—There were serious strikes in the coal fields of Vancouver Island. In Nanaimo a strike was ordered by the United Workers of America from its headquarters in Indianapolis, and an agent was sent from Seattle to direct it. The companies declined to listen to foreigners in their affairs; and, though a majority of the workers wished to keep their agreements, the organization was able to put such pressure on them that the strike was declared. Rioting soon followed with much destruction of property, and some personal injury and loss of life. The militia was called out; and the unions in Vancouver, not only reviled them, but also demanded that employers should refuse to take them back when their military service should be over. Hence there was some disaffection in the ranks, but, on the whole, the men did their duty. Some hundred and thirty of the chief rioters were arrested. Of these between twenty and thirty pleaded guilty and were sentenced to imprisonment, the maximum term being two years. The rest were tried at a special assizes held in New Westminster. Many were acquitted. Others were convicted after the judge had declared the testimony for the defence to be rank perjury, committed through fear of the unions. These are demanding the release of the convicts, and the Canadian Trades Union Congress entertained the demand that members of unions should be forbidden to join the militia. On the other hand, the Canadian Federation of Labor, belonging chiefly to the Maritime Provinces, set itself against all foreign interference in Canadian labor affairs, and approved the action of the British Columbian Government in putting down the riots. The latest news is that Sir Richard McBride, Premier of British Columbia, and other ministers, are threatened with assassination. —The chief agent of the Canadian Pacific Railway in Austria was arrested suddenly on the charge of promoting the emigration of men who had not performed their military service, and the company's offices were closed. The whole affair is very obscure. The Canadian company's ships sail from Trieste and Fiume. Nothing would have been easier than to forbid the emigration of such men and to put an officer at the steamers' gangway to turn back all attempting to violate the order. Moreover, for one going out through these ports, half a dozen cross into Germany and go out through German and Belgium ports. Many think the whole affair to be a plot worked by the German companies to punish the Canadian Pacific for withdrawing from the Atlantic Conference. The British Government interfered and the offices were reopened, but emigration was forbidden until after the trial of the agent, who is out on bail. The last concession is that the company may transport those who bought tickets previous to the arrest, about a thousand persons.

Great Britain.—The political year has been rather uneventful. The Government passed the Home Rule and Welsh Disestablishment Bills, to have them rejected by the House of Lords on the plea that they had never been formally before the people. They have to be sent up again and again rejected in order to become law automatically. The Marconi investigation caused some talk, but does not seem to have weakened the Government. Its occasion was the charge made in Parliament that the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Attorney-General made use of their knowledge that the Government was to make certain contracts with the Marconi Company to speculate in its stock. They denied that they had ever dealt in Marconi stock, and the matter was thought to be settled, when it came out that they had used a mental reservation. They had not speculated in the English stock, but they had done so in the American, which was linked up with the English company. The investigation ended in acquitting them of any moral fault, they acknowledged that they had been imprudent, and after a decent interval the Attorney-General was made Chief Justice of England. Towards the end of the year the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced his scheme of Land Reform, of which the scope is to transfer the land to the occupiers. He denounced violently landlords who use some of their land for parks and game preserves, and was especially hard on the Scotch deer forests, to form which, he said, the peasant occupiers had been exterminated. The Duke of Sutherland offered him the greater part of his forest at a very small price, and the whole of it at a price somewhat larger, so that he might put his plan into practice, warning him that the attempt would fail. Up to the present he has not accepted the offer. There seems to be some division in the Cabinet on the matter. The Prime Minister is said not to favor Land Reform, and lately he indicated that a readjustment of the Income Tax is in his mind, of which one element is to be the lowering of the figure at which incomes become subject to the tax. This will hardly commend itself to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. There have been a couple of temporary Unionist reactions, but they came to nothing, either because the country is at heart content with the Government, or because it does not trust the Unionist leaders. The close of the year finds the Government as strong as it was twelve months ago.—The Suffragists caused much trouble. Rioting, arson, assaults on Ministers, brawling in churches, malicious mischief, sedition, are the means they have used with practical impunity to attain their ends. Mrs. Pankhurst has been set free and rearrested several times under the "Cat and Mouse" act. The Government has succeeded in getting twenty-five days of her three years' sentence.—The working classes have been in continual ferment, and there have been several strikes of some magnitude. The Admiralty has recognized the Trades Unions, and will deal with their representatives. Ben Tillet advocated the bringing on of a general conflict, and James Larkin, after his release from a Dublin prison on the demand of the workingmen, came over to England to promote it. The labor leaders opposed him, and, for the moment, his agitation has failed. An Employers' Association, with a capital of fifty million sterling, was formed to protect employers against their workmen.—Early in the year news came that the Scott expedition had reached the South Pole in January, 1912, only to find that Amundsen had forestalled them. On their way back Scott and his companions perished. Scott himself, with three others, was the last to die of starvation and cold, March 29, 1912. Their bodies were found by a searching party within a few miles of a depot, which they were prevented from reaching by continual blizzards.—The unrest in India was heightened by the condition of the Indians in Natal and British Columbia. Many Indians, over one hundred thousand, had been brought in past years to the former colony as indentured laborers. After their indentures expired the Indians, chiefly Sikhs, many of whom had seen active service in the army, claimed the right as British subjects to live freely wherever they wished in South Africa. This was denied them. In Natal they were subjected to special laws, and they were refused entrance into Transvaal and other South African States. They organized a system of passive resistance, which developed on some occasions into considerable disturbances. In India the South African Government's action provoked petitions to the Crown, with which the Viceroy expressed his sympathy. In British Columbia a policy of exclusion is being followed.—The German peril comes up from time to time in connection with the failure of the Territorial army and the success of the enemy in naval maneuvers. The only remedy proposed is the strengthening of the navy in home waters. This means the virtual abandonment of the Mediterranean, and an increase of ship-building, that is becoming an intolerable burden. Moreover, the manning of the new ships and the providing of them with efficient officers is becoming a very serious problem.
